This power was given to prevent changes toward monarchy or aristocracy in the members of the Union. It assumed that the governments then existing were republican in form, that changes in them were proper, might become necessary, were certainly within the reserved rights of the States, and entirely consistent with the maintenance of republican forms of government. This power was not given to prevent such changes, nor to maintain the relation of the States to the Federal Government, nor to protect the State from invasion, nor yet from domestic violence. It was given for the sole purpose of preventing changes in the forms of State government which would make it anti-republican. Our fathers dealt not in subtle devices nor used equivocal language. They knew the then existing governments were republican in form; they intended to give to the Federal Government no power to change them; they intended to impose no limit on the right of the States to change them, except that none of the changes should be anti-republican, and this intention they carried out in the language of the Constitution. The States may have any form of government so long as it remains republican, and the Federal Government shall not intervene.

It is true that the question whether a form of government is republican is to be decided by the political power, and the judicial department cannot revise its decision; but the discretion of the political power is not unlimited, supreme, subject to no control. It is subject to rule; and the first rule is that so long as the old State constitutions and forms of government are maintained they must be held to be republican; and the second rule is that all other constitutions similar in spirit and provisions are also republican, and that so long as the States preserve such form of government the condition on which Federal interference is provided for does not exist. Slavery existed in each of the States, except perhaps one, at the time of the formation of this Constitution. Its existence, therefore, was clearly not inconsistent with a republican government at that time, and if not inconsistent then it cannot be inconsistent now. The States at that time had their State debts; they had entire control of them; they paid what they pleased; they repudiated or scaled what they pleased; they have done so ever since. This power therefore was clearly not inconsistent with a republican form of government at that time, and certainly, therefore, cannot be so now. The right to declare who shall be electors for State offices, and who shall be eligible thereto, was committed entirely to the State; by the terms of the Constitution the electors for Representatives should "have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, and those who vote for presidential electors should have such qualifications as the Legislatures might prescribe." This power was then and is now not only consistent with but is indispensable to a republican form of government.

And yet the advocates of this bill propose to deprive the States of power over the question of slavery, power over their own indebtedness, power to regulate the elective franchise and the right to hold office, under the pretense that they thereby execute the provision that the United States must guaranty a republican form of government to the States.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] has shown how he would execute it. South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida should never again appear as a State or in name in this Confederation. Is their exclusion a guarantee to them of a republican government?

Has any gentleman asserted in this debate that these powers are incompatible with republican government? Not one. Not one would venture so far. Then I submit that the condition in which Congress may act has not arisen. If Congress may insist upon the three fundamental conditions prescribed in this bill, in the case of the States resuming their relations to the Union, then I submit that, by a parity of reasoning, it ought to insist upon their incorporation into the constitution of the States remaining steadfast by the Union. If they are essential to republicanism in the one class of States they are equally so in all.

Gentlemen do not assert, but they do assume, and this is the basis of their whole argument, that because the Federal Government must guaranty a republican form of government, it may therefore prescribe what particular form of republican government a State must adopt. This is obviously wrong. Mr. Madison in the Federalist refutes it:

"As long, therefore, as the existing republican forms are continued by the States, they are guarantied by the Federal Constitution. Whenever the States may choose to substitute other republican forms, they have a right to do so, and to claim the Federal guarantee for the latter. The only restriction imposed on them is that they shall not exchange republican for anti-republican constitutions; a restriction which it is presumed will hardly be considered as a grievance."

The conclusion, then, to which I am forced is that under the language of this clause of the Constitution Congress has no authority to prescribe the conditions asserted in this bill, whatever may be the relation of the seceded States to the Federal Government, and whatever may be the effect of their secession upon the constitution and State government then existing. I have chosen thus far to argue this question on the lower grade of the mere construction of the letter and the obvious spirit of the Constitution. I have done so because the gentleman from Maryland asserted over and over again that he found his authority to pass the bill in the clause of the Constitution which I have cited; and he deduced from that source all the powers which are claimed to belong to the Federal Government for the purposes of this war. The question rises, however, far higher; and I propose to follow the gentleman in his discussion of it into other regions.

The gentleman maintains two propositions, which lie at the very basis of his views on this subject. He has explained them to the House, and enforced them on other occasions. He maintains that, by reason of their secession, the seceded States and their citizens "have not ceased to be citizens and States of the United States, though incapable of exercising political privileges under the Constitution, but that Congress is charged with a high political power by the Constitution to guaranty republican government in the States, and that this is the proper time and the proper mode of exercising it." This act of revolution on the part of the States has evoked the most extraordinary theories upon the relation of the States to the Federal Government. This theory of the gentleman is one of them. The ratification of the Constitution by Virginia established the relation between herself and the Federal Government; it created the link between her and all the States; it announced her assumption of the duties, her title to the rights of the confederating States; it proclaimed her interest in, her power over, her obedience to the common agent of all the States. If Virginia had never ordained that ratification she would have been an independent State; the Constitution would have been as perfect and the union between the ratifying States would have been as complete as they now are. Virginia repeals that ordinance of ratification, annuls that bond of union, breaks that link of confederation. She repeals but a single law, repeals it by the action of a sovereign convention; leaves her constitution, her laws, her political and social polity untouched. And the gentleman from Maryland tells us that the effect of this repeal is not to destroy the vigor of that law, but is to subvert the State government, and to render the citizens "incapable of exercising political privileges;" that the Union remains, but that one party to it has thereby lost its corporate existence, and the other has advanced to the control and government of it.

Sir, this cannot be. Gentlemen must not palter in a double sense. These acts of secession are either valid or they are invalid. If they are valid, they separated the State from the Union. If they are invalid they are void; they have no effect; the State officers who act upon them are rebels to the Federal Government; the States are not destroyed; their constitutions are not abrogated; their officers are committing illegal acts, for which they are liable to punishment; the States have never left the Union, but so soon as their officers shall perform their duties or other officers shall assume their places, will again perform the duties imposed and enjoy the privileges conferred by the Federal compact, and this not by virtue of a new ratification of the Constitution, nor a new admission by the Federal Government, but by virtue of the original ratification, and the constant, uninterrupted maintenance of position in the Federal Union since that date.

Acts of secession are not invalid to destroy the Union, and valid to destroy the State governments and the political privileges of their citizens. We have heard much of the two-fold relation which citizens of the seceded States may hold to the Federal Government—that they may be at once belligerents and rebellious citizens. I believe there are some judicial decisions to that effect. Sir, it is impossible. The Federal Government may possibly have the right to elect in which relation it will deal with them; it cannot deal with them at one and the same time in inconsistent relations. Belligerents being captured are entitled to be treated as prisoners of war; rebellious citizens are liable to be hanged. The private property of belligerents, according to the rules of modern war, shall not be taken without compensation; the property of rebellious citizens is liable to confiscation. Belligerents are not amenable to the local criminal law, nor to the jurisdiction of courts which administer it; rebellious citizens are, and the officers are bound to enforce the law, and to exact the penalty of its infraction. The seceded States are either in the Union or out of it. If in the Union, their constitutions are untouched, their State governments are maintained; their citizens are entitled to all political rights, except so far as they may be deprived of them by the criminal law which they have infringed. This seems incomprehensible to the gentleman from Maryland. In his view the whole State government centers in the men who administer it; so that when they administer it unwisely, or put it in antagonism to the Federal Government, the State government is dissolved, the State constitution is abrogated, and the State is left, in fact and in form, de jure and de facto, in anarchy, except so far as the Federal Government may rightfully intervene. This seems to be substantially the view of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] He enforces the same position, but he does not use the same language.

I submit that these gentlemen do not see with their usual clearness of vision. If by a plague or other visitation of God every officer of a State government should at the same moment die, so that not a single person clothed with official power should remain, would the State government be destroyed? Not at all. For the moment it would not be administered, but as soon as officers were elected, and assumed their respective duties it would be instantly in full force and vigor.

If these States are out of the Union their State governments are still in force unless otherwise changed. And their citizens are to the Federal Government as foreigners, and it has in relation to them the same rights, and none other, as it had in relation to British subjects in the war of 1812, or to the Mexicans in 1846. Whatever may be the true relation of the seceded States, the Federal Government derives no power in relation to them or their citizens from the provision of the Constitution now under consideration, but in the one case derives all its power from the duty of enforcing the "supreme law of the land," and in the other from the power "to declare war."

The second proposition of the gentleman from Maryland is this. I use his language:

"That clause vests in the Congress of the United States a plenary, supreme, unlimited political jurisdiction, paramount over courts, subject only to the judgment of the people of the United States, embracing within its scope every legislative measure necessary and proper to make it effectual; and what is necessary and proper the Constitution refers in the first place to our judgment, subject to no revision but that of the people."

The gentleman states his case too strongly. The duty imposed on Congress is doubtless important, but Congress has no right to use a means of performing it forbidden by the Constitution, no matter how necessary or proper it might be thought to be. But, sir, this doctrine is monstrous. It has no foundation in the Constitution. It subjects all the States to the will of Congress; it places their institutions at the feet of Congress. It creates in Congress an absolute unqualified despotism. It asserts the power of Congress in changing the State governments to be "plenary, supreme, unlimited"—"subject only to revision by the people of the whole United States." The rights of the people of the State are nothing, their will is nothing. Congress first decides, the people of the whole Union revise. My own State of Ohio is liable at any moment to be called in question for her constitution. She does not permit negroes to vote. If this doctrine be true Congress may decide this exclusion is anti-republican, and by force of arms abrogate that constitution and set up another permitting negroes to vote. From that decision of the Congress there is no appeal to the people of Ohio, but only to the people of Massachusetts, and New York, and Wisconsin, at the election of Representatives; and if a majority cannot be elected to reverse the decision the people of Ohio must submit. Woe be to the day when that doctrine shall be established, for from its centralized despotism we will appeal to the sword!

Sir, the rights of the States were the foundation corner of the Confederation. The Constitution recognized them, maintained them, provided for their perpetuation. Our fathers thought them the safeguard of our liberties. They have proved so. They have reconciled liberty with empire; they have reconciled the freedom of the individual with the increase of our magnificent domain. They are the test, the touchstone, the security of our liberties. This bill, the avowed doctrine of its supporters, sweeps them all instantly away. It substitutes despotism for self-government; despotism the more severe because vested in a numerous Congress elected by a people who may not feel the exercise of its power. It subverts the Government, destroys the Confederation, and erects a tyranny on the ruins of republican governments. It creates unity—it destroys liberty—it maintains integrity of territory, but destroys the rights of the citizen.

Sir, if this be the alternative of secession, I should prefer that secession should succeed. I should prefer to have the Union dissolved, the confederate States recognized; nay, more, I should prefer that secession should go on, if need be, until each State resumes its complete independence. I should prefer thirty-four republics to one despotism. From such republics, while I might fear discord and wars, I would enjoy individual liberty, and hope for reunion on the true principles of confederation. From one strong centralized despotism, overriding the rights of the people, overriding the rights of the States, I can see no escape except in apathetic contentment with slavery, or the oft-repeated, often-failing, always bloody struggles of despairing hope. I would rather live a free citizen of a republic no larger than my native county of Hamilton, than be the subject of a more splendid empire than a Caesar in his proudest triumphs ever ruled, or a Napoleon in his loftiest flights ever conceived.

Sir, I cling to the hope that these evils may yet be averted. While I would prefer separation to the unity which this bill would create, I would fain hope that we may not be compelled to accept either alternative. If before it is too late the people will see the designs of those now in power, and will replace them with men who do not wish revolution, but do heartily wish a restoration of the Union, men—who will seek by peace the results which war has rendered well-nigh impossible—who will try to attain by conciliation the ends which never can be reached by subjugation—who will seek in consent the foundation of the right of the Government, in States rights the guarantees of the liberty of the citizen—in the Constitution the measure of the power of the Government and the extent of the surrender of perfect freedom imposed by the citizen upon himself—we may hope that we may again have union and liberty; that interest, which alone binds together nations occupying a territory like our own, will assert its power and heal the wounds of war, and bring us again into the bonds of fraternal peace.

But if they will not now see these designs and avert them, however long and bloody and desolating this war, it will end—I predict it now while the thunders of battle ring in our ears and the exultant shouts of victory rise upon the air—in recognition of the confederacy, in final separation, and in a longer, bloodier, and more desolating war on the part of our people—of your constituents, sir, and mine—to throw off the despotism which will ere then have been firmly established over them.

Mr. ASHLEY withdrew the motion to recommend the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I rise for the purpose of moving to perfect the bill by moving as a substitute for it the bill which I hold in my hand. It is substantially the bill under discussion in the House, with two exceptions. First, it excludes what my friend from Ohio [Mr. Cox] objects to—the rule of one tenth, and requires a majority to concur in forming a government. The other softens the operations of the clause excluding officers of the State and confederate rebel governments, by saving merely ministerial officers and the inferior military officers; so that the exclusion merely operates on persons of dangerous political influence. Then, by arrangement with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Stevens,] instead of having a direct vote on his substitute, a portion of it is proposed as a preamble to this bill, which, of course, will be voted on separately, and will take whatever fate the House may assign to it. With these observations I offer this as a substitute, and move the previous question upon it.

The substitute was read.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I wish to appeal to the gentleman from Maryland to withdraw the previous question, that I may offer an amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I cannot yield.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I wish to offer an amendment to strike out the word "white" wherever it occurs in describing the qualifications of voters.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I cannot yield for that or for any other purpose.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. ANCONA. I move that the bill and substitute be laid on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The main question was then ordered, which was on agreeing to the substitute.

The question was taken, and the substitute was adopted.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, called for the yeas and nays on the third reading of the bill.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question recurred on the preamble, as follows:

Whereas the confederate States are a public enemy, waging an unjust war, whose injustice is so glaring that they have no right to claim the mitigation of the extreme rights of war which are accorded by modern usage to an enemy who has a right to consider the war a just one; and whereas none of the States which, by a regularly recorded majority of its citizens, have joined the southern confederacy can be considered and treated as entitled to be represented in Congress, or to take any part in the political government of the Union: Therefore.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move the previous question on the preamble.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The word "so-called" is omitted by mistake in the preamble. I desire to have it inserted.

Mr. ANCONA. I object.

Mr. FARNSWORTH called for the yeas and nays on the preamble.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered. I do it for the purpose of moving to insert in the amendment the words "so-called."

Mr. COX. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to; and the question recurred on ordering the main question.

The main question was not ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend the preamble by inserting the words "so-called" before the words "confederate States," and to insert the same words before the words "southern confederacy" where they occur; and I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The amendment to the preamble was agreed to.

Upon ordering the preamble to be engrossed and read a third time with the bill, on a division there were—yeas 56, noes 39.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

It being now within five minutes of the time fixed by the House for taking a recess,

The SPEAKER stated that unless otherwise ordered in advance the House would take a recess immediately on the vote being announced.

Mr. COX. I move to rescind the order for a recess.

The SPEAKER. That motion would not be in order at this time, while the House is acting under the previous question. Under the practice of the House it would be in order to extend the time for the session of to-day; but a general resolution on this subject, or a general rescinding of the existing resolution, would not be in order while the previous question is operating.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the present session be continued until this bill shall have been disposed of.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I make the question of order that no business can intervene while the House is acting under the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order. It has always been considered a privileged question to extend the time for taking a recess, so as to continue the consideration of any business then pending.

The question being upon the motion of Mr. MORRILL,

Mr. STEVENS demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred on ordering the preamble to be engrossed and read a third time with the bill, on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Bennett, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. So the preamble was rejected.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. GOOCH stated that he had paired with Mr. SWEAT.

Mr. ELDRIDGE stated that Mr. FERNANDO Wood had paired with Mr. COBB.

Mr. McINDOE stated that Mr. COBB had been called home in consequence of sickness in his family.

Mr. ODELL stated that his colleague, Mr. KALBFLEISCH, had been called home on account of a death in his family.

Mr. STEELE, of New York, stated that his colleague, Mr. STEBBINS, was still detained from the House in consequence of sickness.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

The bill was then read a third time.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble was rejected; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. COX demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 73, nays 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Benman, Blow, Boutwell, Broomall, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Elliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Randall, William H. Randall, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Smith, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, and Yeaman—59.

So the bill was passed.

During the call of the roll Mr. STEELE, of New Jersey, stated that his colleague, Mr. ROGERS, was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. HOLMAN stated that his colleague, Mr. HARRINGTON, was absent from the House with leave.

Also, that his colleague, Mr. EDCERTON, was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. STILES stated that his colleague, Mr. MILLER, was paired with Mr. TRACY.

Mr. GRINNELL desired to explain his vote.

Mr. PIKE objected.

Mr. GRINNELL. Then I vote "ay" under protest.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. And I vote "ay" under a very strong protest.

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose I ought to say that I refuse to vote under protest. [Laughter.]

Mr. PIKE stated that Mr. BLAINE was detained from the House by sickness.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The House then took a recess until seven o'clock, p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House, at seven o'clock, p. m., resumed its session.

On motion of Mr. JULIAN the House took a further recess for fifteen minutes.

On reassembling,

The SPEAKER stated the question to be the consideration of House bill No. 276, to secure to persons in the military or naval service of the United States homesteads on confiscated or forfeited estates in insurrectionary districts.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. THAYER, for one week from to-day.

The SPEAKER. Business is not in order.

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker, on the 18th of last March I addressed the House at considerable length on the principles and policy of this bill, and I shall not, therefore, occupy the hour to which I am entitled either in repeating what I then said or in presenting any new facts or arguments. What I wish is that the argument may be taken up by other gentlemen, and carried on to such reasonable length as may enable the House to understand the merits of the bill, and to reach a just conclusion.

I only wish to say now that the bill is unquestionably an important one. The fortunes of this war must inevitably sweep away the title to the great body of the land in the insurrectionary districts. Every day and every hour this rebellion is becoming more and more "a remorseless revolutionary conflict." There is not the slightest probability that either party to this contest will voluntarily take a single step backward, under any conceivable state of facts. The recent massacre at Fort Pillow clearly foreshadows the policy the rebels are to pursue in future, and thus necessitates a policy on our part which shall no longer deal with the rebels as brethren, but as devils. Not only their personal goods and their lives, but the fee simple of their lands must be taken from them. Under existing laws of Congress on the subject of taxation and revenue, millions of acres are passing from the rebels and falling under our control. The question presented by this bill is whether these lands shall be sold to speculators and become the foundation of a stupendous system of serfdom over the poor, white and black, or be parceled out in small homesteads as the reward of the valor of our soldiers and the guarantee of new and regenerated Commonwealths resting upon the basis of free labor and the equal rights of the people. That is the question, and I regard it as a grand one. I hope it will not be overlooked in the din and confusion of the interests and strifes on this floor. I bespeak for it the earnest and early consideration of members of this House, because I fear its magnitude is seen but dimly, or not perceived at all, by many who should give it their zealous support. But I yield the floor to my friend from New York.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask the attention of the House to a few remarks on the bill just reported by the Committee on Public Lands. In my opinion there has been no more important measure offered for our consideration and none better calculated to secure an early, satisfactory, and permanent peace.

For three years we have been engaged in a life and death struggle for the national existence with the slaveholding aristocracy of the South. Any measure that presents any claims that it can shorten that struggle or even lessen its fearful cost without sacrificing the national integrity or honor, and without compromising the loyal friends of the Government in the rebellious States, must command attention.

I concede at once that the military power of the confederates must first of all be broken by our heroic armies under the direction of the Executive of the nation. But does the defeat or even the annihilation of the military forces of the rebels settle the whole question and secure peace? Who will say that if every rebel army should be broken and scattered within a month that the Government could allow its brave defenders to return home to the joys and honors that await them? If Davis and Lee, Johnson and Beauregard, and the other rebel commanders were driven to Mexico or into the Gulf could we straightway disband our Army? Would our heroic friends in Tennessee be secure in their mountain homes? In the States further South, where our friends are much fewer, could they confidently look to their rebel neighbors for security to life and property? And how with the two hundred thousand black men who are laboring and fighting in our armies and whose wives and children we have declared free by law? Can we trust their freedom to the justice and tender mercy of the slaveholders who have robbed their race for generations, and that, too, on principle, impiously proclaiming that God had created them for such base uses?

These interrogatories indicate some of the difficulties that surround this question of pacification; and, sir, I submit that they demand statesmanship as well as generalship. We cannot afford to delay legislative action and trust to military occupation. Military occupation has all the expense of actual war without its glory. We will have no subjugated Poland or Venice as our opponents have predicted, but to avoid this condition, and in order to avoid it, we must make the institutions of the reorganized States homogeneous with those of the free North and break the political and social power of the slaveholding leaders, so that they can no longer endanger the peace of the nation or the lives of the nation's true friends in their midst. If we cannot have indemnity for the past—and, alas! we cannot have—we should at least demand security for the future. And I believe, sir, that there can be no security for a speedy termination of this war and for a lasting and honorable peace other than in these two measures: first, the entire abolishment of chattel slavery by an amendment of the Constitution as provided in that instrument, and second, the division and distribution of the gigantic estates of the rebel leaders among the brave defenders of the Republic.

But it is objected that these measures are radical. I reply the disease is radical, and the cure must go as deep. Mr. Stephens, the vice president of the southern confederacy, in his speech to the people of Georgia in support of the confederate constitution, declared that—"The new constitution has put at rest forever all the agitating questions relating to our peculiar institution—African slavery as it exists among us—the proper status of the negro in our civilization. This was the immediate cause of the late rupture and present revolution."

If slavery, then, was the cause of the rebellion, what remedy more rational than to remove the cause? What would there be left to fight about when the cause of the quarrel was gone? If you mean by radical that these measures are extreme and beyond what public opinion will sustain, I answer that public opinion has kept step to the march of events. Those who felt no sympathy with the popular uprising, those who stood still and aside and let the tide of enthusiastic patriotism sweep by them, know little of the popular heart. The youth who fell asleep leaning against a sapling and on awaking found it grown to a mighty tree was not more surprised than must be the sleepy politician who turns from the small despised anti-slavery party of three years ago to that party to-day gigantic in numbers and determined in purpose.

I grant you that the thousands and hundreds of thousands of Democrats, Whigs, and Republicans who but lately united in the demand for the overthrow of slavery, have no claim with the early advocates to unselfish philanthropy. Anti-slavery with these men is no sentiment, but a stern, practical, selfish fact. They have seen the slave power which they have defended as having rights under the Constitution, which they have yielded to and obeyed in conventions and Congresses, raise the foul standard of rebellion and seek to overthrow the freest Government on earth, in order to build on its ruins an empire of oppression and blood. They have seen this monster slavery grown strong by devouring the children of the black race, now dragging down thousands of their white sons to untimely graves. Seeing and feeling this, they have sworn in their hearts that slavery shall die. I admit it is not sentiment. It is not philanthropy. It is a stern, practical, logical resolve. Slavery shall die that the nation may live. Slavery must die that this carnival of blood may cease.

This wonderful change of opinion is seen where ever we turn our eyes. Three years ago the President elect slipped through Baltimore in the night in disguise to avoid the assassins who were lying in wait for his life. One month ago in the same city of Baltimore the same President was nominated by acclamation for reelection. Less than a year ago a mad and reckless mob, cheered on by Democratic leaders, were hunting down women and children in the city of New York because they were black; only a few weeks since the streets of the same city were filled with an enthusiastic populace cheering a regiment of black men wearing the uniform of the United States and bearing aloft the flag of the country, and at the same time Democratic leaders were announcing in this Hall that slavery was dead. Only a few days since the great doctrine of popular sovereignty was put to a vote on motion of the gentlemen from Kentucky, [Mr. MALLORY,] and received but eighteen votes from the eighty Democrats on this floor. Surely the world moves. The country's progress cannot be measured by weeks and months, but by events. Nations, as individuals, live in deeds, not in years.

New occasions teach new duties. You can no more meet the needs and requirements of the present by the theories and statesmanship of the last Administration than you can thrust the full-grown man back into the garments of the boy. I repeat that public opinion is fully up to the requirements of the hour. It will not allow old prejudices and old theories and old party ties to excuse the neglect of present duty. The charge of radicalism can no longer damn a measure meritorious in itself. And such I believe the one embodied in the bill now before us.

The bill directs that all the lands not included in any city or village that may be forfeited to the United States under the confiscation act or under the act for the collection of taxes in insurrectionary districts or under the act to raise internal revenue shall become and be hereafter treated as a part of the public domain, and that these lands shall be divided into lots of forty and eighty acres and subject to entry by actual settlers under the homestead system, preference being given to the soldiers and sailors who have served their country during the present war.

It will be observed that this is no penal statute. It proposes to take no new or no more lands from these great criminals. Its only purpose is to direct what disposition shall be made of what may be forfeited under acts of Congress already existing, which are the supreme law of the land and which the President is bound by his oath to execute. The constitutionality and propriety of these laws is not now before us. They were thoroughly discussed when before Congress on their passage, and that discussion commended them to the judgment of the law-makers and to the approbation of the people.

The confiscation act, so much denounced and so misrepresented, has but those three provisions, only the last two having any important bearing upon the question before us:

1. It liberates the slaves of masters actually engaged in rebellion against the Government. I name this provision of that act, although it has but little relation to the bill before us, in order that the country may see all the features of what has been represented as such a horrid monster. The country called upon these slaves to cease laboring for their masters and to come into our lines and fight for our cause. Did gentlemen wish, could they ask men to fight our battles with shackles about their limbs?

2. It seizes the property of the absconding rebel on the same principle that our Army takes his horses or his negroes, because they give aid and comfort and support to the enemy. Taking these transfers just so much strength from their side to ours; it weakens them and strengthens us, and this is a right conceded to belligerents by all the writers on the laws of war.

3. It takes the lands of the tried and convicted traitor in payment of the fine which the law imposes where the personal property will not satisfy it. And here let me say that I have heard none of the attorneys for the defendants question the constitutionality or legality of a fine reaching the real estate of the criminal.

In these three provisions lies the whole force of the much-abused and misunderstood confiscation act.

I have heard no question raised as to the constitutionality of the tax and revenue laws that lie back of the bill before us. I believe it is conceded even by gentlemen on the other side of the House that the lands of rebels may be sold for the non-payment of taxes as well as those of loyal men. Large quantities of land are now being sold under the tax and revenue laws, and still larger quantities will soon be sold under the confiscation act; for the amnesty proclamation, while it extends full pardon to the misled, deluded masses, wisely leaves the responsible plotters and leaders of the rebellion to the just penalty of their crimes. These lands are being sold and will continue to be sold, unless this bill is passed, in large tracts, for an insignificant price, to speculators foreign to the State, who will hold them, not for improvement, but for a rise in the market. Thus will spring up a system of non-resident absentee ownership—the worst form of land monopoly that ever cursed and blighted a State. Instead of this, and to avoid it, this bill makes these lands a part of the public domain and offers them to actual settlers under the homestead system, giving preference to the defenders of the country.

All the arguments that have commended the homestead policy to the judgment of statesmen gather around and support this measure. Do you desire in our great trial to widen and strengthen the basis of national credit? Be assured it does not consist in a large expanse of unproductive, unemployed territory held in price above the reach of the honest, industrious poor, but rather in that territory cultivated by happy free labor, teeming with its annual golden harvests, all its resources developed by the enterprise that ownership gives, pouring the united stream of its wealth from its mines and its fields into all the channels of trade. Inert, unproductive landed capital, however large, must soon be exhausted by great expenditures, but if yielding an annual and ever-increasing income growing like charity the more it gives, it becomes an inexhaustible fountain of wealth that can supply all the wants of your Treasury and all the needs of commerce.

It must be remembered that all the property of every citizen is pledged to the payment of the debts of the Government. Every property-holder in the country is an indorser of the national notes. The additional value that labor gives to land by improving and developing its resources forms a part of the national wealth and is just as available for the payment of the nation's debts as was ever any part of the public domain. The Government is the people's agent for high purposes and the people are responsible for its debts. The right of the Government to tax its citizens for its support is unquestioned and is only limited by its necessities. Can any one then believe that an uninhabited wilderness territory is better security for public credit than a State filled with thousands of busy laborers gathering up millions of annual products and pouring them into the lap of the nation? No, sir; the policy of hoarding our public lands or of allowing citizens to monopolize them seems to my judgment shortsighted and vicious. I would rather give them freely to actual settlers who will improve them, believing that while they work for themselves they also work for and enrich the country.

The present situation of the rebellious States presents considerations and arguments that urge the immediate passage of this bill. It could not fail to be a strong weapon in the hands of the Government in this contest. It would strengthen its real friends and weaken its determined, implacable enemies. The enemies of the nation possess wealth, education, gigantic estates, and the prestige of long years of domination. Our friends even among the whites are for the most part poor, landless, and unaccustomed to independent political action; while the negroes, poor and ignorant, are still mentally weak and paralyzed by the effects of servitude. Does any man propose to leave our friends in this condition to the protection of their and our enemies? It would be a breach of plighted faith too horrible and too mean to be thought of—I trust too base to be feared. Certainly neither the President nor his party will ever allow any friends of the Government, however humble, to be placed again under the heel of the oppressor. The President has nobly said that "the promise once made must be kept," and the country has indorsed the pledge. Nor will the manhood of the nation ever tolerate a leader or a party that shall propose to violate it. It would be a disgrace that would crimson the face of every American—"a damned spot" on our national escutcheon that all ocean's waters could never wash out.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that in the central mountain region of the South the situation of our friends does not fall under the general description that I have given. In that section there are fewer of these great landed estates. There, too, the small farmers, the yeomanry of the country, were true to the national cause. They were non-slaveholders, therefore they were loyal. They were small landholders, therefore they were independent of the rebel leaders. This bill will extend the same system to other parts of the South, and with like effects. We have no right to expect that the poor Union men can make a successful struggle with their former masters and leaders for their safety and ours unless we give them a homestead to stand upon. What the loyal men of the South need is self-reliance, education, and a reinforcement of their numbers. This bill will aid them in all these respects.

In the North, where capital is dependent upon labor and labor is honored and respected, the laborer is master of the situation, and is the peer and equal of the employer. In the organization of southern society there was no place for the poor white man. The slaveholder monopolized the soil and the slaves performed the labor. The poor white was a mere hanger-on—a miserable, despised tool of the slave-master. Now, sir, we cannot make these men self-reliant and independent of their former leaders, until we give them a spot of land on which they can plant their feet and call their own.

Again, there can be no such thing as a general education of the people as long as these great estates exist. Any common school system under these circumstances is an impossibility. This fact alone shows the incompatibility of this system of land monopoly with the well-being and safety of republican institutions, and should doom it to immediate annihilation. But the case is still stronger when we reflect that the poor whites and the liberated blacks who are the friends of the Government must, without education, be forever at the mercy of the rebel slaveholding land monopolists, who are its deadly enemies. Pass this bill, and the roadside school-house and the church will spring up in the midst of a population nevermore to be dependent upon the plantation mansion for knowledge and opinions.

But, perhaps more important than all, this bill will reinforce the loyal men of the South, and strengthen them for the present and future contests. Who can doubt if the two or three hundred thousand honorably discharged soldiers now in the North were settled on the forfeited estates in Tennessee, Arkansas, Virginia, and wherever our armies occupy rebellious territory, that they would be a most powerful aid to our cause? They would at once suppress all guerrilla operations, relieve the large force now guarding the long lines of communication, become a militia organization with the discipline of veterans, and in effect form a reserve corps to our Army. Such a population, brave, disciplined, and loyal, would stand as a breakwater, against which any returning tide of rebellion might dash itself in vain. Establish this system, and you make each advance a permanent conquest, and thus fix the inconstancy of fortune. This bill cannot be passed too soon. Delay will only enhance its importance.

After the last rebel army shall have been scattered the provisions of this bill will still be a necessity. In fact, until it is passed I doubt if we can for a long time have any peace that is not maintained by the sword, civil institutions supported by a standing army, a state of affairs always dangerous and not long to be tolerated. But at once reward our returning heroes with generous farms from the forfeited estates of rebels, and the way is clear. We can then reduce our Army without weakening our power. The soldiers, become citizens, will unite with the loyal men of the South whom they have rescued from traitors and tyrants, in building up free and prosperous States not supported by bayonets, but upheld by a loyal population willing and able to defend them. Thus will be laid the foundation of a healthy political Union, exempt from the seeds of disease and dissolution.

The madness of the rebels has given us the opportunity to secure these great results without violating a single letter of our Constitution or a single principle of law or justice. To now neglect the necessary legislation would be one of those political blunders that are said to be worse than crimes. Let us not throw away the golden moment to save our country by planting it on the eternal principles of freedom, and thus link our names to the grandest event of the century.

Mr. Speaker, I trust no one will object to this bill on account of the class of persons to be benefited by it, but rejoice rather at an opportunity to pay in part the great debt which can never be paid in full, the debt that we owe to the soldiers of the Republic. At the call of the country they dropped every implement of labor, abandoned their business, tore themselves from the endearments of home, and rushed to the defense of the nation. Notwithstanding the independent habits of their lives, they patiently submitted to discipline, cheerfully bore all the fatigues of the camp, the field, and the march; and, fired by love of country and devotion to a great principle, they hastened to "the feast of death" as to a banquet. They have steadily driven the enemy back, and now hold two thirds of his territory, and will surely destroy the last vestige of the rebellion and bring the great criminals to the feet of the Government. What reward do they deserve, or rather what do they not deserve? Can we do less than give them the richest portion of the lands which they have conquered from our traitorous enemies, and which have been forfeited to the Government?

Mr. Speaker, I trust we may expect support from some, at least, of the gentlemen on the other side of the House. Those who have professed a willingness and even an anxiety to increase the monthly wages of the soldier, will also, I hope, be ready to give him this handsome reward at the close of his term of service. Those who have more sympathy for rebels and the children of rebels than they have for our brave soldiers and their families, will, I expect, oppose this bill. But there are gentlemen on that side of the House who claim to be the friends of the soldier. I will not doubt their sincerity, and I therefore count and I have a right to count upon their support.

The bill itself is right. The safety and peace of the future require it. Justice to our living heroes demands it. The memory of the gallant dead pleads for it. Do not leave the battle-fields of the war to the mercy and in the possession of the insolent foe, but give them to the surviving heroes, who will cherish and defend the graves of their fallen comrades, and rear to their memory and to their patriotism the noblest of all monuments, free and prosperous States.

Mr. Speaker, I have supported this measure because I believe it calculated to secure an early and permanent peace. No man is more anxious than myself to see the time when our gallant soldiers can lay down their arms with honor and safety to the Republic. I desire a peace that shall not leave the Union torn into hostile, discordant, insignificant fragments, powerless for good, the mere puppets and playthings of European diplomats and tyrants, but a peace that shall see my country a united, free, and mighty nation; its integrity restored, its authority, everywhere within its limits, acknowledged, its flag unsullied, honored, and respected throughout the world, a protection to our friends and a terror to our foes.

"God give us peace; not such as lulls to sleep,
But sword on thigh and brow with purpose knit,
And may our ship of State to harbor sweep,
Her ports all up, her battle lanterns lit,
And her leashed thunders gathering for their leap."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, a few years ago the eloquent Rufus Choate, standing in Faneuil Hall in the city of Boston, thrilled the ear of this nation with the startling and ominous declaration, "We are in the midst of a revolution, bloodless as yet." With the eye of a calm, dispassionate thinker, tracing effect to cause, he saw the coming storm; he heard the distant roar of the dashing waves of revolution in the wild, rhapsodic declamation of Wendell Phillips and Fred Douglass; in the bold, polished eloquence of Senator Sumner and Secretary Chase. To-day, standing in my place in this Hall, surrounded by the Representatives of the people, I declare we are now in the midst of a revolution bloody and terrible.

For three years the horrors of civil war have overshadowed our land like a dark pall. Under the various calls and conscriptions of the President from April 16, 1861, to February 1, 1864, two million and forty thousand men have been demanded to fill our armies. The angel of death sits in horrid triumph upon battle-fields, and new-made graves, and deserted hearth-stones, and empty chairs, and sorrowing, weeping hearts. Our beautiful heritage presents one vast Golgotha. A national debt beyond human computation has arisen, to pay which the sinews of labor, for long generations to come, must be strung to their highest tension.

Mr. Speaker, by all the solemnities of this hour, I demand to know why are these things so? Every effect has its producing cause; and these terrible calamities that have overtaken us as a nation must be the result of some terrible wrong done or derangement existing in the workings of our social and political systems. As wise men, does it not behoove us to stop, examine, and inquire?

History tells us, Mr. Speaker, it likewise told the fathers who framed our admirable Constitution, that the "supreme power" in a Government, under all forms, in all countries, and in all ages, had never failed to overleap all barriers and restraints of human contrivance, and to become oppressive. Hence the many revolutions, the many bloody battle-fields, that mark the line of this world's history. Many of those men who framed our Constitution, including the noble Washington, were themselves just from the gory battle-fields of our revolutionary struggle, where for seven years they had fought, not to wrest new privileges from the British Crown, but, in the language of their own immortal Declaration, because "the history of the King of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations." Hence, to meet that very difficulty, to restrain that "supreme power" of a Government, to compel it to move within its appropriate sphere, and to secure to them the rights for which "Governments are instituted among men," our fathers formed two equal and coordinate governments, to wit, our State and Federal, each equally supreme in its authority and jurisdiction within its appropriate sphere of action, and each a complete check upon the other. And over all they ordained a Constitution, not speculative or rhetorical, but moral and practical; a thing for use and the regulation of affairs. They proclaimed it the "supreme law of the land," the criterion of all subordinate legislation, of all official conduct, and of the civil obligations and morality of every citizen of every State.

Each of these two governments is operative in the several States; but each government has its distinct, well-defined sphere of action. The powers appertaining to these two several governments are delegated powers. But while one of these governments is invested with certain specified powers, the other is just as completely and certainly divested of those same powers. Each of these governments is supreme and paramount within the sphere of its defined powers, and within its appointed sphere neither can be subordinate to the other. This doctrine of the sovereignty and independence of the several States within their appropriate sphere as coordinate powers in the General Government is in perfect harmony with the philosophy and principles upon which our system of Government was constituted, to wit, a division of political power, with a view to checks and safeguards against abuse, by the mutual action and reaction of the various departments upon each other.

And how beautifully and harmoniously our system of government has worked, without a jar or a discordant note, under its different political administrations, until the sectional movement of 1856 was consummated in 1860 by the election of a sectional President for a sectional end, and in obedience to fanatical ideas! From that hour peace has forsaken our heritage and sorrow crowds our borders.

President Lincoln, as he journeyed to this capital in the spring of 1861, declared, in one of those remarkable speeches by the way, that "the States occupy the same relation to the General Government that the counties do to a State." Scarcely had the inauguration oath dried upon his lips until he announced to a stricken and terrified people that "the States of this Union are but the creatures of the General Government." State rights, under the Constitution, for the first time in our national history, were then denied. The distinguished gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] a leading light and teacher of this new doctrine of "reconstruction," like a bold innovator, declares in a speech delivered in New York that "State sovereignty is national wrong." The President's proconsul in the State of Louisiana, General Banks, as the representative of the Federal Government, in a proclamation addressed to the loyal people of that State, at once gives form and fact to the theory of the President, by announcing that "the fundamental law of the State is martial law; that so much of the constitution and laws of Louisiana as recognize, regulate, and relate to slavery, being inconsistent with the present condition of public affairs, are inoperative and void." The President, under date of January 20, 1864, in his order to General Steele proconsul in the State of Arkansas, declares certain portions of the constitution of that State null and void, and directs the Legislature, when assembled, what laws they shall pass. And the proconsul of Tennessee, Andrew Johnson, announces to the people of that province that "the people of the United States made the Constitution;" and from that premise argues that whatever the people of the United States, in their collective capacity, want at any time must be accorded, no matter what reserved rights or institutions of a State or States might thereby be affected. And a leading Senator in Congress, [Mr. SUMNER,] who deserves the name and position of Sir Oracle to this Administration, not to be outdone in innovation, declares that "whatsoever powers are not prohibited in the Constitution, the Federal Government has the right to exercise." And in his celebrated Atlantic Monthly magazine article he relieves his pent-up indignation by referring to "the miserable pretension of State sovereignty," and the "pestilent pretension of State rights." And the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BALDWIN] entitled the speech which he delivered in this Hall, some weeks ago, "State sovereignty and treason," as if they were convertible terms. And now we have a proclamation of amnesty from the President, in which he sets forth the doctrine of reconstruction of States: that those States hereafter reconstructed may or may not hold the boundaries or the name of the States destroyed; that, by command of the President, the whole population of certain States are stripped of all political rights until they are purged and restored to their political status by the President.

By this new doctrine of our national construction the beautiful system of governmental checks is destroyed, and the reserved "independence and sovereignty of the States" is broken down, and that beautiful constellation of sovereignties, each in its orbit, that for eighty years have kept the centripetal and centrifugal path around the Constitution are thrown into anarchy and confusion, and State now clashes against State in wild confusion, and tending to utter ruin. And the President, by virtue of this usurped power, from the first day he came into office, clothed himself with all the powers of a Roman dictator, calling around him an army of a million men, surrounding his royal person and his mansion with a military guard, conscripted the unwilling citizen into his armies, suspended the writ of right, crowded the dungeons of prisons and the casemates of forts with unoffending citizens, banished shrieking women from their families and homes, issued rescripts to his proconsuls, scattered throughout the thirty-four provinces, or "creatures" of his empire. The constitutions of States are but baubles with which this master plays; the lives and liberties and rights and happiness and hopes of the people are subjects of his jest, with which he whiles away the tedium of the hours; the groans and cries and plaintive wails of a sorrowing, seathed, and peeled people, the clash and shock of battle, the roar of thundering armaments upon sea and land, are but music to his ear, for they tell the extent of his dominions and are the evidence of the measure of his power.

Against such a doctrine, so pregnant of mischief, before this august assembly of the Representatives of States, in my place, I enter my most solemn protest. True, sir, amid the throes and convulsions, the lashings and surges of this terrible revolution, my voice may not be heard; or, if heard, may not be heeded by those who riot in this carnival of blood and sorrow. Nevertheless, true to the promptings of duty, I will throw my voice of condemnation and rebuke into this great whispering gallery of the nation, that, perchance, as its echoes are borne away amid the hamlets of a sorrowing people, it may fall upon the ear of some listening Hampden, some waiting Sidney, some suffering Tell, some panting Curran, some hopeful Washington.

This new doctrine of our national construction is a fearful assumption of unwarranted power—an awful stride toward a centralized Government. It forces at once upon us, as well as upon the country, the momentous question, is our Government a national Government, and the States but mere provinces thereof, or is it a Federal Government, a Government of a community of independent and sovereign States, united by a compact or agreement?

The inquiry demands the calm and earnest investigation of every man in the nation. If this claim of national power made by the President and his party is true, then the sovereignty and reserved rights of my noble State of Ohio are stricken down, and your State as well, Mr. Speaker, and the State of every Representative upon this floor. Then these mighty States, instead of being, in the language of Jefferson, co-ordinate branches of the Government, of equal order, of the same rank or degree, become dependencies, mere corporations for purposes of taxation and conscription.

Let us descend to first principles, and like earnest inquirers ask what is a national Government? I answer, it is a Government of the people of a single nation, exercising complete and perfect supremacy over all persons and things within its boundaries that can be made the lawful objects of government. What is a Federal Government? It is a Government of a community of independent and sovereign States, united by a compact or agreement. Is ours a national or a Federal Government?

At the time of the formation of this Government there were men who feared that the Federal Government might, by usurpation, destroy the independent sovereignty of the several States; a fear which has culminated in our day to a sad reality. To dispel such fears and remove such opposition to the ratification of the new Constitution, just submitted to the people of the States, Mr. Madison, one of the fathers not only of the Constitution but of the Federal Government, published the following article, explanatory of the rights of the States under the new Federal Government. I quote from the thirty-ninth number of the Federalist:

"The idea of a national Government involves in it not only an authority over the individual citizen, but an indefinite supremacy over all persons and things, so far as they are objects of lawful government. Among a people consolidated into one nation this supremacy is completely vested in the national Legislature. Among communities united for particular purposes it is vested partly in the general and partly in the municipal Legislatures. In the former case all local authorities are subordinate to the supreme, and may be controlled, directed, or abolished by it at pleasure. In the latter, the local or municipal authorities form distinct and independent portions of the supremacy, no more subject within their respective spheres to the general authority than the general authority is subject to them within its own sphere.

"In this relation, then, the proposed Government cannot be deemed a national one, since its jurisdiction extends to certain enumerated objects only, and leaves to the several States a residuary and inviolable sovereignty over all other objects."

This clear, distinct, and emphatic announcement of the construction, powers, and jurisdiction of our Federal Government, should be to every candid and honest mind conclusive, unless the question is raised as to whether Mr. Madison understood the operations of the Government he so earnestly labored to create.

The thirteen original colonies, or States, that formed our present Union were at the time of the formation of that Union; and for a time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, sovereign and independent States, save the allegiance they severally owed to the British Crown. In the year 1778, when oppressed by British tyranny, the thirteen colonies, or States, entered into a compact, known and designated as a Confederation, and adopted "Articles of Confederation," explanatory of the objects and purposes, and limiting the powers of the Confederation.

The first and second sections of those "Articles of Confederation" read thus:

"ART. 1. The style of this Confederacy shall be, The United States of America.

"ART. 2. Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right which is not by this Confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled."

Now, Mr. Speaker, have we not all been taught by men in every school of politics that the Confederacy was not a national Government, but a simple compact or league between sovereign and independent States for the purposes as expressed in the third article, in these words:

"The said States hereby severally enter into a firm league of friendship with each other, for their common defense, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare."

But that long admitted and unquestioned fact is now distorted into an argument by the friends of this Administration by which to justify the shameful usurpations of power, and the iron reign of despotism over sovereign States and citizens now exercised by the General Government. These apologists for despotism and national wrong tell us, true, the Articles of Confederation tied the hands of the General Government and exalted the sovereignty and independence of the States, and thereby proved a failure; and to remedy this defect the present Constitution was formed, whereby the powers of the Federal Government were expanded and increased, and the sovereignty and powers of the States diminished, and rendered subservient to that of the national Government; that in the adoption of the Constitution of the United States the people of each State surrendered and transferred their local sovereignty and rights to the people of all the States in the aggregate; and that then and thereby the people of all the States of the Union became consolidated into one single community or national Government.

Such is the argument of these apologists of lawless, shameful tyranny.

But, Mr. Speaker, the history of our present Federal Constitution tells us a different story. It tells us that the Convention which framed that Constitution was convoked, not by any act or authority of the people of the several States in mass, but by a resolution of the Confederate Congress. And it was called, not for the purpose of establishing a national Government, and the surrendering of the sovereignty of the people of each State to that national Government, as is now claimed, but, in the very language of the resolution itself of the Congress of the Confederation calling that Convention, it was—

"For the sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation, and reporting to Congress and the several State Legislatures such alterations and provisions therein as shall render the Federal Constitution adequate to the exigencies of the Government and the preservation of the Union."

Thus the objects and purposes of the Convention thus called were clearly defined; and with those distinct objects in view, delegates to that Convention were appointed, not by the people of the States in the aggregate, but by the Legislatures of the several States. In the Convention which framed the Constitution of the United States the delegates voted by States, each State casting one vote, and after its formation was submitted for ratification to the several States, and was approved, not by the vote of the mass of the people of the United States, but by each State acting separately thereon for itself, as an independent sovereignty. In all this there was no dwarfing of the rights of the citizen and the sovereignty of the States into a great national Government.

Am I correct? Let us appeal to Mr. Madison again, in the same number of the Federalist from which I have already quoted, in which he appeals to the people to ratify the Constitution submitted to the States:

"This assent and ratification is to be given by the people, not as individuals composing one entire nation, but as composing the distinct and independent States to which they respectively belong. It is to be the assent and ratification of the several States. The act, therefore, establishing the Constitution will not be a national but a Federal act."

And further on he says:

"Each State, in ratifying the Constitution, is considered as a sovereign body, independent of all others, and only to be bound by its own voluntary act. In this relation, then, the new Constitution will, if established, be a Federal and not a national Constitution."

The present Federal Constitution, therefore, was ordained and established not by the whole people of the United States, collectively or in mass, as a distinct community, but by the several States, the people of each acting in the name and by the authority of their State, as a distinct, sovereign, independent people, and that the Constitution thus formed was a mere continuation of the same Union, and a mere revision or remodeling of the Articles of Confederation, wherein the several States had expressly stipulated that the condition of their union was, that "each State retain its sovereignty, freedom, and independence."

The preamble to the Constitution declares that it was ordained and established "for the United States of America." What, then, are "the United States of America" but the several States united by a compact or agreement of limited and expressly defined powers? And what was the object for which these States were thus united? To destroy and abolish the States, as independent and sovereign communities, and establish a great national Government for the American people collectively? If so, would not so great a change in the political status of a people ever jealous of their rights and watchful of every encroachment of governmental power have been made clearly manifest by provisions leaving no grounds for doubt? Think you that a stern and stalwart people, who could fight and battle for seven long years rather than pay a tax without representation, which was the evidence of their nationality and sovereignty as a people, would merge their identity in the new Government under the Constitution if the same was not to be a continuation of "the United States of America," under the Articles of Confederation, which provided that "each State retain its sovereignty, freedom, and independence?"

But that object is announced in the Constitution itself in the words "to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." "To form a more perfect Union," thus recognizing the existing Union under the Articles of Confederation, and simply proposing to render it "more perfect." What Union is here referred to? Surely nothing more nor nothing else than the Union between the independent and sovereign States already existing. Then the object sought to be accomplished by a substitution of the Constitution of the United States for that of the Articles of Confederation was to perfect their union as distinct and sovereign communities, to establish justice among the States, to insure their domestic tranquillity, to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the States, and to secure the blessings of liberty to them and their posterity as the people of several distinct communities.

In all this the Federal character of this Government is explicitly declared as distinguished from a consolidated national Government of people; and there is nothing which amounts to anything like a surrender of State sovereignty by the people of the States, and a transfer of it to the whole people of the States collectively as a distinct community or consolidated nation of people.

If then I am correct—and as to that I submit to the judgment of candid men—it must be apparent that the Government of the United States was ordained and established by sovereign and independent States, with powers limited and well defined, derived from the States, and is therefore, mutatis mutandis, the "creature" of the several States, and not the States "the creature of the General Government," as announced by the President.

A State government is a government of a community of people. The Federal Government of the United States is a Government of a community of States. Such was the beautiful system of government formed by our revolutionary fathers, and now so ruthlessly attempted to be destroyed by furious Jacobins. Thomas Jefferson, in writing to his friend Destutt De Tracy, said:

"The true barriers of our liberties in this country are STATE GOVERNMENTS; and the wisest conservative power ever devised by man is that of which our Revolution and present Government found us possessed."

"The republican Government of France was lost without a struggle, because the party of 'one and indivisible' prevailed."

If one of our States can, upon its whim, nullify a law or set aside the Constitution of the United States, that would destroy the independence of the Federal Government as an equal and co-ordinate power with that of the States. So, if the Federal Government can abrogate in whole or in part the constitution of a State, or disregard the "reserved rights" of a State, as is now done by the President and his proconsuls, that would destroy the independence of the States as a co-ordinate power of the Government, and would inaugurate the party of "one and indivisible," which Mr. Jefferson said destroyed the republican Government of France. It would, in a word, be the consummation of the worst fears entertained by the fathers in the formation of our Government and Constitution.

It may not, Mr. Speaker, be wholly unprofitable for us all to go back to the earlier days of the Republic, and talk with those sincere and noble men who walked with Washington and Jefferson and Franklin and Hamilton and Madison and Lee and Henry; to examine the history of the formation of this very Government; the fears, the doubts, the wishes and hopes of those "holy men of old," as they laid the foundations, and reared the structure of this great governmental fabric of ours. And as we wander among their early works, and listen to their instructive teachings, I pray you mark well how sedulously they labored to guard the rights of the States, how they feared that in time that simple Federal Government, with a few, very few, limited and well defined powers, might become an immense, colossal, consolidated Government, absorbing and swallowing up the "sovereignty, freedom, and independence" of the several States. How careful they were to stipulate, "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

When the Convention, over which General Washington himself presided, had agreed upon a Constitution, it was sent to the different States to be considered by them, and, if approved, to be ratified.

New Hampshire ratified the Constitution by a majority of eleven votes in a convention of one hundred and three, and even this meager majority was not obtained until amendments were proposed calculated to quiet the fears of the people against an undue administration of the Federal Government.

Massachusetts called a convention of her people "to ratify an explicit and solemn compact." The contest in that convention was long and animated upon the probable consolidation of the Federal Government and the eventual swallowing up of the local governments. In a convention, composed of three hundred and fifty-five members, the new Constitution received a majority of but nineteen votes.

Rhode Island refused to participate in the Convention that framed the Constitution, and did not join the new Federal Government until after the other States had ratified the Constitution, and Congress had assembled under it.

Connecticut, being a small State, was exceedingly jealous for her State sovereignty; and that the smaller States should not be swallowed up in the new Government she insisted that each State, without regard to size, should have an equal representation in the United States Senate. Said Mr. Ellsworth, "These small States must possess the power of self-defense." Said Roger Sherman, "The Government of the United States is Federal, and instituted by a number of sovereign States." Said another member of her convention, while insisting upon the sovereignty of the States, "The structure of the Federal Government rests like a most magnificent bridge built on strong and stately pillars, and these pillars could not be destroyed without the consequent destruction of the superstructure."

New York. If you will examine the draft of the Constitution you will find that the same is signed by but one delegate from the State of New York, to wit, Alexander Hamilton. New York was represented in the Convention by two other delegates, to wit, Robert Yates and John Lansing. But these two colleagues of Alexander Hamilton retired from the Convention long before the conclusion of its labors, under the solemn apprehension that the proposed plan of Government would end in consolidation. Alexander Hamilton, as we all know, was a friend of a strong Government, and in the Convention proposed a plan of Government; yet in the Convention, and before the people of New York, he persistently denied that he ever intended the abolition of the State governments. So severe was the contest in New York, that in a convention of fifty-five members the Constitution was ratified only by a majority of five.

New Jersey ratified the Constitution by a unanimous vote, assured that State equality and State sovereignty were fully recognized by the equal representation of the States in the United States Senate.

Pennsylvania ratified the Constitution after a warm and severe contest. Her jealous statesmen could see nothing but consolidation in the new Government. The very preamble to the Constitution was cited in evidence of an intended consolidation of the States, in the expression, "We, the people of the United States." But this doubt was dispelled by an appeal to the people by a member of the Convention in which he said:

"Though the Federal Convention proposed that it should be the act of the people, yet it is to be done in their capacities as citizens of the several States of our Confederacy, who are declared to be the people of the United States."

It was further insisted, by way of allaying the fears of the people, that the new Government would end in a consolidation, that the Constitution reserved to the States the appointment of all officers of the militia and the training of the same, by means of which the States would have a powerful military support, wherein no citizen of another State could hold any position. Notwithstanding all this, one third of their convention voted against the ratification of the Constitution, and even issued an address to the people setting forth their apprehensions that the Federal Government would assume colossal strength, and eventually destroy the rights and liberties of the people of the States.

Delaware ratified the Constitution with unanimity, being pleased that she was put on an equality, as a State, with the great States of New York and Virginia.

Maryland ratified the Constitution, but with the understanding that amendments would be made thereto. Resolutions were introduced into the State convention expressive of the sentiments of the convention against a consolidated Government, against the abrogation of State constitutions and bills of right.

Virginia, within whose borders lived the very fathers of the Constitution—Washington and Madison—ratified the Constitution by a mere majority of five. They earnestly desired a Federal Government; but they trembled lest they might thereby put in jeopardy the rights of her people as citizens of a sovereign State. She dreaded a consolidated Government. Patrick Henry exclaimed, "The Constitution has an awful squinting toward monarchy." It required the wisdom and argument of her best men to persuade her people that under the Federal Government the reserved rights of the States were fully guaranteed in the new Constitution.

North Carolina, in a convention of two hundred and sixty-eight members, refused to ratify the Constitution by a majority of one hundred until amendments were actually made securing to the State all the sovereign rights she had, except such as were expressly delegated.

South Carolina ratified the Constitution by a vote of one hundred and forty-nine to seventy-three. But to that ratification she appended this solemn proviso:

"That no section or paragraph of the said Constitution warrants a construction that the States do not retain every power not expressly relinquished by them and vested in the General Government of the Union."

Georgia ratified the Constitution with unanimity.

And thus, Mr. Speaker, our beautiful Constitution and inimitable form of Government were launched in the full assurance and well-grounded hope that the sovereignty of the States and the liberties of the people were preserved for all coming time.

For eighty years, under this idea of the construction and working of our Government, we have lived and prospered; for eighty years the Puritans of New England, the Hollanders of New York, the Quakers of Pennsylvania, the Swedes of New Jersey, the Cavaliers of Virginia, the Huguenots of South Carolina, have lived together as one people; for eighty years men of all nations, languages, and climes have enjoyed here a freedom of thought, of speech, of worship, of action, that have carried us to the very acme of civilization, territorial expansion, and national happiness; for eighty years these States, leaving to each one unrestrained liberty to grow and develop itself after its own plan, to follow such track of progress and civilization as its climate, soil, productions, character of its race and people might render expedient, have kept the march of empire; for eighty years, as a nation, we have happily developed the great governmental idea of "diversity in unity," in religiously reserving to each State, as provided by the Constitution, perfect freedom for all domestic institutions and purposes, and relieving the central Government of all control or responsibility over their internal progress or affairs.

But a change came over the spirit of the people. On the 4th day of March, 1861, for the first time since the organization of our Government, a new party, the Republican party, a party pregnant of mischief, crept into power, howling as they came that our well-developed idea of "diversity in unity" was a mistake; that States constituted as ours were, part slave and part free, could not so exist; that instead of being a "diversity in unity" they were antagonisms, and one must destroy the other. That party came into power mad with hopes long deferred. Its President was elected upon a platform annulling the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and setting at defiance the highest judicial arbitrament of the land; and the first official announcement made by the President to the people was, that he would make the platform of his party the rule of his action. Thus was announced to the people of the country that not the Constitution, but the will of the Republican party, as inscribed upon their platform, should be the law of all the States. They came into power determined to crush out and trample down all personal and State rights, no matter how sacred or time-honored, that should stand in the way of their desires. Reckless, lawless, anarchical, revolutionary, fanatical, filled with the mania of one idea, and blind to all else, they have driven the Government crashing through all the checks which were intended to regulate and guide it, until already we are cowering upon the abyss of a common ruin. A party that entertains no reverence for Constitution, heedless whether the Republic stand or fall, welcoming dissolution of the Union, welcoming war, havoc, and desolation, if only slavery is put down and their unholy ambition gratified.

When that miserable old wretch, John Brown, inaugurated an invasion of the State of Virginia, seized the United States Government armory at Harper's Ferry, put pikes into the hands of ignorant and inflamed negroes, and commenced the indiscriminate murder of helpless women and children and unarmed men, and while the whole land rang with one bitter curse against the inhuman fiend as he expiated his nameless enormities upon the gallows, you might have heard the voice of my colleague from the Cleveland district, [Mr. SPALDING,] on that day in Melodeon Hall, in the city of Cleveland, exclaiming:

"I claim John Brown as a hero, true to his conscience and true to his God. We have met to honor him for his faithfulness to his convictions of duty and his principles. We have met to honor those principles and the cause in which he died."

Senator WILSON, of Massachusetts, in a speech at Syracuse, New York, in 1859, said:

"I tell you, fellow-citizens, the Harper's Ferry outbreak was the legitimate consequence of the teachings of the Republican party."

John Brough, the present Republican Governor of Ohio, in a speech during the political canvass last summer, said:

"Slavery must be put down, rooted out, if every wife has to be made a widow and every child to be made fatherless."

Said I not truly, that this Republican party entertains no reverence for the Constitution, welcoming war, havoc, and desolation, if only slavery is put down, and their unholy ambition gratified?

In further confirmation of this, let me call the attention of this House and of the country to a pronunciamento of the Republican party, published some time ago in the New York Times, the leading organ of this Administration; and I desire you to observe with what strict, unflinching minutia its reckless, lawless, revolutionary behests have been executed over the entire loyal States of the Union:

"The Government at Washington will need all the unity and efficiency contemplated in recent proclamations. It will require a million men and proportional supplies. Martial law over the entire North is a national necessity. If the Governors of the northern States manifest a factious spirit the provost marshals will have the power to keep them in order. If State Legislatures should undertake to interfere with the action of the General Government necessary to the prosecution of the war they will come under the action of martial law. And if the action of any political party shall threaten to change or paralyze the movements of the Government it will doubtless be competent for the provost marshal in any State to suspend political meetings and postpone elections. If the Constitution of the United States is to be construed according to the necessities of a civil war of vast proportions the constitutions of individual States cannot be allowed to stand in the way of its vigorous prosecution."

"They tell us that the President cannot do this or that; that his proclamations are only waste paper. They appear to have very little idea what the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States can do. A man of firm and resolute will, with a million men in arms to support him, can do pretty much what he pleases. They have to learn that paper constitutions, however convenient they may be, can be amended when necessary, suspended, or laid aside altogether; and that it is no longer a question what this or that Constitution authorizes, but what is necessary to be done to make thirty-four States and a vast territory one Nation."

Mr. Speaker, did I not truly say that this party in power is determined to make its will the law of all the States, despite our constitutions? The President has long since assumed the memorable declaration of Louis XIV of France: "The State—I am the State!" And when the Democracy demands by what clause of the Constitution, the answer is that of the Roman slave mistress, Stet pro ratione voluntas. The President, in effect, has told the people of the country, "The thing which I will is absolutely the best thing for the Republic; and all those who dare to place obstacles in the way of my will are evidently and unquestionably the enemies of the Government." And this new doctrine of power is thundered in the Senate; is repeated in this Hall; is made the test of "loyalty" in those miserable dens of Jacobins that now spot our land, called "Loyal Leagues;" and the special organ of the President in this capital, whose editor holds high position to-day in the American Senate, not to be outdone in "loyal" subservience to him who wears the purple, exclaims, "The President is the instrument of God!"

And now, in presence of this "instrument of God," laws must be silent, constitutions must place no check upon executive authority. Stand still, you Representatives of the people! Stand still, my countrymen, and see "a man of firm and resolute will, with a million men in arms to support him, do pretty much what he pleases." See him violate our ancient right of freedom of speech by arresting and imprisoning citizens for utterances of sentiments which he deemed distasteful. See him violate the freedom of the press by suppression of newspapers all over the country. See him violate those great immunities of freemen, security from arrest when no crime is charged, and from unlawful search and seizure. See him violate the great constitutional right of the citizen to a trial by jury. See him suspend the writ of habeas corpus. See him abrogate the rights of property of the citizen, loyal and rebel alike, by mere proclamations. See him violate the freedom of religious worship by dispersing congregations with files of armed soldiers and sending ministers into exile. See him violate our old prerogative, to worship God according to the dictates of our own conscience, by establishing a system of adoration, by placing churches under the care of military commanders with authority to depose ministers whose theological tenets do not meet the approbation of the War Department. See him, by means of his infamous conscription laws, break down the last muniment of State protection in the constitutional right of the State authorities to call out and drill the militia, and, when called into the service of the United States, to appoint the officers who shall command them. See how completely he has destroyed the hitherto unquestioned right of the people to elect their representatives, both State and Federal, by interposing military orders, test oaths, and military guards around election precincts, and thus coercing the election of Governors and Representatives in Congress friendly to the President and his policy, as was done in Kentucky, Delaware, and Maryland.

And while every honest head should be bowed in shame and sorrow that these things are so, a leading organ of the Administration, in justification, exclaims:

"We do not find fault with the machinery used to carry Maryland and Delaware. Having nearly lost the control of the House by its blunders in the conduct of the war from March, 1861, to the fall of 1862, the Administration owed it to the country to recover that control somehow. To recover it regularly was impossible; so irregularity had to be resorted to. Popular institutions will not suffer, for the copperhead element will have a much larger number of members in both branches than it is entitled to by its popular vote. Ohio, with its ninety thousand Republican majority, will be represented by five Republicans and a dozen or more copperheads. It is fitting that this misrepresentation of popular sentiment in the great State of the West should be offset, if necessary, by a loyal delegation from Maryland and Delaware, won even at the expense of military interference. If laws are silent amid the clang of arms, we must take care that the aggregate public opinion of the country obtains recognition somehow or other."

Where are we tending? Where now is the old regime of the fathers? If the "control of the House" must be "somehow" secured, and if President Lincoln, as announced in the court journal, is the "instrument of God," how long may it not be, Mr. Speaker, before some Cromwell, with military cohort, may stand in that door and ring in your astounded ears, as once it did in that of a British Parliament, "Avaunt! the Lord hath no further need of your services?" Yonder in the vista, upon the historic page, stands the angry Cromwell, who claimed to be the "instrument of God," with flashing sword in hand, exclaiming, "Sir Harry Vane! Sir Harry Vane! the Lord deliver me from Sir Harry Vane!" And here is its counterpart. Before our eyes, on yesterday in time, we saw our angry President stand, "with a million men in arms to support him," exclaiming, "Vallandigham! Vallandigham! the Lord deliver me from Vallandigham!"

I declare, advisedly, that if this system of usurpation of the rights of the States, and this rule of despotism over the people is to be continued, then the object for which the Federal Government was constituted, "to promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity," fails, and the General Government becomes a curse, and not a blessing. Holy God, grant a speedy return of the day when the Constitution shall again "be the supreme law of the land;" when our noble Army of veteran soldiers shall again return from battle-fields to peaceful, happy homes; when the brazen gates of Janus shall be closed; when these chairs around me, that for three long, sad years have been empty, shall again be occupied by intelligent and patriotic Representatives; when these beautiful escutcheons of thirty-four States, that now look down so sadly from these vaulted ceilings, shall once again behold assembled here the representatives of a reunited confederation of free, happy, and independent States.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Speaker, we are still in the midst of war. More than three years ago the people of eleven States of this Union, in their organized capacity as States, by their representatives selected for that purpose, confederated together, adopted a form of government independent of the Government to which they owed allegiance, and levied war upon the Union which had so long protected them in the full enjoyment of every right under the Constitution. This war, begun confessedly without cause, has been prosecuted on their part with a despotic cruelty and implacable vindictiveness without precedent in the annals of civilized warfare.

The despotic chieftain who rules at Richmond shrinks from no act that in his judgment tends to perpetuate his power, either in the treatment of his subjects or in his conduct toward the Government against which the war is prosecuted.

Although the conflict has waged with varied fortune from the beginning, yet a survey of the situation to-day clearly indicates that we have made substantial progress toward the reestablishment of the power of the Government over the revolted States. We all indulge the hope that the invincible hero with his brave men now about to move on the enemy's works will achieve success. We must not deceive ourselves, however, by resting in the belief that the enemy is substantially overthrown; his armed legions will still confront us; many battles are yet to be lost and won before his military power is destroyed. That power destroyed, the enemy is not conquered.

"Who overcomes"

By force hath overcome but half his foe."

"Our better part remains to win in close Design what force effected not."

"The unconquerable will and study of revenge, immortal hate, and courage never to submit or yield," must be subdued by wise legislative action, by firm administration, and by unwavering fidelity to the great principles of republican liberty. The cause of all our woe must be eradicated. We must not be led astray by the siren song recently echoed on this floor, that abolition is "a thing accomplished," that slavery is dead. But we must annihilate it forever, and see that it has no resurrection. This duty primarily belongs to the Congress of the United States. We fail in the discharge of our whole duty if we do not adopt every measure that will bring about this consummation. Every measure of Congress, and every act of the Executive looking to the suppression of the rebellion and the destruction of this diabolism that produced it, although vehemently assailed on the stump, through the press, and in these Halls, has been triumphantly sustained after full and free discussion by the people of this country. The loyal people who have sacrificed so much, and who are ready for still greater sacrifices, demand of us and of the Executive that these necessary measures shall be carried to their legitimate and proper result. They demand that we shall so triumph over the rebellion that the cause which led to it and which has been its chief support shall with it be destroyed forever. They demand that free republican institutions, with all their attendant blessings, shall be established in all the territory reclaimed by our armies from the usurpation that now holds it.

I have listened with interest to the discussion in this House as to the relations of the so-called "confederate States" to the Government of the United States. It seems to me, however, that this question is to us res adjudicata. It has been settled by executive proclamation, by congressional action, and by judicial determination. Our authority over the revolted States, and the rights to which they are entitled, have been clearly defined and fixed by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the prize cases reported in 2 Black, page 635, et seq. The court, in stating the nature of the revolt, says:

"That in organizing this rebellion they have acted as States, claiming to be sovereign over all persons and property within their respective limits, and asserting a right to absolve their citizens from their allegiance to the Federal Government. Several of these States have combined to form a new confederacy claiming to be acknowledged by the world as a sovereign State. Their right to do so is now being decided by wager of battle. The ports and territory of each of these States are held in hostility to the General Government. It is no loose, unorganized insurrection, having no defined boundary or possession. It has a boundary marked by lines of bayonets, and which can be crossed only by force. South of this line is enemy's territory, because it is claimed and held in possession by an organized, hostile, and belligerent Power."—2 Black, pages 673, 674.

Judge Nelson, page 693, says:

"The laws of war, whether the war be civil or international, as we have seen, convert every citizen of the hostile State into a public enemy and treat him accordingly, whatever may have been his previous conduct."

Again, page 695, he says:

"The act of Congress of July 13, 1861, sections five and six, recognized a state of civil war between the Government and the confederate States, and made it territorial."

Congress has passed its deliberative judgment upon this question in the form of legislative enactment.

By section five, of act of July 13, 1861, to collect duties on imports and for other purposes, the President was authorized to declare certain States in insurrection, whereupon all commercial intercourse with said States should cease, and all goods or merchandise coming from said States or going thereto should be forfeited to the United States.

Again, by sections seven, eight, nine, of act of July 17, 1862, to suppress insurrection and for other purposes, proceedings in rem are authorized to be instituted against the property without process against the owner, and the property condemned and sold when it shall be established that it belongs to a person engaged in rebellion or who has given aid or comfort thereto:

"Such property shall be condemned as enemy's property, and become the property of the United States. All slaves of such persons found or being within any place occupied by rebel forces, and afterwards occupied by the forces of the United States, shall be deemed captives of war, and shall be forever free of their servitude and not again held as slaves."

How enemy's property, if this is not a civil, territorial war? How enemy's property if subject only to the municipal laws of the United States? How shall slaves be deemed captives of war except by the laws of war? Such property is enemy's property; and slaves are captives of war by virtue of the laws of war applied to a hostile belligerent Power.

The President of the United States by numerous acts has treated the States in revolt as public enemies. By proclamation of August 16, 1861, he declared the rebel States in a state of insurrection, proclaimed non-intercourse, and directed the seizure of vessels belonging to citizens of said States, together with their cargoes; and that such property when seized should become forfeited to the United States. In this proclamation the loyal and disloyal in those States are treated alike.

Again, by proclamation, in pursuance of law, on the 1st day of July, 1862, the President declared certain States in insurrection and rebellion whereby the civil authority of the United States is obstructed, &c.; not individuals in rebellion, but States in their organized capacity as States.

Again, the President, by proclamation on the 22d of September, 1862, declared:

"That on the 1st day of January, 1863, all persons held as slaves within any State, or designated part of a State, the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States shall be thenceforward and forever free."

And again, by proclamation on the 1st of January, 1863, these slaves were declared absolutely free. This great act of justice to an oppressed people is sustained upon the basis that the people in their organized corporate capacity as States are in rebellion; that they are to be treated and held as public enemies. Whatever the effect of this proclamation it operates alike upon those sustaining the rebellion and those still adhering to the Union. It takes effect upon the principle that this is a territorial war; that its "boundary is marked by lines of bayonets; that these designated States and parts of States" are held in possession by an organized, hostile, and belligerent Power; and that all the people within this hostile boundary are by the laws of war enemies.

The amnesty proclamation proceeds upon the same principle. It assumes the right of the Government to impose such conditions upon this conquered people as Congress and the Executive may determine. The President has proposed such conditions as to him seem just and liberal toward those who are willing to come back into the Union. One of these conditions requires a modification of the State constitutions so as to prohibit slavery.

If our right is conceded to impose these conditions, the same grant of power would authorize the Government to impose any further conditions that may be necessary to secure the permanent peace and prosperity of the whole country, and that may be necessary to "guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government." This power is further recognized and enforced by the President in his letter of instructions to General Steele, in Arkansas. He says:

"That it be assumed at the election and thenceforward that the constitution and laws of the State as before the rebellion, are in full force, except that the constitution is so modified as to declare that there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude except in punishment for crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted."

Substantially the same instructions were issued to General Banks. This suggested modification implies that the complete control of the reorganization of a State in rebellion rests in the General Government. If this condition can be imposed, other conditions may be, or new constitutions, republican in form, may be required before any State in revolt shall be permitted to reënter the Union upon an equality with other States.

The law defines what acts are necessary to convert a domestic insurrection into a civil or public war. When the courts are obstructed, when the civil law cannot be administered, when hostile forces confront each other on the battlefield, a state of public war exists, the parties are belligerent, and the laws of war control them. When we blockaded southern ports, when we passed the non-intercourse act, when we sent out carrels of exchange of prisoners, when we treated captured piratical cruisers preying upon our commerce as prisoners of war, when we authorized the seizure, condemnation, and forfeiture of property in rem, when we declared all the slaves in revolted States as free, we treated our foe as a hostile belligerent Power. But let it not be said that we have thus acknowledged the right of these States to revolt; we have only recognized the fact of revolution, and the great question we are now settling by wayer of battle is whether or not this shall be successful revolution.

Neither let it be said that because we have treated them as public enemies we cannot punish the individuals as traitors. Judge Grier, in his able opinion in the prize cases, says:

"The law of nations contains no such anomalous doctrine as that insurgents who have risen in rebellion against their sovereign, expelled her courts, established a revolutionary government, organized armies, and commenced hostilities are not enemies because they are traitors, and a war levied on the Government by traitors in order to dismember and destroy it is not a war because it is an insurrection."

It follows that they can be punished as traitors though public enemies.

But it is claimed by the Opposition that if we treat them as revolutionists, as public enemies, we cannot complain if other nations recognize them as an independent Power. This does not follow. For while they are to us public enemies, organized and confederated as States, yet they are upon our territory; they are within our jurisdiction. They are seeking to establish an independent government out of a part of our territory, and until we acknowledge them it is the established rule of international law that the recognition of them by a foreign Power would be an act of war. By act of Parliament of Great Britain of 16 George III, 1776, all trade and commerce with the thirteen colonies was interdicted, and all ships and cargoes belonging to the inhabitants subjected to forfeiture as if the same were the ships and effects of open enemies. From this time the war became a territorial civil war between the contending parties, with all the rights of war known to the law of nations. Yet years after she held the recognition by France of our independence to be an act of war, and declared war accordingly. Therefore, in the light of congressional legislation, executive proclamation, and judicial interpretation, we have properly regarded those in arms against us as public enemies, liable to all the penalties imposed by the laws of war, having no rights under the Constitution, and at the mercy of our Government. I know we have at times by our legislation been in conflict with this view, but Congress, the courts, and the people are rapidly correcting the errors of the past. The laws of war are well defined and clearly understood.

Money and wealth, the products of agriculture and commerce, are said to be the sinews of war, and as necessary to conduct it as numbers and physical force. Hence it is that the laws of war recognize the right of a belligerent to cut these sinews of the power of the enemy by capturing his property, not only on the high seas, but on land in the hostile territory. The property thus taken is not confiscated under the Constitution after conviction for treason, but by virtue of the laws of war. Vattel, page 125, says:

"Everything, therefore, which belongs to the nation, to the State, to the sovereign, to the subjects of whatever age or sex—everything of that kind, I say, falls under the description of things belonging to the enemy. As to landed estate, property of this kind does not cease to be enemy's property, though possessed by a neutral foreigner, since the owner is resident in the hostile country."

"We have a right to deprive our enemy of his possession of everything which may augment his strength and enable him to make war." (Page 349.) * * * "In fine, we seize on the enemy's towns, his provinces," &c.

But it is claimed that under the humane policy of modern times, and by the later decisions of our courts, the rigid rules of confiscation of enemy's property have been relaxed. This I grant is true to a certain extent; but the law remains, and when the sovereign power of a nation demands the execution of the law in its rigor the courts will execute that law. Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Brown vs. The United States, 8 Cranch, 110, says:

"Respecting the power of the Government, no doubt is entertained. That war gives to the sovereign full right to take the persons and confiscate the property of the enemy wherever found is conceded. The mitigations of this rigid rule, which the humane and wise policy of modern times has introduced into practice, will more or less affect the exercise of this right, but cannot impair the right itself. That remains undiminished; and when the sovereign authority shall choose to bring it into operation the judicial department must give effect to its will."

This power is exercised under the war power granted in the Constitution, and which is without limitation.

Under this view, it follows that we may seize the real estate in fee; we may seize all the slaves within the hostile territory, emancipate them, arm them, and use them in any way to weaken the enemy and strengthen the Government.

The framers of our Constitution wisely placed no restriction upon the war powers of the Government. When a state of war exists the Constitution authorizes every act that the law of nations justifies toward our enemy, even though that enemy consists in communities who once owed and still owe a paramount allegiance to the Constitution of the United States.

With what show of reason or of justice can it be claimed that while this enemy is confronting us, defying our authority and our laws, while it is necessary for us to sacrifice billions of money and hundreds of thousands of the best men in the land, we shall at the same time exert the power of Congress to preserve and protect the property of this enemy to be turned over to them unharmed at the end of the war? Is there anything in the character of this revolt that requires us to exercise clemency toward the slaveholding, landholding class who were its instigators, and who now control and direct it?

No act of the Government could be pointed out treating this people with injustice. So far from it they ruled and controlled it for a long series of years to uphold and maintain slavery. Fearing that the General Government could no longer be used for the exclusive benefit of the slaveholders, they instigated this revolt, to establish out of the territory of the United States a slave empire, to make perpetual an aristocracy founded upon the idea that capital should own labor. Since Satan with his infernal peers revolved against Deity, history or poetry furnishes no example of a revolt so causeless, and having for its object so diabolical a purpose.

The dictates of justice and humanity alike require that the fomenters of this rebellion, those who infused into it organization and life-blood, shall be punished to the extent permissible by the laws of war. The great body of the people of the South are entitled to be treated with leniency, and should be so treated. Those who, from ignorance, were induced to enlist, those who by force were conscripted, should in the end receive the clemency of the Government; but for the leaders expatriation, annihilation, or death is the only remedy. It has been truly said that this is a landholder's as well as a slaveholder's rebellion. It is estimated, by careful computations from the census tables of 1860, that four fifths of all the lands in the rebellious States are owned by slaveholders, and that one third of the slaveholders own two thirds of these lands. About one in fifty of the whole population of the South holds slaves. So that if the lands of the leading conspirators were seized by the Government and wrested from them, not more than one out of every hundred in the South would be affected by it. I ask Representatives, shall everything else be destroyed that these few thousand slaveholders with their immense plantations shall live? Justice demands that the diabolical spirit which fanned into flame this revolution and now keeps it burning shall expiate its crime by a forfeiture of all it has to the Government it seeks to overthrow. These estates of malignant and unrepenting rebels, confiscated to the Government under the laws of war, or seized under the revenue laws because abandoned by their owners, becoming the property of the United States, what shall be done with them? We are entitled to use them so as to best promote the interests of the whole country. We should not sell them, because they would be purchased in large tracts by speculators who have grown rich by the war, and who would use them as did the masters who have abandoned them. They are the rightful inheritance of those who have fought our battles and reclaimed them from the control of the usurpation that now makes war upon us. They have the first right, and this bill secures that right to them. But the opponents of this bill say we propose to divide that which we have not, and which we cannot acquire. They forget that large tracts are already within the jurisdiction of the Government under the direct tax, which will go into the hands of speculators unless bid in by the Government and awarded to our soldiers under this bill, or some one with similar provisions.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe this nation will be so unjust to itself as not to seize absolutely the property, including the lands, of malignant rebels. Therefore I assume that confiscation in fee will be our policy with reference to these lands. We progress slowly, I admit; but to this we must come at last.

I will not take the time of the House to explain in detail the provisions of the bill under consideration. My colleague on the committee has done so, and the bill is printed and on the files of members. It extends our general land system, and virtually extends the homestead policy to this class of lands, confining its provisions, however, for the first five years after its passage to the soldiers and sailors who have borne arms in defense of the nation.

I will not stop here to vindicate the homestead law. Although long delayed, it may now be considered as a part of the settled policy of the Government in its disposition of the public domain. Experience has fully demonstrated that the Government realizes more revenue from its public lands by offering liberal inducements for their settlement than it does by offering them for sale. The demand for public lands is limited to the demands of actual settlers except during times of great land speculation, as in 1837 and 1856. Although Government realized millions of dollars from sales in 1856, yet those sales were a positive evil. Whole townships, and in some instances counties, in my State, Iowa, were taken up by speculators, and have been held by them at such prices as to preclude their settlement. If there had been no sales except to actual settlers, or if the beneficent principles of the homestead law had then prevailed, these localities would doubtless now be occupied by prosperous and extensive communities, who would annually contribute in taxes far more to the support of the Government than was realized from those sales. Our public lands are valueless to the Government without cultivation. Any other policy is unjust toward the hardy pioneer of civilization, injurious to the public interests, and would present a serious obstacle to the growth, development, prosperity, and greatness of our common country.

By this policy the oppressed poor of the Old World are invited to happy and independent homes in the New. They in turn contribute to the growth, wealth, and greatness of the nation. In the midst of this desolating civil war more than two hundred thousand of the poor of other lands within the last year have sought an asylum among us, invited by our free institutions and liberal policy, and it is estimated that during the coming year nearly double that number will seek our hospitable shores. Hon. Robert J. Walker, in a recent article, has shown that if we compute the annual immigration for the next ten years as during the decade from 1850 to 1860, and estimate the value of the labor of each immigrant at thirty-three cents per day, it would give us a grand total in 1870 of $1,430,000,000, or enough in twenty years to pay our entire national war debt. We need their labor to till our fields, to replenish our Treasury, and enrich our commerce, and therefore should, by our laws and our policy, give them encouragement.

Land monopoly, with its attendant evils, has ever been the bane of empire. The republic of Rome furnishes us a familiar example. In the early days of the republic labor was esteemed honorable. The cultivators of the soil were esteemed worthy of the highest places in the republic. Afterwards the reins of power passed from the hands of the middle classes; the proprietorship of the soil passed from the many into the hands of the privileged few. The people having thus alienated the true inheritance of power, their own homesteads, soon became a prey to the contending factions, who controlled the wealth of the State, and the greatness and glory of the imperial republic passed away forever.

The successive revolutions in Mexico have been but a struggle of the people against the lordings of the soil; a struggle of the Liberal party who sought to foster and cherish republican institutions against the Church party who owned the greater portion of the soil and wealth of the country, and who used their wealth and power to oppress the people. The Liberals finally wrested this wealth from the Church party, and used it for the benefit of the State, and the Power now ruling that country has not yet deemed it prudent to restore it. The fate of Mexico shows how impossible it is to maintain a permanent republican Government over the few selfish, proud aristocrats who own the soil and wealth of the country, even without the demoralizing and aggravating evils of slavery.

Who does not believe that if the landed proprietors who own the great body of the English soil could upon some principle of justice be induced to share it with the homeless and landless class there, much of the misery, want, and degradation that now afflict a great portion of that people would be averted, and the greatness and glory of the kingdom thereby advanced?

In a prosperous State labor must not only be free, but the cultivator of the soil must have a proprietary right in the soil itself. In the rebellious States the slaveholders not only owned the soil but the labor that tilled it. Labor thus degraded became dishonorable. Here the poverty of the many, with its evils of want, of ignorance, and dependence, was to be found side by side with the excessive wealth and opulence of the few. The poor whites, ignorant of the blessings of free Government, yielded their assent the first moment the slaveholders, their masters, sought to overthrow it. The words of General Marion, himself a southerner, written to Baron De Kalb, present a true picture of the lower class of the whites in all the southern States. Speaking of Carolina, he says:

"The people form two classes: the rich and the poor. The poor are very poor; the rich, who have slaves to do all their work, give them no employment; the little they get is laid out in brandy, not in books and newspapers; hence they know nothing of the blessings of our country or of the dangers which threaten it; therefore they care nothing about it; enjoying none of the benefits of a free Government they cannot appreciate its blessings, and feel no interest in fighting for its preservation."

This is a truthful picture of the South to-day. The wealthy and intelligent few have controlled and directed the poor and ignorant many, and have thus led them into the vortex of a revolution causeless as it is wicked. We must conquer the oppressors of this people. Their oppressors conquered, the Government should extend to them its fostering care and protection; should encourage labor and protect all in the enjoyment of its fruits. We must restore the great body of that people by the establishment in those States of free schools and free churches. This can only be done successfully by a division of the large estates, now abandoned, into small farms, which shall be tilled by their owners. This division is also necessary to eradicate slavery. The nature of that institution is to absorb all within its reach. Experience has demonstrated that the small farmer, and in turn the small planter, was compelled to give way to his more powerful and more aristocratic neighbor, who prospered upon the labor of his slaves, until all the valuable lands of the South were owned by comparatively a few persons. If these estates are not divided in the renovation of that region, they will soon be taken up under our tax and confiscation laws by a class of cormorants who will swarm thither, hoping to amass fortunes by a system of wages-slavery as much to be deplored as chattel-slavery. This class will seek to take advantage of the ignorant slave suddenly made free, and will require of him excessive labor, with inadequate compensation.

Experience has already shown that negroes suffer as much under avaricious lessees who are determined to suddenly amass wealth by raising cotton as they did under their former masters.

This evil of land monopoly and speculation has become so great in Louisiana that General Banks was compelled recently to issue an order suspending all sales of real estate in the Gulf department belonging to rebels. In that department reliable authority states that the system of leasing lands adopted is but a feeble substitute for the barbarism of slavery; temporary, I hope, but if persisted in, and continued for any great length of time, the dominion of the northern speculator over the freedmen will be as complete and more cruel than slavery itself, which in some degree ameliorates the condition of its victims through the interest of the tyrant, who wishes to preserve the health of the slave that he may continue to exact from him unrequited labor. All efforts to destroy the institution of slavery will be futile if General Order No. 23, of February 3 last, relating to the treatment of freedmen in the Gulf department, is to become the permanent policy of the Government.

Shall we establish in this Republic a system of serfdom at the very time when the Czar of Russia is emancipating the serfs in all his dominions from the power of their feudal lords, and granting them absolute possession and ownership of the soil they have cultivated and continue to cultivate? We hail with joy this act of a monarch which raises millions to the condition of freedom, and empowers a populous people to enter upon the road of progress. Let us at least keep pace with Russia in our treatment of those who labor. I hope that the Bureau of Emancipation will soon be organized, and that it may remedy these evils. But no permanent cure can be effected except by the adoption of some permanent system looking to the division of these immense estates among those who till them, and who by every rule of justice are entitled to the fruits of their labor.

This bill provides that these lands for a period of five years shall be set aside for the soldiers of the Republic, those serving two years being entitled to eighty acres, and those serving for a less period of time forty acres.

Every good Government is just and generous to its soldiers; none more than ours. We have paid and are paying most liberal bounties to those who volunteer in defense of the Union. We have granted lands to all those who have heretofore fought our battles. We are now paying larger pensions to those disabled and to the survivors of those who have died in the service than any Government on earth. Shall we continue this liberal policy toward those who fight in defense of the country and its flag? The brave men who have left their firesides and their families, and have dared all, endured all, and sacrificed all that their country might live, deserve from that country all of reward that it is possible to give. What greater boon have we for our soldiers than a homestead in a genial climate and upon a luxuriant soil, in the very neighborhood of their sacrifices and their triumphs?

This division should be made not only as an act of justice to the soldier, but as a matter of policy. After we have subdued by force of arms the people of the rebellious States, there will be still lurking a strong opposition to the Government. Guerrilla bands will be organized to destroy property and harass loyal men. Who can so well organize for defense as the veterans trained by long service in the field?

Again, these missionaries of liberty will carry with them that spirit of freedom early taught them, and intensified by the sacrifices they have made in its maintenance. Northern thrift and independence will thus be substituted for ignorance and indolence. Free schools and churches will take the place of slave-pens and whipping-posts. Labor will be dignified, being no longer servile. The great body of the people will become producers as well as consumers; manufactures will be encouraged, the arts will flourish; villages, towns, and cities will spring up in the now obscure localities. The people will become homogeneous, our internal and external commerce will be increased, and with it enhanced the wealth and glory of the nation.

This bill makes no distinction on account of color or race; it recognizes the equal right of all who have faithfully served in our armies to avail themselves of its benefits. We give all the same privilege to procure a homestead, acquire property, and enjoy the fruits of industry that we have hitherto claimed for ourselves.

Free negroes in many of the southern States have always enjoyed this right. We cannot expect that emancipation will in a moment destroy the vices engendered by long years of humiliation and oppression. Because they have been degraded for centuries shall we continue to oppress them in the name of liberty? Our Government was formed and our Constitution framed to secure the blessing of liberty, not to promote and perpetuate inequality. Thomas Jefferson said:

"The opinion that they [the colored race] are inferior in the faculties of reason and imagination must be hazarded with great diffidence."—Jefferson's Works, volume 8, page 386.

He said afterwards:

"I expressed these views, therefore, with great hesitation, but whatever be their degree of talent it is no measure of their right. Because Sir Isaac Newton was superior to others in understanding he was not therefore lord of the person and property of others."

It is the duty of the Government to give the colored man at least an equal chance with our own race in the settlement and cultivation of the soil in his native land. To this he is entitled upon every principle of equity and justice. These slaves have purchased these lands over and over again, many times, by their sweat and toil through many long years of oppression, and have been compelled to support unrequited the aristocracy which is now seeking to destroy the Government. Let us deal justly with them in order that we may claim justice for ourselves. Degraded as they have been by long years of oppression, the white race need not fear them in the race for power. Having vouchsafed to them the boon of freedom, let us by our policy seek to elevate them to the condition of freemen. Do they not deserve from us some consideration? Their blood mingled with that of our fathers in achieving the rich inheritance of freedom purchased by the sacrifices of the Revolution. They acted well their part in our last struggle with Great Britain; and in the war now being waged against us, the first moment opportunity was given they rushed eagerly to the field of contest, where the black flag and no quarter awaited them, knowing that to them the field of battle was victory or death, and that, too, in defense of a Government that has long withheld from them the pay due to those who wear the soldier's uniform and defend the emblem of our nationality.

I envy not the man who will in the light of the heroic achievements at Fort Wagner, Fort Hudson, and Milliken's Bend, and in the face of the barbarous and bloody massacres at Fort Pillow and Plymouth, stand up in the American Congress and advocate the withdrawal from our armies of the sable sons who exhibit such heroism and make such sacrifices. Nor do I envy the political party that will record its united vote against paying to these men the just reward of a soldier of the United States. Mr. Speaker, they have not only evinced a willingness to enlist in our armies, but in the States in rebellion they have been our only reliable friends. Everywhere our generals receive their most useful and reliable information from this oppressed race, who hail the approach of our armies as the harbinger of freedom to them. They have at every sacrifice administered to the wants of our soldiers, whenever and wherever opportunity presented. A single incident attending the escape of our prisoners from Richmond attests their devotion to our cause and the brave men fighting its battles. A prisoner says:

"Some of Captain Phelps's party and others were pursued and fired upon. All of them kept out of the sight of whites, but trusted implicitly the blacks, and never had their trust betrayed. After the first officers had discovered themselves to the negroes and asked for food, on the Chickahominy, the negroes organized into relief squads and searched the woods for the fugitives, carrying them food from their scanty rations, and helping them in every way in their power."

Is it not the duty of the Government to justly recognize the generous devotion thus exhibited? Will the advocates of "the Union as it was" still say that this sublime heroism, these great sacrifices, only deserve chains and slavery, and that the one hundred and thirty thousand colored men now serving in our armies shall be withdrawn from confronting the enemy, and be remanded to perpetual bondage, and subjected to the vengeance of rebel masters? Let them make up their record. But let it not be said of us on this side of the House that we failed to recognize these heroic qualities; but rather that we had the justice and magnanimity to extend to them the fostering care and protection of the Government that they in common with us are seeking to maintain and perpetuate.

But, say the Opposition, why give them lands when they will not till? They say the negroes free are idle and will not work for themselves. There never was an argument or statement so utterly fallacious. Will not work! The statistics of industry and population show that they are industrious when opportunity is given. Look at Maryland; an example almost within sight of this Capitol. Free negroes comprise one-eighth of the population. The people of that State have always relied upon the labor of these negroes; and recently, by a majority of more than fifteen thousand, have decided in favor of immediate and unconditional emancipation as the true policy of the State.

New Orleans, as appears by the census of 1860, contained in that year a population of one hundred and seventy-five thousand; of these fifteen thousand were free colored, ten thousand were slaves, and the remainder whites. The free colored men were taxed for an average of $1,000 to each person, while the whites were taxed for only $732 to each person. How have they acquired this wealth if not by their own industry? Some of the wealthiest inhabitants of the city of Charleston, South Carolina, are the free colored population. Experience demonstrates at Port Royal and elsewhere, where the freedmen have been permitted to occupy abandoned lands and cultivate them, that they are industrious and prosperous, accumulating property and improving the lands allotted to them.

The results of emancipation in the English and French colonies prove that the freedmen as a class are industrious.

Lord Stanley, in 1842, characterized the transition from slavery to liberty in the following terms:

"The negroes are happy and satisfied; they give themselves to labor; they have ameliorated their manner of living, and increased their comfort; while crimes have diminished, their moral habits have become better."

He further says:

"The number of negroes who became freeholders through their industry and economy amounted in the whole island of Jamaica to two thousand one hundred and fourteen in 1838, under the apprentice system, which was abolished in that year, and the number increased to seven thousand three hundred and forty two years afterwards."

In Jamaica, the most important of the slave colonies, the freedmen, in four years, expended for the purchase of lands and the erection of houses more than four million francs. Of the eighty-two thousand slaves emancipated in Guiana fifteen thousand nine hundred and six had become freeholders in 1843.

A colonist of Jamaica in 1851 says:

"It may be supposed that the whites have the pre-eminence there." * * * "But apart from that pre-eminence which results from wealth and intelligence in every community, the whites have no privilege over their fellow-citizens. We have proved by experience that the colored man can raise himself to the first rank of civil society and hold his place there as well as any European by origin."

On all these points the French testimony accords completely with the English reports.

After emancipation the aggregate commerce of the French colonies increased. The value of productions increased, notwithstanding the unfavorable legislation of the French Assembly. It is true, for three years after emancipation exports largely fell off, but recovered again in five years; and in ten years, in some of the islands, doubled.

Both before and after emancipation in the English and French colonies the home Governments sought to increase colonial production by encouraging the immigration of hired laborers.

This experiment did not prove successful, from a variety of causes. But it did prove that the hired laborers from Africa were the most industrious and least vicious. In other words, it is from the African race that laborers are borrowed destined to replace other Africans who are accused of idleness and vice.

Is it likely that this great work of emancipation could have progressed until the stain of slavery now rests upon but one nation of Europe had its results shown the black race unfit for freedom? In some instances disturbances and insurrections followed emancipation; but in no instance were they the result of it. The transition has generally been peaceful. The emancipation of eight hundred thousand slaves, on the same day and at the same hour, in the English colonies, did not cause as much disturbance as an election in some of the Democratic wards in New York city. Emancipation was no more responsible for revolution and outbreak in the colonies than was our Government responsible for the riot of Mr. Seymour's friends last summer, or for the recent rebellion in Illinois. Political demagogues in the colonies, in some instances, took advantage of the ignorance of the freedmen, the fruit of which was revolution, as these riots were the legitimate fruit of the teaching of men in this Hall and out of it who are now the allies, and who formerly were the partisans, of those directing the rebellion.

The colored man with proper encouragement is industrious, does acquire property, and appreciates with us the blessings of liberty, is ready with us to die in its defense, and should receive the generous encouragement of a magnanimous people and the protectingegis of a just Government.

Mr. Speaker, no man believes that the institution of slavery can survive this rebellion; when destroyed it is our duty to protect the freedmen in the conquered territory as well as the white race. They live within our territory and will continue so to live. I look upon any scheme of colonization as impracticable, and if practicable pernicious in its results to the industry of the nation. We need these freedmen to till our fields and increase our production; there is now and always will be in this country great demand for free labor. We find ourselves compelled to devise schemes to encourage immigration, therefore sound policy prohibits the deportation of the four million black laborers within our territory, and duty requires of us to provide for them here by such legislation as will encourage them to labor for their support.

And let me here call the attention of gentlemen on the other side of the House to the fact that Congress has twice affirmed this policy of confiscation, that the courts have sustained it, that the people appealed to have also sustained it, and placed nearly every gentleman on that side of the House in a minority at home, because they opposed this and other necessary measures for the suppression of the rebellion. The people believe, whether true or not, that the leaders of the Opposition love their old allies and friends, the slaveholders, more than they love the Government that protects them. They suspect the loyalty of those who, professing sympathy with our cause, by their words and actions give aid and comfort to our enemies. They cannot understand the logic that would teach them that, under the laws of war, we can take the life of a rebel, but cannot touch his property. They cannot believe that justice requires that the burdens of taxation shall fall upon the loyal men of the North, who have lost sons and brothers in this war, while those in arms against us shall be protected in the full and complete enjoyment of their property.

We must wrest the power of the southern States from the hands of a land-owning, slaveholding aristocracy, and restore it to the rightful possession of a whole people. We must labor for the elevation of that people. To do this we must destroy the present land system, first by confiscation in fee, then by placing them within the reach of every man who has a hand to labor or a family to support. We must make the masses land-owners if we would perpetuate the Republic. Those who till the soil are and ever have been the hope of the Republic. They fill our armies to-day. Look at the quotas of troops furnished in the loyal States, and you find nearly always that the rural districts are in advance of requisitions. The very nature of their pursuits inspires a love of country, and a patriotism to rally at its call.

The establishment of this system will be the forerunner of the establishment of the free institutions of the North among that people. With small farms and productive labor come free schools, a pure religion, free churches, thriving villages, manufacturing towns, colleges of learning, the growth of commerce, and all the blessings of republican government. These established, we shall realize as the result of our policy the enthronement of a republicanism which has lived in theory but not in fact except in the free States of this Union.

Mr. Speaker, our legislation should be for the whole people and not for a class, thus dealing justly toward those who have experienced long years of oppression under the banner of the Republic. If we hope to attain success in this contest we must guaranty to all the privileges of religion, of family, of property, and of liberty. Then our final triumph over the rebellion which seeks to deprive the poor and oppressed of all these is certain under the guidance of Him who rules all and governs all.

"Though dark the ways of Justice seem,
Impartially she holds the beam;
Though oft her sword be wielded slow,
Unfailing falls the doomning blow
Right to exalt and wrong to overthrow."

That justice requires that we shall extend the protection of the Government to all those whom we have called to battle in its defense by giving to them the right to acquire and hold as their own the fruits of their labor.

But we must not permit the discussion of this or kindred measures to divert us or the country from the paramount duty before us, that of prosecuting the war vigorously and earnestly until the military power of the rebellion is destroyed, until all the men now in arms against us shall either voluntarily or by compulsion lay down their arms. In this consists our only hope and safety; and to this primarily all our labors and efforts must be directed. There is no road to peace except through bloody war. Men may talk of peace by compromise and concession, but the day of compromise is past. Concession is impossible. Radical principles cannot be compromised. War and restoration by conquest on the basis of liberty, or peace and disunion on the basis of slavery, are the only alternatives presented to the American nation to-day. Can we doubt which it will choose?

Mr. SLOAN obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. JULIAN, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And then (at forty minutes past nine o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives (No. 244) to guaranty to certain States whose governments have been usurped or overthrown a republican form of government was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILKINSON. I move that that bill be referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suppose it is a question that should properly go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SUMNER. The bill originally came from the Committee on Territories in the House of Representatives.

The motion of Mr. WILKINSON was agreed to.

MAIL STEAMSHIP SERVICE TO BRAZIL.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 407) to authorize the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and Brazil, have instructed me to report it with an amendment. I desire that it be put on its passage now.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It authorizes the Postmaster General to unite with the general post office department of the empire of Brazil, or such officer of the Government of Brazil as shall be authorized, to act for that Government, in establishing direct mail communication between the two countries by means of a monthly line of first-class American sea-going steamships, to be of not less than two thousand tons burden each, and of sufficient number to perform twelve round trips or voyages per annum between a port of the United States north of the Potomac river and Rio de Janeiro, in Brazil, touching at St. Thomas, in the West Indies, at Bahia, Pernambuco, and such other Brazilian and intermediate port or ports as shall be considered necessary and expedient; but the expense of the service is to be divided between the two Governments, and the United States portion thereof is not to exceed the sum of $150,000 for the performance of twelve round trips per annum.

The Postmaster General is authorized to invite proposals for such mail steamship service by public advertisement for the period of sixty days in one or more newspapers published in the cities of Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, respectively, and to contract for the same for the term of ten years, to commence from the day the first steamship of the proposed line shall depart from the United States with the mails for Brazil; but proposals for monthly trips—that is to say, for twelve round voyages per annum, out and back—are to be received and accepted by him within the limit as aforesaid, from a party or parties of undoubted responsibility, possessing ample ability to furnish the steamships required for the service, and offering good and sufficient sureties for the faithful performance of such contract; and such proposals are to be accepted by the Government of Brazil, and distinct and separate contracts with each Government, containing similar provisions, are to be executed by such accepted bidder or bidders; each Government to be responsible only for its proportion of the subsidy to be paid for the service.

Any contract which the Postmaster General may execute under the authority of this act is to go into effect on or before the 1st of September, 1865, and shall, in addition to the usual stipulations of ocean mail steamship contracts, provide that the steamships offered for the service shall be constructed of the best materials and after the most approved model, with all the modern improvements adapted for sea-going steamships of the first class; and shall, before their approval and acceptance by the Postmaster General, be subject to inspection and survey by an experienced naval constructor, to be detailed for that purpose by the Secretary of the Navy, whose report shall be made to the Postmaster General. The two Governments are to be entitled to have transported, free of expense, on each and every steamer, a mail agent to take charge of and arrange the mail matter, to whom suitable accommodations for that purpose are to be assigned. In case of failure from any cause to perform any of the regular monthly voyages stipulated for in the contract, a pro rata deduction is to be made from the compensation on account of such omitted voyage or voyages; and suitable fines and penalties may be imposed for delays and irregularities in the regular performance of the service according to contract; and the Postmaster General is to have the power to determine the contract at any time, in case of its being underlet or assigned to any other party.

The mail steamships employed in the service authorized by this act are to be exempt from all port charges and custom-house dues at the port of departure and arrival in the United States; but a similar immunity from port charges and custom-house dues is to be granted by the Government of Brazil.

The amendment of the committee was in section two, line six, after the word "contract," to insert "with the lowest responsible bidder;" so that the clause will read:

That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to invite proposals for said mail steamship service by public advertisement, for the period of sixty days, in one or more newspapers published in the cities of Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, respectively, and to contract with the lowest responsible bidder.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I really know so little about the necessity for this bill that I do not feel justified in undertaking to oppose it from any particular objection that I have to it; but it does seem to me that this is a wrong time to be initiating an enterprise of this character—to undertake to establish a line of ocean steamers, to the support of which the Government is to contribute in this time of war, when we need all the funds we can raise to support our armies and maintain the Government. I repeat, this seems to me to be an inopportune time to embark in an enterprise of this character. I remember very well that the Government of the United States undertook to support, or to aid in the support, of a line of steamers across the ocean for a time. I did not know that this bill was coming up this morning, and I have not looked to see what amount of money the Government of the United States expended in undertaking to maintain a line of ocean steamers to cross the Atlantic, but it would amount to quite a large sum I am sure, probably to several millions, and I should like to ask, for what good? I hope the honorable Senator from Vermont, who has charge of this bill, and has brought it in here to be passed at this time, will tell us what benefit the Government of the United States ever derived from the hundreds of thousands and millions of dollars that it paid to the Collins line, and other steamship lines, to cross the ocean. If it was a good enterprise, a proper expenditure of money even in a time of peace, why have we abandoned it? Why did we not continue to pay these subsidies for the purpose of keeping that line of steamers, and keep up the communication to Liverpool, where our intercourse is far greater than it is with the South American States, or with Rio de Janeiro, to which point I believe the steamers are to run?

I should like to know some better reason than I do know for supporting this bill. It is a matter of some importance. It is initiating a policy which will be likely to call for further appropriations. We all know if we begin with an appropriation of $150,000 to support this line of steamships, and it is found after a year or two that they are unable to get along with the $150,000 appropriated by Congress, they will come here and ask Congress for another $150,000, or for such a sum as will enable them to continue this line.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was not aware of that. The Senator from Iowa tells me this is but the beginning of a system; it is but one branch of what is proposed to be inaugurated at the present session. It seems to me this is not the proper time for the inauguration of this policy. I hope the Senator from Vermont who has charge of this bill will explain it to the Senate, that we may know what the necessity for this measure is, and the propriety of its adoption at this time.

Mr. COLLAMER. If any gentleman desires to know the full extent of this subject in all its bearings, and is willing to take the time that is necessary to the understanding of it, he will hardly be willing to listen to me long enough to tell that story. If the gentleman has not already received, I am prepared to put into his hands, if he pleases, the materials by which he will be enabled to inform himself fully on this subject. I would particularly commend to his reading the report of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York. I do not know that the gentleman has received it. If he has, I presume he has not had time to examine it. It is full and exhaustive of this subject.

I did not intend nor expect to enter upon the discussion of this subject at large. I did not suppose the Senate would desire to take the time which would be necessary to the understanding of this subject to enter upon it at large, but if they are I will endeavor to state as briefly as I can what is the condition of it.

In the first place, gentlemen must understand that the commerce of the world has received in a great measure new channels of intercourse by the invention of steamships, and further, that those lines of steamships have been established by subsidies from the British Government, the French Government, and the Spanish Government. There is a large number of these steam lines. It is not necessary that I should go into the history of the whole of them. The first of them came to the United States, of which the Cunard line remains. There is a line running from Southampton to St. Thomas in the West Indies, from which point—St. Thomas—there are ten lines to the United States and different points on the coast of America; one of them to the very point mentioned in this bill, Rio de Janeiro. The English have also a line running up the Mediterranean, one up the Baltic, one down to the Cape of Good Hope, and then through to the East Indies, and one line upon the west coast of South America, all subsidized by their Government. By means of these steamship lines they have grasped into their hands, commanded, and monopolized almost the whole valuable trade of the world.

With these lines sailing ships cannot compete; and no private company can set up any line to compete with those which are subsidized by the British Government. Therefore, one of two things is true: we must enter in some degree upon this policy, as we can best bear it, or our commerce with the world ceases; our commerce upon which we have prided ourselves as the child of American enterprise, which has extended to every country and whitened every ocean with our sails, after all turns out to be a failure; British policy has undermined it. Time will not permit me to enter into the particulars of this. Such are my general views.

When we entered some years ago upon the policy of subsidizing a line of steamers to Southampton, and from there to Havre, and then to Bremen, and the Collins line, although they were paid extravagant prices, they were successful efforts. The gentleman asked me why we abandoned the payment of those subsidies. I can tell him plainly. It was abandoned by the votes of the representatives of the southern part of the United States, who thought it was helping the commerce of the North. The commerce of the country being mostly in the North, and this being essentially necessary to the prosperity of our commerce, at the earliest opportunity they could obtain, when these contracts expired, by their power and influence in this body and in the other House, they broke it down, meaning thereby to cripple the commerce of the North, and effected their object.

Such being the state of things, the question is whether we ought not to begin somewhere to try to do a little something to benefit our commerce; and one of the most promising and at the same time one of the simplest enterprises we could enter upon is this proposed line to the empire of Brazil. In the first place, we are assured that the Government of Brazil would join us in it. We cannot secure that assistance with nations generally. This bill is drawn on the condition that the Brazilian Government join with us in this enterprise. The British line of steamers from Southampton to Pernambuco, and from there to Rio de Janeiro, was established, I think, in 1851. At that time we were in possession of our fair part of the commerce of Brazil; but within this period of thirteen years, without having my materials exactly before me, I can say that our exports to Brazil amount to almost nothing, whereas the exports of Great Britain have more than doubled; and yet we take more than half the whole products of Brazil and pay them the money for them. We take almost the whole of their coffee, which is the main article of export, and the balance of trade is entirely against us. We have to pay for it. The gentleman's own constituents, who use, I believe, the Rio coffee—it is used almost entirely through our western country, a large part of it going to New Orleans—are compelled to pay the balance of trade against us there. I have no hesitation in saying that we are the natural suppliers of the empire of Brazil, and would be with their help. They are willing to assist, provided we initiate this species of commerce, which is now entirely supplied by the British steamers. Although we have a minister and consuls in Brazil, we can only send a letter there by sending it in a British steamer to England, and then by a British steamer from England to Brazil and back again. All our business is done by that circuitous route. We are entirely overshadowed by these British lines, and this commerce is monopolized entirely by these British vessels.

I can produce to the gentleman if he desires it the exact statistics showing these facts. This being a comparatively small enterprise, one in which we can now secure the aid and assistance of the Government of Brazil, the bill having been passed by the House of Representatives by a very great majority on the statement there presented by the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and which I can present to the Senate whenever they choose to give time to it, I had hoped that upon the whole objection would not be made to at least beginning and initiating this small commencement of something or other to redeem our commerce from the thralldom in which it is placed.

Mr. WILKINSON. I wish to offer an amendment to this bill. I have just come in, and did not know that the bill was before the Senate for consideration. I have not the amendment prepared, and I therefore move that the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF NEVADA.

Mr. WADE. The Committee on Territories, to whom was referred a memorial of the Governor and other territorial officers of the Territory of Nevada, praying for an amendment of the act for the admission of that Territory into the Union, have directed me to report a bill, and I will ask for its present consideration. It is a very short matter.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 267) to amend an act entitled "An act to enable the people of Nevada to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," was read twice by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WADE. The only effect of this bill is to enable the people of Nevada to act on the ratification or rejection of their constitution on the first Wednesday of September instead of the second Tuesday of October, making the election a month earlier. Their Governor and the principal officers have requested that it be done. That is all there is of the bill. I hope it will be passed at once.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS OF WISCONSIN.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate postpone all prior orders, and proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution No. 8.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 8) for the relief of the State of Wisconsin; the pending question being on the amendment reported from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, this resolution has already been partially considered upon two other occasions, and I desire now to occupy the attention of the Senate for a short time in stating my view of it.

The resolution comes before the Senate to provide for settling with the State of Wisconsin its claim against the General Government for what is known as the five per cent. fund. I wish the Senate would take notice of the contract between the United States and the State of Wisconsin upon which that claim is based. When on the 6th of August, 1846, you passed an act authorizing the people of the Territory of Wisconsin to form a State government and to be admitted into the Union, you submitted the following propositions to the convention which was convened for the purpose of forming its constitution:

"First. That section numbered sixteen, in every township of the public lands in said State, and where such section has been sold or otherwise disposed of, other lands equivalent thereto, and as contiguous as may be, shall be granted to said State for the use of schools.

"Second. That the seventy-two sections or two entire townships of land set apart and reserved for the use and support of a university by an act of Congress, approved on the 12th day of June, 1838, entitled 'An act concerning a seminary of learning in the Territory of Wisconsin,' are hereby granted and conveyed to the State, to be appropriated solely to the use and support of such university, in such manner as the Legislature may prescribe.

"Third. That ten entire sections of land, to be selected and located under the direction of the Legislature, in legal divisions of not less than one quarter section, from any of the unappropriated lands belonging to the United States within the said State, are hereby granted to the said State, for the purpose of completing the public buildings of the said State, or for the erection of others at the seat of government, under the direction of the Legislature thereof.

"Fourth. That all salt springs within said State, not exceeding twelve in number, with six sections of land adjoining, or as contiguous as may be to each, shall be granted to the State for its use; the same to be selected by the Legislature thereof within one year after the admission of said State; and when so selected to be used or disposed of on such terms, conditions, and regulations as the Legislature shall direct: Provided, That no salt spring or land the right whereof is now vested in any individual or individuals, or which may hereafter be confirmed or adjudged to any individual or individuals; shall, by this section, be granted to said State.

"Fifth. That five per cent. of the net proceeds of sales of all public lands lying within the said State, which have been or shall be sold by Congress, from and after the admission of said State into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to the said State for the purpose of making public roads and canals in the same, as the Legislature shall direct: Provided—

"Provided, That the foregoing propositions herein offered are on the condition that the said convention which shall form the constitution of said State shall provide, by a clause in said constitution, or an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil within the same by the United States, nor with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in such soil to bona fide purchasers thereof; and that no tax shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States; and that in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents."

That is the proposition which Congress submitted to that convention. The convention accepted it, and incorporated these very clauses into the body of the constitution. I think that makes the contract complete. The Government of the United States has thought the same, and has complied with each one of these propositions except the last. It has given us the sixteenth section for school purposes; it has given us the seventy-two sections for the support of a university; it has given us the ten sections of land for public buildings; it has given us the salt springs and the adjoining land; but it has not given us the five per cent. fund. We have been endeavoring to ascertain why the United States would not comply with the whole contract as well as a part of it. That is the question the Senate is called upon to consider, why the Government shall not comply with the last of these propositions and execute it. When we appeal to the Secretary of the Interior to know why this five per cent. fund shall not be paid over to the State we receive one reason in reply. The Committee on Claims, which has reported this resolution, assigned another reason. I listened as carefully as I could to the remarks of the Senator from Maine [Mr. Fessenden] the other day to ascertain what his reason was; but I really was unable to comprehend what his objection is to the payment of this fund to the State of Wisconsin.

The resolution, as originally introduced, directed the Secretary of the Interior to pay over to the State of Wisconsin the amount of this fund, deducting from it a fund admitted to be in the hands of the State, arising from a source that I shall presently explain. As reported back to the Senate by the Committee on Claims it is amended so as to require the Secretary instead of deducting this set-off from the five per cent. fund, and retaining it in the Treasury of the United States, to settle another account preferred by a corporation in the State of Wisconsin known as the Rock River Canal Company, and to discharge a claim of that company out of this fund. That is the difference between the resolution as it was originally presented to the Senate, and the amendment agreed to by the Committee on Claims.

When I presented this resolution to the Senate I acknowledged the existence of this fund in our hands arising from that canal grant, and, assuming that it ought not remain in our hands, I was willing it should be deducted from this sum and be retained in the Treasury of the United States, to be disposed of as they thought just. The Rock River Canal Company intervened and presented their claims to the committee. The committee thought that this fund, or part of it at all events, belonged to the company, and they directed the Secretary of the Interior to adjust that claim, ascertain how much of it is just, and pay the company out of this fund.

Mr. JOHNSON. How do the company claim a portion of the fund?

Mr. HOWE. I will presently show how the company claims it. You see, so far as the State of Wisconsin is concerned, it is entirely indifferent to us what you do with this fund. We concede that it does not belong to us. If it is the judgment of Congress, as it was the judgment of the committee, that a part or the whole of it belongs to that company, we are entirely willing that it shall be paid to the company, and certainly shall be very glad to have it paid to the company. But this claim of the company and this controversy with the Government grew out of an act of the Congress of the United States passed in 1838, which made a grant of lands to the Territory of Wisconsin for the purpose of aiding in opening a canal to connect the waters of Lake Michigan with those of Rock river. I really wish Senators would pay a little attention to the terms of that grant.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the date of the act?

Mr. HOWE. The 18th of June, 1838. It provides:

"That there be, and hereby is, granted to the Territory of Wisconsin, for the purpose of aiding in opening a canal to unite the waters of Lake Michigan, at Milwaukee, with those of Rock river, between the point of intersection with said river, of the line dividing townships seven and eight and the Lake Koshkonong, all the land heretofore not otherwise appropriated or disposed of in those sections and fractional sections which are numbered with odd numbers on the plats of the public surveys, with the breadth of five full sections, taken in north and south or east and west tiers, on each side of the main route of said canal, from one end thereof to the other, and reserving the even numbered sections and fractional sections, taken as above, to the United States; and the said land so granted to aid in the construction of said canal shall be subject to the disposal of the Legislature of the said Territory, for the purpose aforesaid, and no other: Provided, That the said canal, when completed, and the branches thereof, shall be, and forever remain, a public highway, for the use of the Government of the United States, free from any toll or other charge whatever for any property of the United States or persons in their service passing through the same: Provided, That said main canal shall be commenced within three years and completed in ten years, or the United States shall be entitled to receive the amount for which any of said land may have been previously sold, and that the title to purchasers under the Territory shall be valid."

From which I conclude that the Territory held that money in trust, not for its own use, but for the use of somebody else. That you will see by and by.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot in the chair.) The Senator from Wisconsin will suspend his remarks. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair, under the express rule of the Senate, to call up for consideration the special order of the day, the unfinished business of the last sitting, which is the bill (H. R. No. 395) to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, which is now before the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. (to Mr. SHERMAN.) Do you want to go on with that bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes; it has been laid aside now for three days, and if the Senate lay it aside again I do not know when we can get it up. This joint resolution for the relief of the State of Wisconsin, if it goes over, will be the unfinished business of the morning, and will come up regularly in the order of business to-morrow. I hope, therefore, the Senator will let it go over.

Mr. HARLAN. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that it would be better, perhaps, for the Senator from Wisconsin to conclude his argument now; and it will then appear connectedly in the Globe.

Mr. SHERMAN. That may take some time, and I do think that we ought now to go on with this public business which has been delayed for the last three days.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The special order can be set aside for the time by common consent; otherwise it can be done only by a formal vote of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Senator, probably what time he would desire in which to present his views.

Mr. HOWE. I should think three quarters of an hour or an hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator will allow this bill to be got out of the way. I do not wish to be discourteous; but I cannot consent to have this public bill laid aside for what I regard as a private claim.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bank bill is now before the Senate under the express rule of the Senate, and can be postponed only upon motion and by order of the Senate, on a motion and vote.

Mr. HOWE. I shall not submit a motion.

Mr. HARLAN. It has been usual in the Senate to permit a Senator on the floor in the midst of an argument to conclude his remarks, and I therefore submit a motion that the regular order be passed over informally until the Senator from Wisconsin concludes his speech.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am simply representing here the public interests, and I must call for the yeas and nays upon that motion.

Mr. GRIMES, (to Mr. Howe.) Which do you prefer?

Mr. HOWE. I should prefer to go on now, of course.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am sorry to see this struggle about the precedence of business; for my experience is that we lose more time in the struggle than we gain to either measure.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have made no struggle.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I agree with the Senator from Ohio that his is a public measure, and that this joint resolution is in one sense a private measure, though it affects a State; but I suggest to him, although it will be very unpleasant to set aside a measure of public importance like that of which he has charge, still, as the Senator from Wisconsin is in the midst of his remarks and prefers to go on now, I think we shall gain time by letting him go through with his remarks.

Mr. SHERMAN. It will take but a few moments to call the roll. I have no objection to other Senators voting to do that. I am simply considering myself in the discharge of a duty which is very unpleasant to me.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cardie, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nesmith, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Fessenden, Harding, Sherman, and Ten Eyck—5.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Foster, Hendricks, Hicks, Howard, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morrill, Pomeroy, Richardson, Sausbury, and Wright—15.

So the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The further consideration of the currency bill is postponed, and the joint resolution (S. No. 8) for the relief of the State of Wisconsin is before the Senate, on which the Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOWE. I am really obliged to the Senate for this kindness, and I will endeavor not to abuse it.

I was remarking that this first section which I had read made this grant to the Territory not for its own use or benefit, but for some other use, and what it was I shall state presently. According to my understanding of the act, it imposed no obligation, no responsibility, no liability upon that Territory whatever except to administer the trust, and pay over the money to whoever was entitled to it. The money arising from this grant was dedicated to the specific purpose of building this canal. There is this proviso, to wit:

"Provided, That said main canal shall be commenced within three years and completed in ten years, or the United States shall be entitled to receive the amount for which any of said land may have been previously sold, and that the title to purchasers under the Territory shall be valid."

This proviso has been argued by various persons as if it gave of itself the Government of the United States the right to demand of the Territory, or of the State which has succeeded the Territory, this fund in case the canal was not completed; that it imposed upon that Territory and to-day imposes upon the State the obligation to repay to the United States the proceeds of this grant if the canal was not completed. I dissent from that view of it altogether. It imposes no such obligation upon the Territory, and no obligation at all is imposed upon the Territory except to administer the trust according to the terms of this act. I deny altogether that the Territory was made to guaranty the completion of this work. The duty was not charged upon the Territory; the duty was charged upon the company. The company had been chartered by the Legislature of that Territory, but at that time the Territorial Legislature could not pass an act of any validity if the Congress of the United States dissented to it, and in this very act Congress gives its assent to that act of incorporation.

The act then goes on to fix the price of the land. It then provides in the fifth section that when the State of Wisconsin shall be created it shall be entitled to an amount of stock in this company equal to the whole amount of the proceeds of this grant which had been invested in the construction of the canal. But that stock was to be held by the State not for its own use. It could derive no benefit, no profit, no advantage from the stock. It was to be entitled to the earned dividends upon that stock; but those dividends were to be applied under the express terms of this act, first, to the extinguishment of the stock in the hands of individuals. When the stock of individuals was all extinguished, then the whole stock of the canal would be in the State; but to what end, or for what purpose? Not that the State might enjoy the toll or any profits from the operation of the canal; but to the end to make it a free water channel expressly restricted, in levying tolls, to levying so much only as should keep the canal in repair. Under the very terms of this act, therefore, neither the Territory of Wisconsin nor the State of Wisconsin could derive any benefit from this grant.

Now, I insist that it is not a fair, but a very unfair interpretation of this statute to say that it was a grant of this land to the Territory, which was a ward of the General Government, which, according to the theory of your own laws, could make no contract whatever and assume no liability whatever under her own contract; that it made this grant to a ward of the Government out of which that ward could get no benefit whatever under any circumstances, and yet imposed upon that ward the obligation of completing this canal.

This idea is enforced still further when you look at the tenth section, which provides

"That Congress"—

Not the Legislature of the Territory nor the Legislature of the State—

"That Congress may at any time until said Territory shall be admitted as a State, prescribe and regulate the tolls to be received by said company; and after said Territory shall be admitted as a State the Legislature thereof shall possess the like power; and said act of incorporation is hereby approved, subject to the modification and conditions aforesaid."

So that by this act you made this grant to the Territory; you enabled the Territory to sell the land; you instructed the Territory to pay over the money to this very company. You created in this act the very agency which should expend the money; you declared the very purpose for which it should be expended; and you provided that you yourselves would regulate the tolls to be imposed on this canal if it should be completed. There was no power in the world given to the Territory but to sell the land and pay over the money.

Now, from what clause of this act, or from what consideration, equitable or otherwise, arising on it, can any one assert that the Territory was made to guaranty the construction of this canal within ten years or within any time? If to-day Congress should undertake to make a grant of lands, or a grant of money, to any one of your Territories, and direct them to invest that fund in the stock of a particular company, specifying the company, and yet should instruct that Territory that they must see that a certain railroad to the Pacific, if you please, or anywhere else, should be completed within a given number of years, or that the Territory, having paid out this money, should pay it back again to the Government, would it not be thought a very onerous and very unjust imposition upon the Territory?

But the sixth section of this act makes the point that I am urging still clearer. No previous clause intimates that the Territory shall pay back this money under any circumstances whatever; but the sixth section of the act does say that the State of Wisconsin shall be held responsible to the United States for the payment into the Treasury thereof of the proceeds of these lands, unless the canal is completed; and if the seventh section had not followed it, it would have raised a strong argument in favor of the proposition that the State ought to refund the whole proceeds of this grant; but the seventh section declares:

"That in order to render effectual the provisions of this act, the Legislature of the State to be erected or admitted out of the territory now comprised in Wisconsin Territory, east of the Mississippi, shall give their assent to the same by act to be duly passed."

Thus the first political body which is made to assume any obligation under this act is not the Territory of Wisconsin, but the State of Wisconsin, and the State of Wisconsin is not made to assume any obligation under it until its Legislature shall have assented to it. The State of Wisconsin was not created until ten years after this grant had passed Congress. The time for completing the canal had then expired, or did expire that very season. The canal had not been completed. The State of course never did by its Legislature give its assent to this grant, and did not assume this obligation. It had got no value out of the grant. It had nothing in the world with which to respond for the proceeds of the grant. Of course it did not assent and never was asked to assent to the grant, and therefore this sixth section never became operative, never imposed any obligation upon the State.

But, sir, we nevertheless have an obligation. It is not the obligation, as I have said before, to refund to the United States the proceeds of this grant, but it is an obligation to refund to somebody, whoever is entitled to it, the company or the United States, that portion of the proceeds of the grant which we have not paid over at all. The simple fact is that after this enterprise of constructing the canal had been prosecuted for a series of years, the Legislature of the Territory of Wisconsin came to the conclusion that the canal was not likely to be completed; that it was likely to prove a failure. If then they went on paying over this money to the company, they came to the conclusion the canal never would be completed but the whole fund would be absorbed in it, and there would be nothing to repay to the Government or to repay to the company. Upon that idea the Legislature acted. It stopped paying over money to the company. It continued to sell the lands and it appropriated the proceeds to its own use.

The Senator from Maine the other day read some resolutions adopted by that Legislature which he construed into a covenant on the part of the Legislature, a pledge of its faith and of the State which was to succeed it, that it would refund these proceeds to the canal company. The Senator was mistaken about that. The Legislature did not undertake to repay these moneys to the canal company, but to restore them to the canal fund. They assumed the obligation of keeping the fund intact, ready to be paid over to whoever was entitled to it; and the question still is, whether the Government of the United States is entitled to it or the canal company. We have the fund; we are willing, as I said before, to pay it over to the Government or the company, and let it be taken out of the money which you owe us.

Thus, Mr. President, when the State of Wisconsin was admitted into the Union about one hundred and twenty-five thousand acres of these lands had been sold by the Territory; the canal had not been completed; there were about thirteen thousand acres of the grant unsold. At that time you agreed that we might take that thirteen thousand acres as a part of the five hundred thousand acres which you had promised to the State, and which you give to all States when they are admitted into the Union. That was a new contract between the State and the United States. We took that thirteen thousand acres, a part of the grant dedicated to this work, and we paid you for it by indorsing it on the five hundred thousand acres to which we were entitled.

Out of the proceeds derived from the one hundred and twenty-five thousand acres that we had sold—I speak in round numbers; that is not the exact number of acres—we had paid a certain portion to the canal company; the balance is in our hands. We are willing to dispose of it as you say is right. As I have already remarked, the resolution as it was introduced proposed to leave it in the Treasury. The resolution as it now stands amended by the committee proposes that at the same time you settle with us you shall settle with the canal company and ascertain how much of this fund is due to them, and it shall be paid to them. With that we are entirely content, of course. It ought to go to those to whom it is due, and you ought to settle with the canal company and ascertain how much of it is due to them. Whatever is due to them you ought to pay them.

In the Department of the Interior there is an account stated with the State of Wisconsin. We are credited on your books kept in that Department with this whole five per cent. fund. That is a clear recognition of an obligation to account to us for that fund under the act which I first read, the act of 1846. How have you discharged that obligation? In those same books it is discharged by charging the State of Wisconsin with these one hundred and twenty-five thousand acres of land at $2 50 an acre. Upon what principle is that charge made? First, they assume that the State was made liable under the terms of this grant to repay the United States for this grant in case the canal was not completed. I have already shown that no such obligation was imposed upon the Territory or the State by that act. They charge the lands to us at $2 50 an acre, because the sixth section of the act of 1838 said that that should be the price at which we should pay for them. I have already shown that we were not to pay for them at all until we agreed to do so by an act of the Legislature. Congress, you see, reasoned that the canal would be built; that the building of the canal would make the lands worth $2 50 an acre, and that they would sell for $2 50 an acre; but the canal never was built, the lands never were sold for $2 50 an acre, and the alternate sections which were reserved to the Government of the United States were reduced to $1 25 an acre; and yet we are charged with the granted sections at $2 50 an acre.

Now, what sort of dealing or transaction does that exhibit between the Government of the United States and the State of Wisconsin? First, you make a grant of one half of a given body of lands to the Territory. You instruct the Territory to sell those lands and pay the money over to an agent that you name. That agent has the unrestricted disposition of the money. We must pay it to the agent. It does what it pleases with it. It is directed, to be sure, to use it in the construction of this canal, but if it buys other lands, or sheep, or ships, or anything else, the Territory has no right and no power to control it, and is utterly helpless except it does what the Territory did do, stop paying over the money. We cannot control the expenditure of a dollar. It goes into the hands of the very agent you appoint. You tell us to do that; and yet you say, according to the theory on which this account is made up in the Interior Department, that if the canal is not built, if the work is not done which you designed to have done when you made the grant, if the agent which you appoint, and not which the Territory appoints, does not do its duty, then the Territory or the State shall pay you back twice what the lands are worth. The lands were then in market at $1 25 an acre. One half the lands were granted to us. You get $1 25 for one half, and, although the work is not done, you make us pay $2 50 for the other half. Is not that twice what the lands are worth? Do you not make ten shillings an acre on one half of that body of land by that mode of accounting? Because your agent does not do its duty, you get ten shillings for half the land and twenty shillings for the other half; whereas, before you made the grant, you offered the whole of them to anybody at ten shillings an acre. By this mode of accounting under your act and not under ours, you make $1 25 an acre out of the State of Wisconsin on one hundred and thirty-eight thousand acres of land. It is as clear as anything can be. The State gets no advantage whatever. The canal company does not build the canal.

The present Commissioner of the Land Office has reconsidered this subject, and is now very clearly of the opinion that the Government, if they had the right to charge the State of Wisconsin with anything, had no right to charge it for those lands at more than $1 25 an acre. In that view I believe he was sustained by the late Secretary of the Interior. We propose, therefore, in the resolution as it was introduced into the Senate, to account for those lands at $1 25 an acre, but we say that you should deduct from that as much money as we paid over to the company. I put it to the Senate if that is not just, if that ought not to be deducted. We paid it over to the company because you directed us to pay it over, and having paid it to the company in accordance with your direction to this agent appointed by yourselves, is there any honesty or any fairness or any justice in requiring us to pay it back again into the Treasury of the United States; to pay it twice? That is the question. All the money we have out of this grant we offer here to account for. That which we have paid over in accordance with your express instructions we do not want to account for, we cannot afford to account for, we ought not to account for.

Mr. President, I cannot conceive how I can make this claim any clearer than the preceding statement has made it, so far as it depends upon the terms of these two acts. I do not think there is a Senator on this floor who will stand up and say that, as a matter of law, the act of 1838, making this grant to the Territory of Wisconsin, imposed any obligation upon the Territory whatever, except to pay that money over to the company, or to the United States if it did not pay it over to the company. That we are willing to do.

But it is said by some that this liability of the State grows out of a subsequent act. When the people of Wisconsin formed their State constitution they assented, as I have said, to each one of these propositions upon which you promised us this five per cent. fund; but they passed some other resolutions asking Congress to do certain other things. They were not part of the constitution; they were not embodied in the constitution; but they were resolutions submitted to Congress and submitted to the people with the constitution. And among other things they ask you to permit them to apply this five per cent. fund to the support of common schools instead of applying it to the building of roads and canals. You assented to that, but you assented to it with this proviso:

"Provided, That the liabilities incurred by the territorial government of Wisconsin under the act entitled 'An act to grant a quantity of land to the Territory of Wisconsin for the purpose of aiding in opening a canal to connect the waters of Lake Michigan with those of Rock river,' shall be paid and discharged by said State."

Upon that proviso you were willing that we should apply this five per cent. fund to the support of schools instead of the making of roads and canals; and now upon that proviso there are those who argue that the State really agreed to pay back this whole fund as charged by the Secretary of the Interior. Would not that be a very extravagant interpretation to put upon that proviso? You had formerly proposed to us to pay us this fund, which now amounts to about two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, for a consideration. We paid you that consideration. You proposed to give it to us to be applied to roads and canals, and we paid you the consideration. Then we asked you to let us apply it to the support of schools instead of roads and canals; and according to this interpretation of the proviso you are made to say, "Yes, you may apply this $250,000 to the support of schools and not to the support of roads, provided you will pay us $313,000," which I believe is about the amount which you have charged against us now. You will let us apply $250,000 to schools instead of roads, provided we will not take the $250,000 at all, but will pay you about sixty-three thousand dollars in addition. That is the real English of that proviso, according to this interpretation. It is most extravagant, most unjust.

But, sir, I ask Senators to look at the terms of the proviso. We are called upon to assume nothing but the liabilities already incurred by the Territory of Wisconsin. What were those liabilities? I have already argued that there was no liability existing against the Territory of Wisconsin except to pay out the money which she derived from this grant. Part of it she had paid out, part she had not paid out, but has got it now and is willing to account for it. That is the only liability she had, and that is the only liability that is imposed upon the State by the terms of this proviso. If anybody can show me any other existing liability against the Territory of Wisconsin, I am at a loss to know where they will find it.

The Senator from Maine made some remarks the other day which I regretted extremely. I thought they were calculated if not intended to prejudice the Senate against this application of the State.

Mr. DAVIS. With the permission of the Senator I will ask him a question, and that is as to the present condition of the canal and the prospects of its completion.

Mr. HOWE. There is no prospect of the canal ever being completed. How much work was ever done on it I do not know precisely; but nothing in the likeness of a canal has ever been constructed. There was a race constructed along for a short distance by the Milwaukee river as it passed through the city of Milwaukee, and there are some dams there and some water-power created and used. There may be some locks. I do not know how that is. I never examined the work; but it does not extend probably more than two or three miles out of the city of Milwaukee and right along the bank of the river. There probably was work done outside of those limits; how far I do not know. It has probably been twenty years since there has been any work done on the canal.

The Senator from Maine commented upon the delay, the negligence, exhibited by the State of Wisconsin in prosecuting this claim. He spoke of it as if it was a claim sprung upon Congress at this time after we had slept upon it a great many years. Allow me to say, sir, we have not slept upon it at all, so far as I know. The Secretary of the Interior has recognized your liability all along from year to year; he has given the State of Wisconsin credit for the five per cent. of the proceeds of the public lands sold in that State. So we found upon your books our claim recognized just as we present it here. The difficulty in the way was that you charged us with funds which we denied our obligation to pay. We have constantly and uninterruptedly been endeavoring to persuade the Secretary of the Interior that that charge was unjust, to get him to correct it, and then our claim was recognized just as we insisted that it should be. The Secretary has disclaimed the authority to adjust this matter with us, and we are finally driven, after this long struggle with the Executive Departments of the Government, to come to Congress; and we are here. It is late, to be sure; but that is our misfortune and not our fault, and it is your great advantage; for you have had this money lying in your Treasury, and we have lost the interest of it all these years. You ought not to fine us, or punish us, or confiscate the claim because of that. We are here now, and we propose to stay here. I hope the Senate will at this time recognize the justice of this claim, which I believe is as palpable as if it rested upon one of your bonds, and that this will be the end of the controversy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose the resolution goes over, as a matter of course now, and the special order comes up. The motion was simply to postpone the special order until the Senator from Wisconsin concluded his remarks.

Mr. HOWE. If any one else wishes to discuss it, I am willing it should go over; but if we are prepared to take the vote now, I presume the Senator will not object.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present incumbent was not in the chair when the special order was laid aside, and was not aware of the nature of the motion.

Mr. HARLAN. I made the motion in this way, I believe—that was my intention—that the Senator from Wisconsin be permitted to conclude his argument. I will say to him that I desire to submit a very few remarks on the question before the final vote is taken.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope then it will go over. I move, if it is necessary to submit a motion, that this resolution be postponed and the special order of the day taken up.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 395) to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have an amendment that I desire to propose; but it is suggested to me that I had better offer it in the Senate, and therefore I will not offer it at present.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be on concurring in the Senate with the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. How shall the question be taken on the amendments, together or separately?

Mr. GRIMES. Separately.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be taken.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desired to offer an amendment in committee. I do not know that it is very material whether I offer it in committee or in the Senate. I understood the honorable Senator from Vermont had an amendment to submit, and I supposed that he would submit his amendment before I submitted mine.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desired to submit an amendment to an amendment of the committee, and I thought if we went into the Senate and passed on the amendments of the committee I should not have the liberty to offer my amendment before they were passed upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be taken up seriatim, and the Senator will have an opportunity to move an amendment to the amendments of the committee as they come along.

Mr. COLLAMER. If I can have it acted upon in the Senate, it is all very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no doubt on that point. The question will be on concurring in the first amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, which will be read.

The first amendment was in section one, line fourteen, after the word "President" to strike out the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;" so that the clause will read:

The chief officer of the said bureau shall be denominated the Comptroller of the Currency, and shall be under the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. He shall be appointed by the President, on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall hold his office for the term of five years, unless sooner removed by the President.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to renew the amendment that I offered when the bill was in committee to that amendment, which was, to insert in lieu of the words proposed to be stricken out the following words: "upon reasons to be communicated by him to the Senate." That amendment will accomplish the object had in view by the House of Representatives, and at the same time it will not invade the prerogatives of the President in making the removal.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on concurring in the amendment as amended, and declared that it was concurred in.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I addressed the Chair before that vote was declared. I should like to have the clause read as it will stand if that amendment is made.

The Secretary read, as follows:

He shall be appointed by the President, on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall hold his office for the term of five years unless sooner removed by the President, upon reasons to be communicated by him to the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest that nothing will be accomplished by that amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. It might be some restraint.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The man, when removed, is out of office, and whether the reasons are good, bad, or indifferent, does not change the fact. The object of the clause as it stood originally in the bill as it came from the House was that the officer should not be removable by the President at all of his own motion, but only upon the agreement of the Senate thereto. The Committee on Finance thought that that would be changing the rule that exists with reference to all other officers, and, although it is very desirable to have this officer as permanent as possible, yet in the recess of the Senate the President should have the power of removal, because the officer might be a bad one, and when the Senate was not in session it might be necessary to remove him immediately; and therefore they proposed to strike out the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." If the words suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania are added, the addition forms no sort of restraint on the President. He may remove him just as he could before, and give his reasons to the Senate when it meets. Those reasons may be entirely inconclusive, of no sort of consequence, but the removal will stand and the matter will remain just as it was before. I do not see the propriety of requiring him to give reasons in a particular case when we effect nothing by it, and we impose no restraint whatever upon the President by doing it. I should be opposed therefore to adding those words.

Mr. BUCKALEW. By this amendment we do not check the power of the President, but we limit his discretion, and he will not exercise this power unless he has good reasons for it. I think it is a very prudent and proper check, especially as this officer is to control these large moneyed interests. It is the policy of the Government that the President shall not have combined in him all power over the purse of the country and the money affairs of the country further than it is absolutely necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In order that there may be no mistake in regard to the question, the Chair will state that the amendment or the Senator from Pennsylvania to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was carried, and the Chair was putting the question on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as amended when the Senator from Maine rose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I shall not object to the amendment to the amendment if gentlemen wish it inserted; but it strikes me it is mere form, and amounts to nothing.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think it is some restraint upon the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will again put the question on concurring in the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section one, line twenty-nine, in the clause relating to the duties of the Comptroller of the Currency, after the word "responsible" to strike out the words "freeholders as," so that it will read "two responsible sureties."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section three, line seven, after the word "plates" to insert "not necessarily in the possession of engravers or printers," so that it will read:

That there shall be assigned to the Comptroller of the Currency by the Secretary of the Treasury suitable rooms in the Treasury building for conducting the business of the Currency Bureau, in which shall be safe and secure fire-proof vaults, in which it shall be the duty of the Comptroller to deposit and safely keep all the plates not necessarily in the possession of engravers or printers.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section six, line eight, after the word "particular" to insert "county and;" so that the clause will read:

Second. The place where its operations of discount and deposit are to be carried on, designating the State, Territory, or district, and also the particular county and city, town, or village.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section six, line nineteen, after the word "and" to insert the words "such certificate with;" and in line twenty-one after the word "notary" to strike out the word "and;" so that the clause will read:

The said certificate shall be acknowledged before a judge of some court of record or a notary public, and such certificate, with the acknowledgment thereof authenticated by the seal of such court or notary, shall be transmitted to the Comptroller of the Currency, who shall record and carefully preserve the same in his office.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section nine, line six, after the word "State," to insert "Territory or district;" and in line nine to strike out the words "said State" and insert "the same;" so that the clause will read:

That the affairs of every association shall be managed by not less than five directors, one of whom shall be the president. Every director shall, during his whole term of service, be a citizen of the United States; and at least three fourths of the directors shall have resided in the State, Territory, or district in which such association is located one year next preceding their election as directors, and be residents of the same during their continuance in office.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section twelve, line nineteen, after the word "shares" to strike out the following words:

Except that the shareholders of any banking association having not less than $5,000,000 actually paid in as its capital stock shall be liable as aforesaid only to the amount invested in their shares.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

Except that the shareholders of any banking association now existing under State law, and having a capital stock not less than $5,000,000 actually paid in, and a surplus fund of twenty per cent. of its capital stock actually on hand, shall be liable only to the loss of the amount invested in their shares so long as said surplus fund shall remain undiminished.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to offer an amendment in lieu of the amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole. It is to strike out all of the clause, as it now stands, after the word "except," and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That shareholders of any banking association now existing under State laws, having not less than $5,000,000 of capital actually paid in, and a surplus of twenty per cent. on hand, both to be determined by the Comptroller of the Currency, shall be liable only to the amount invested in their shares; and such surplus of twenty per cent. shall be kept undiminished, and be in addition to the surplus provided for in this bill. And if at any time there shall be any deficiency in said surplus of twenty per cent., the said banking association shall not pay any dividends to its shareholders until such deficiency shall be made good; and in case of such deficiency the Comptroller of the Currency may compel said banking association to close its business and wind up its affairs under the provisions of this act.

This amendment has been framed to meet the criticism that was made upon the amendment of the committee. It was objected that the surplus provided for as to the Bank of Commerce was not in addition to the surplus provided for all banks. This proposition makes that clear and distinct. It was also objected that there was no way of compelling the surplus to be kept undiminished. By the amendment I now offer, the Comptroller of the Currency is required in such a case to wind up the bank, so that it makes it clear and obvious. The surplus of twenty per cent. to be kept undiminished is in lieu of and in place of the individual liability of the stockholders.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, this idea of making a distinction in behalf of one great moneyed corporation of the country when we are establishing what its friends call a "uniform system of banking," is so exceedingly abhorrent to my sense of fair play, of justice, and equity among the different corporations and citizens of the country, that I think it incumbent upon me to ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of this amendment and all others that are calculated to confer this exclusive privilege upon anybody or any institution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire the yeas and nays upon the amendment to the amendment?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir, and all other amendments that will authorize one bank in this country to become a bank of issue without any personal liability, when we require the stockholders of every other bank in the country to be thus responsible.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not sure that I understand the amendment of the committee, or the proposed substitute offered by the member from Ohio. Does the amendment of the committee make the shareholders of the bank personally responsible?

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought I had explained this before sufficiently, but I will now make the explanation over again. The only bank that would be described by these words is the Bank of Commerce, of the city of New York; a bank with a capital of $9,000,000.

Mr. MORGAN. Ten millions.

Mr. SHERMAN. Ten millions, the Senator informs me. I supposed it was nine. It has a surplus of twenty per cent. on its capital stock actually paid in. It is a bank organized under articles of association, not under the laws of the State. It was originally organized as a partnership, all the stockholders signing the articles of partnership or articles of association. By those articles, the directors were empowered to accept any charter either from the General Government or from the State government, without any qualification as to the conditions or terms, except that they were to accept no charter which would make the stockholders individually liable. The articles of association were drawn by Chancellor Kent, and it was supposed that the bank would supersede or take the place of the Bank of the United States. The only restriction upon the powers of the directors in accepting a charter was that they could not accept one which would make the stockholders individually liable. This was a restraint upon them.

The Bank of Commerce is very desirous to come in under this general banking law in order to make a uniform banking system. The Government, the Secretary of the Treasury especially, thinks it very important to get this large bank to take the lead in changing these institutions from State banks into national banks. It is deemed of vital importance. We do not wish to give this Bank of Commerce any privilege whatever that we do not give to any other banks, but the trouble is that they cannot, under their articles of association, come in and become a bank under this law without the assent of every stockholder, and that is a condition impossible to be performed. It is represented to us that the stockholders are scattered all over the world, and many of them are minors; some in Cuba, some in France, some in England. There are twenty-five hundred of them; and it is a well-settled principle of the law of partnership that a change of this kind cannot be effected without the assent of every person interested, and every stockholder would have to signify his assent.

Under these circumstances, we deemed the importance of getting this bank into this system sufficient to waive the rule as to the general liability of stockholders; but as a substitute for the individual liability of the stockholders we require this bank to keep $2,000,000 of surplus banking capital paid up in full; we require them to keep it undiminished, and if they ever allow that surplus to fall below the minimum, then the Comptroller of the Currency is required to wind them up under the general provisions of the act, which are very severe.

I will agree with the Senator from Iowa that there ought to be no exception made in favor of the Bank of Commerce or any other bank, if the reasons were not sufficient to induce the exception. I would not grant it simply to do a favor to the Bank of Commerce, or any other bank; but the circumstances of the case are such that the Committee on Finance, after a patient and careful examination of the whole matter, with some reluctance agreed to make an exception for this bank. They believed that good might result from it, and that we had so far restrained and limited them that the privilege was not for their benefit, but for the benefit of the Government. As for the surplus, I have not a doubt, and I think the Senator from Iowa must himself see that a surplus of twenty per cent., amounting to $2,000,000, constantly kept on hand is more than equivalent to any personal individual liability of stockholders for the amount of their shares. It so seemed to us, and therefore we reported the amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON. The amendment is not confined to the Bank of Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN. The descriptive words are such as to describe no other bank in the United States. If I were legislating solely on my own view, I would rather say the Bank of Commerce may do so and so; but it was deemed better to use descriptive words. In speaking of this matter, I speak of the Bank of Commerce because I do not wish to mislead or deceive any one. It is the only bank with a capital exceeding $5,000,000 organized under State law. That is a fact of public notoriety, and the descriptive words can reach no other and would apply to no other bank. The bill as it came to us from the House of Representatives described all banks with a capital of $5,000,000, but the amendment of the Committee on Finance expressly describes only banks organized under State laws with a capital exceeding $5,000,000 and with a surplus of twenty per cent. I can state with perfect confidence that there is no such bank in the United States except the Bank of Commerce, and that is the only bank that can avail itself of the privileges of this amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. But there is nothing to prevent the States from chartering banks with a capital exceeding $5,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. It only applies to those now existing.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not speaking of existing banks.

Mr. SHERMAN. The descriptive words of the amendment are "banking association now existing under State law."

Mr. HENDERSON. I will suggest to the Senator from Ohio that I think this amendment will include the American State Bank of New York, which has a capital of $5,000,000. The Bank of Commerce has $10,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have conversed with a great many bankers and gentlemen opposed to this proposition, and they say expressly that there is no other bank that comes within these descriptive words.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is stated in a work that I have here, which has been recently published, and I have no doubt of its correctness.

Mr. SHERMAN. The cashier of this bank, George S. Cole, was here personally, and bore testimony that no other bank was included. They may not have the surplus on hand.

Mr. HENDERSON. That may be.

Mr. SHERMAN. If Senators desire to do so they may increase the amount from five to six or seven millions; but I am sure that the descriptive words of the amendment do not include that bank, or any other bank, except the Bank of Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio to the amendment adopted in committee, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. MORRILL, is absent on account of sickness.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harris, Johnson, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Wiley—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Collamer, Davis, Doolittle, Grimes, Harding, Henderson, Nemith, Powell, Riddle, Trumbull, and Wilson—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Cowan, Harlan, Hendricks, Hicks, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Richardson, Saulsbury, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section sixteen, line twenty-two, after the word "desire" to insert the words "to reduce its capital or," and after the word "act" at the end of the section to add "nor from taking up the bonds upon which no circulating notes have been delivered;" so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall prevent an association that may desire to reduce its capital or to close up its business and dissolve its organization from taking up its bonds upon returning to the Comptroller its circulating notes in the proportion hereinafter named in this act, nor for taking up the bonds upon which no circulating notes have been delivered.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section nineteen, line four, after the word "States" to insert "in trust for the association;" so that it will read:

That all transfers of United States bonds which shall be made by any association under the provisions of this act shall be made to the Treasurer of the United States, in trust for the association; &c.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section nineteen, line twenty-four, after the word "kind" to insert the words "and numerical designation," and in line twenty-five, after the word "of" to insert the word "the;" so that the clause will read:

And it shall be the duty of the Comptroller, immediately upon countersigning and entering the same, to advise by mail the association from whose account such transfer was made of the kind and numerical designation of the bonds and the amount thereof so transferred.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section twenty-two, line twenty, after the word "same" to insert the word "to."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section twenty-four, line four, before the word "destruction" to strike out the words "loss or."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section twenty-five, line two, to strike out the words "either the president or cashier of;" so that it will read:

That it shall be the duty of every banking association; &c.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section twenty-five, line twelve, before the word "agent" to insert the words "officer or."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section twenty-six, line twenty, after the word "Comptroller" to insert the following words:

Upon the terms prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, may permit an exchange to be made of any of the bonds deposited with the Treasurer by an association for other bonds of the United States authorized by this act to be received as security for circulating notes, if he shall be of opinion that such an exchange can be made without prejudice to the United States; and he.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section twenty-six, lines twenty-nine and thirty, to strike out the words "shall not diminish" and insert the word "that;" and in line thirty-one, after the word "Treasurer" to insert the words "shall not be diminished;" so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That the remaining bonds which shall have been transferred by the banking association offering to surrender circulating notes shall be equal to the amount required for the circulating notes not surrendered by such banking association, and that the amount of bonds in the hands of the Treasurer shall not be diminished below the amount required to be kept on deposit with him by this act.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section twenty-seven, line eleven, to strike out the word "or" and insert "and."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section twenty-eight, line seven, after the word "security" to strike out the words "for loans made by such association in the usual course of its banking business, or for money due thereto," and to insert "for debts previously contracted;" so that it will read:

That it shall be lawful for any such association to purchase, hold, and convey real estate, as follows:

First. Such as shall be necessary for its immediate accommodation in the transaction of its business.

Second. Such as shall be mortgaged to it in good faith by way of security for debts previously contracted.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was to add at the end of section twenty-eight the following words:

Nor shall it hold the possession of any real estate under mortgage, or hold the title and possession of any real estate purchased to secure any debt due to it, for a longer period than five years.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section twenty-nine, line four, to strike out the words "a rate not exceeding seven per cent. per annum" and to insert in lieu thereof:

The rate allowed by the laws of the State or Territory where the bank is located, and no more. And when no rate is fixed by the laws of the State or Territory, the bank may take, receive, reserve, or charge a rate not exceeding seven per cent.

Mr. GRIMES. I hope the Senate will not concur in that amendment, and that, after having done that, they will strike out the word "seven" in the fourth line, and insert the word "six," so as to make the uniform rate of interest six per cent. instead of seven.

This bill purports to be a bill to provide a national currency, and its friends claim that it is to have a uniform operation all through the country. Let me tell the Senate how it will operate in the State of which I happen to be a citizen and a representative, in part, in this body. In the State of Iowa the legal rate of interest is six per cent., but where special contracts are entered into the parties can receive ten per cent. Under this bill as it stands each one of these national banks can receive ten per cent. on all its discounts and all its monetary transactions, while in the adjacent States the rate will be only six per cent. In the State of Illinois, just across the river from where I live, the rate of interest will be only six per cent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The law of Illinois is precisely like that of Iowa. Six per cent. is the legal rate of interest, but they may charge ten by special contract.

Mr. GRIMES. I thought they changed the law a few years ago in Illinois. Then in the States of Illinois and Iowa the banks may take ten per cent. under this law on all money transactions, while in the States adjacent they can only take six per cent. A few years ago when we established a banking system in our State—one that is entirely satisfactory to the people, and which they are not so extremely anxious to have overthrown as the people of some of the States seem to be desirous that theirs should be overthrown by this system—it was provided that banks under that system should be entitled to receive ten per cent. until a certain time, and then after the lapse of a certain number of years, which have already elapsed, they were authorized to take eight per cent.; and that is the rate of interest they are now authorized to receive. After the lapse of a certain other number of years, I believe, the interest is to be reduced to six per cent.; that will be in a couple of years more. Then we shall have in the State of Iowa banks under this charter receiving ten per cent., and the banks under the State authorities receiving only six per cent.; and it will produce a condition of things which will not be desirable.

This is no time to be increasing the rate of interest. We should not raise the rate of interest in those States where six per cent. is now the legal rate of interest to seven per cent. We should certainly not interfere with those States to increase the rate of interest one seventh; but it would be infinitely better to bring it down in the two States only (I think Michigan and New York) where seven per cent. is the legal rate, from seven to six per cent.

Mr. POMEROY. I only desire to say that I think a uniform rate of interest is desirable and ought to be fixed in this bill, if it is a bill to establish a national currency, because if we leave the rate of interest to be established by the States and Territories (and the bill allows banks to be organized in Territories) what will be the result? In some States they make that legal which the parties agree to. In my State, for instance, that rate is legal which parties to the instrument agree to at the time they execute it, not exceeding twenty per cent.; and it will be so in the Territories where there may be a bank and where there is no rate of interest established by law. I think we should have a uniform rate of interest. I do not agree entirely with the Senator from Iowa that it should be six per cent., but I think seven per cent. should be the uniform rate. I insist on that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I cannot agree with the Senator from Iowa or the Senator from Kansas as to the propriety of striking this out; nor do I appreciate their reasoning that because this bill provides for a national currency the rate of interest everywhere must be uniform. Money is worth more in some portions of the country than in others. Money commands a higher rate of interest in new sections of the country than it does in the old. There is less capital there and more demand for money. This provision of the bill is not an interference with the States, but on the other hand an agreement with the States. It allows the same rate of interest in a State which is allowed by the laws of the State.

Mr. GRIMES. But the law of my State, if the Senator will permit me, declares that a bank in that State shall only receive eight per cent., and that after a certain number of years longer a bank shall only receive six per cent. But your banks under this law can receive ten per cent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Your Legislature in Iowa may regulate that if they think proper; but how is a bank to succeed in the State of Iowa, or in the State of Illinois, or any of the western States under this bill if you limit the rate of interest to six or seven per cent.? The banks we have established in the West receive a higher rate of interest than that; individuals receive a higher rate of interest. The Senator from Iowa tells us that the banks in Iowa are limited at this time to a certain amount. It will be competent for the Legislature of Iowa, if it thinks proper, and this bill passes—

Mr. GRIMES. The banks in your State are limited to six per cent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That may be so. It will be competent for the Legislatures of the several States to control this matter; but I do not think any banks will be established under this bill in the West; if any benefit is to be derived from these banking institutions, I do not think we shall have it in the West at all, if you fix the rate of interest at six per cent. That is the very reason national banks have not been established in the State of Illinois. I was told by leading bankers of Chicago that they would not undertake to enter upon a system of banking under this provision. The law of last year provided that no higher rate of interest should be allowed than the legal rate established in the State. In the State of New York seven per cent. was allowed; in the State of Illinois six per cent. is the rate of interest; but the law allows parties to contract to pay a higher rate of interest, not exceeding ten per cent. Under the law as it originally stood a bank established in Illinois could only charge six per cent., while a bank in the State of New York, where money was less valuable than in Illinois, could charge seven per cent. I think, if any good is to arise from these banking institutions, the law should be so framed that they may be established in all parts of the country; and it is no interference with State authorities, or with the authority of the different States, to control this rate of interest. The State of Kansas may do it, or the State of Iowa, or the State of Illinois, or any State, and there can be no complaint by the people of these States if it is left to the control of their Legislatures; but the bill will be worthless in a large portion of the country if a uniform low rate of interest is fixed, and no banks will be established under it.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me very clear that in establishing this system we ought to follow the idea of uniformity as much as possible. I therefore go with the Senator from Kansas in suggesting that we certainly should not refer this matter to the States; we ought to determine it here in the bill one way or the other. I do not mean now to say whether it should be six per cent. or seven per cent., nor do I mean to say whether there should be any limitation. That is a question which Senators do not seem to have approached. I understand that in England—

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me before he proceeds?

Mr. SUMNER. I have only a word to say.

Mr. CONNESS. I was only going to make a suggestion.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand that in England all usury laws have been repealed and there is now no limitation on the rate of interest which the Bank of England may demand. That is a great question on which a great deal may be said on both sides. I know something of the argument as it has been presented on each side. The framers of this bill, however, seem to have settled that question in advance, and to have determined that we should fix a certain rate of interest. I am not disposed to raise that question, but I am clear that if we undertake to fix the rate of interest we should do so positively, definitively, and not leave it hereafter to be determined by the different States.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts how much chance there would be or what prospect there would be to induce the investment of capital in this mode of banking in the State which I in part represent here, if we fix the rate of interest arbitrarily at either six or seven per cent., which seems to be the average rates allowed by the States of the East? Our legal rate of interest is ten per cent. in the absence of a contract, while a special contract may be made fixing the rate of interest at any rate the parties may agree to. It may be that we shall never have a bank established in that State under this law, but there are a great many good people in that State, and a great many clear thinkers, who believe that if this system of banking was extended to the State, capital would find its way there for both public and private improvements when it could be obtained at ten per cent. per annum, very much more rapidly than the use of capital can be obtained there now while the really current rates may be stated to be perhaps two or two and a half per cent. a month, or the equivalent of twenty-four or twenty-five per cent. per annum.

I know that the Senator from Massachusetts wishes to arrive at right conclusions; and I ask him to take this matter into consideration. As has been suggested, if this provision be objectionable to any State, let the State fix the rate of interest that shall be charged within its borders, or let the State adapt itself to the seven per cent. fixed here in the absence of a State regulation. It occurs to me that it would certainly be fatal to the application of this system to a very large, important, and growing portion of the country where capital at a cheap rate is more necessary than in any other part of the country, to arbitrarily fix a rate of interest so low that money cannot be obtained for it. You might as well add to this act a proviso: "Provided, That nothing contained herein shall ever be held to apply to the State of California or to the Pacific coast." A provision to fix arbitrarily the rate of interest at six or seven per cent. would be just as effectual as the proviso that I suggest. I hope Senators will adopt no such provision. Some measures may have been taken prior to this period of time for the establishment in my State of the banking system contemplated in this act; and I should certainly very much dislike to see such a provision introduced into this act as would inhibit and make it impossible to establish a circulation in that country.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to insert after the word "the," in the fifth line, the word "legal," and to strike out the word "allowed" and to insert "established;" so as to read, "interest at the legal rate established by the laws of the State or Territory where the bank is located." As I understand it, the case is this: the legal rate established by law in my State, for instance, is six per cent., but by special contract parties are authorized to receive ten per cent. I want these banks to stand exactly on the same footing with everybody else where there is not a special contract. I do not want every contract made between a bank and private individuals to be regarded as a special contract, and excepted from the general rule that prevails in the State, and then allow these banks to take a greater percentage than is allowed to the local banks.

It is said that the State of Illinois and the State of Iowa may change their interest laws if they are dissatisfied with this. They have already established their interest laws. They say that they do not want a bank to receive more than six per cent. in the State of Illinois; and they say in the State of Iowa that a bank after two years from this time shall receive only six per cent., and now you propose by your legislation to change that. The Senator from Illinois says that because the legal rate of interest of the State was established in the national bank law of last year, to which this is an amendment or supplement, and that is only six per cent., they have not established any national banks in the State of Illinois.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I did not say that none had been established. Some have been established, but they are small banks. The system has not been generally gone into.

Mr. GRIMES. It has not been gone into because the bankers in Chicago can make more money by keeping out of it than they can by going in at present, for they are mere dealers in the shipplasters of eastern banks, and so long as they continue to be dealers in the issues of those banks they will not go into banking operations under this bill. But if the Senator will go over to the State of Iowa he will find that under the law of last year, under which the rate of interest is only six per cent., a national bank has been established in almost every county town in the State, and there has not been the slightest idea on the part of the bankers who have thus invested their money that they were going to have the rate of interest increased. This will be a perfect windfall, a godsend to them if it passes, and allows them to take four per cent. more than they supposed they were to obtain under the act by which they were incorporated.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that better words would be "general" and "fixed;" so as to read, "the general rate of interest fixed." Of course these special rates are as much legal as the general rate.

Mr. GRIMES. I so modify my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa as modified is to insert the word "general" before "rate," and after the word "rate" to insert "fixed," striking out the word "allowed;" so as to make the clause read, "the general rate fixed by the laws of the State or Territory;" &c.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should be very glad to assent to any reasonable amendment; but it seems to me that this would be making a discrimination in favor of the State banks and against the banks organized under this law; and this proposition, so far as I know, will not affect the banks in any State but Iowa, and perhaps Illinois. Why should we discriminate against these banks in favor of the State banks? If by the policy of the laws of Iowa it is deemed necessary to allow the banks of Iowa to charge eight per cent. interest up to a certain time, why not extend that same privilege to the banks organized under this act?

Mr. GRIMES. I think that between twenty and thirty banks have been established in the State of Iowa under the law to which this bill is an amendment, with the perfect understanding that they were to receive six per cent. interest on their loans, and no more. I ask the Senator from Ohio who has charge of this bill if he has received any intimation, any petition, any request, from any of the representatives of those banks, asking that the rate of interest should be raised from six per cent., which they are drawing now, to ten per cent., which would be authorized by this bill as it stands.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir, not at all; and in the State of Ohio, where this system has been more generally adopted than in any other State of the Union, our laws allow but six per cent., and their forfeitures are severe. That, however, is not the point I wish to make. The State of Iowa has it in her power at any time to repeal this exemption in favor of the State banks; but while those banks are organized and exist there, and have the privilege of receiving eight per cent. interest, I do not see any reason why the same privilege should not be extended to the national banks. The reason why I am opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is that if adopted it will continue in existence the State banks that are entitled to the special privilege of taking a greater rate of interest than will be conferred by the general law on the national banks. I hope to see all these State banks induced to come into the national system, and thus have uniformity. I should prefer a general uniform rate of interest, six or seven per cent.; but that has been found to be impracticable. The States vary on that question. New York, Michigan, Wisconsin, and one or two other States fix the rate of interest at seven per cent., while in New England and Pennsylvania and Ohio it is six per cent. We found that the attempt to fix a uniform rate of interest would create so many disputes and rivalries and troubles that we finally had to yield that point, though I believe the fixed rate of seven per cent. ought to be established for all these banks. I say seven per cent. because that is the law of the State of New York, where most of the heavy commercial transactions of this country are carried on, and to fix a lower rate than seven per cent. by the general banking law would be to exclude the national banks in the State of New York. But I have yielded my opinion on that subject, and I hope the amendment of the committee, which was very carefully considered, will be allowed to stand.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator makes an appeal to the Senate in behalf of the national banks in my State; and he says there will be great injustice done to them because the State banks are permitted under the present law of my State to draw eight per cent. interest. There has been no clamor from the twenty or more national banks in my State on this subject. They have not been dissatisfied with the rate of interest they are now authorized to receive, which is only six per cent. They have not been importuning Congress, in this branch or the other, to be permitted to nearly double the rate of interest they expected to receive when their banks were organized, and they made a contract with the Government and with the people of that State that they would transact their money business at the rate of six per cent. interest. Why does the Senator constitute himself a special defender and protector of these national banks in my State? They are not injured. They do not claim that they have been injured. They have sent no petition or request to the Committee on Finance, as the Senator himself has told us. But it is said we may go to the next Legislature and ask them to change our interest laws. The Legislature of our State has just adjourned and will not meet again for nearly two years. In the mean time divers banks will be established under this law, and they will be authorized by this law if the bill stands as it is to receive ten per cent. interest, and then they will come here and make a pitiful mouth and say they had a special or implied contract with the Government that they should be permitted to receive ten per cent. interest; and in the mean time, during the two years that will elapse before the meeting of our General Assembly, these banks will be shaving the people at the rate of ten per cent. interest, getting nearly double the amount of money into their treasury from the people that they expected to receive when they entered into the corporation and made the contract with us to carry on banking at the rate of six per cent. interest.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him if by the laws of Iowa the banks cannot by special agreement receive more than six per cent.?

Mr. GRIMES. They can receive eight per cent. at this time, but the banks are excluded from the general law which authorizes private individuals to take ten per cent.

Mr. JOHNSON. But they can now take eight per cent. by agreement.

Mr. GRIMES. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. And in the absence of agreement they only get six per cent.

Mr. POMEROY. What do the national banks get?

Mr. GRIMES. Six per cent. A large number of them have been established all over Iowa, charging six per cent.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator says that by the amendment which he proposes the banks to be constituted under this act are only to receive the general rate of interest fixed by the laws of the State. Is it meant by that to say that these banks are not to receive eight per cent.?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir; and that is the case with the national banks that are now there; having been established under the law as it now stands, they can charge but six per cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator says that I wish to change the law in favor of the national banks in Iowa. The act of last year under which they are organized is the same as the amendment now proposed by the Committee on Finance, so that their rights and privileges will be precisely the same under the new act as under the old. The words are almost identical and have the same legal effect.

Mr. POMEROY. I did not understand the Senator from Iowa before. I understand him now that he is willing the State banks shall receive eight per cent. and the national banks six per cent. Is that it?

Mr. GRIMES. I have not anything to do with being willing or unwilling to say what the State banks shall receive. I take the laws as they stand. Iowa allowed her banks to take ten per cent. for a time, and then to come down to eight per cent. for a series of years, but at a certain time to come down to six per cent. In the mean time Congress comes in and creates new banks under the law to which this is a supplement, and banks have been created under that law. I do not want these new banks to be drawing ten per cent. interest while the citizens take but six per cent., and that rate is the uniform law of the State except for special contracts, and when under the act incorporating the State banks they can only receive eight per cent.

Mr. POMEROY. May I inquire of the Senator, then, what is actually the rate of interest which the national banks now established in his State receive?

Mr. GRIMES. I understand that it is six per cent.

Mr. POMEROY. It cannot be so if that is not the rate established by the law of the State.

Mr. GRIMES. Why not?

Mr. POMEROY. I understand the law we passed last year fixed the rate of interest for the national banks precisely at the rate fixed by the law of the State, and this amendment of the committee is the same thing.

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. The same thing precisely.

Mr. GRIMES. I beg the Senator's pardon. Here is the law of last winter:

"Every association may take, reserve, receive, and charge on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidence of debt, such rate of interest or discount as is for the time the established rate of interest for delay in the payment of money."

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator wishes the word "established" before "rate," I am perfectly willing to put it in here.

Mr. GRIMES. I was going to show the Senator that the law of last winter is not the law he proposes to enact now. That was "the established rate of interest" by the law of the State. What was the rate established? Six per cent. was the rate established by the laws of the State, but there was an exception which declared that when private individuals chose to make a special contract as between themselves the rate of interest might be as high as ten per cent. Now let me read to the honorable Senator what he proposes: "Interest at the rate allowed," not "established"—"at the rate allowed by the laws of the State." Ten per cent. was allowed by the laws of the State, but ten per cent. was not the "established" law of the State. I apprehend that there is not a Senator who does not see that there is a very wide difference between the law of last winter, which authorized them to take the rate of interest "established" by the laws of the State, and this act which it is proposed to pass into a law, allowing them to take the rate which may be "allowed" by the laws of the State, which runs up as high as ten per cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will agree at once to substitute the word "established" for "allowed." There is no difference between the legal meaning of the word "allowed" and the word "established." The legal effect is the same.

Mr. GRIMES. I am content with that; I will compromise with the Senator and take the word "established."

Mr. SHERMAN. I will move to insert the word "established" instead of "allowed."

Mr. GRIMES. I will withdraw my amendment to get that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa withdraws his amendment, and the Senator from Ohio moves to amend the amendment by striking out "allowed" and inserting "established."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to make a suggestion in reference to this matter to the Senator from Ohio who has charge of the bill. I see a difficulty that will come up in my State under the laws in regard to interest. The clause now reads: "The rate established by the laws of the State or Territory where the bank is located," &c. Money due (without a contract as to the rate of interest) in the State of Missouri draws six per cent.; by special contract between individuals it may draw an interest of ten per cent.; but under the banking laws of the State of Missouri, where circulation is loaned, a bank of issue is permitted only to deduct eight per cent. where the interest is deducted before the maturity of the note, at the time of the loan. Eight per cent. is the extent of what we call bank interest.

There are several banks of issue in my State; and I should like to be informed in that state of the law what will be the rate of interest charged in the State of Missouri by the national banks. If there is no rate agreed upon when money is due, the rate is six per cent., but parties may agree to ten per cent., though a bank of issue can only charge eight per cent. Now what is the rate "established" under the amendment as it now stands? I desire to put in some amendment of this sort, and I think it would cure the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Iowa: let the word "allowed" remain, and say "the rate allowed to be charged by banks of issue under the laws of the State or Territory where the bank is located, and no more."

Mr. CONNESS. I suggest to the Senator that that would not answer for States and Territories where no banks of issue are established.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was aware of that difficulty, and I was going to suggest that that difficulty could be remedied by an amendment providing that if banks should be established under this act in States where no banks of issue now exist, the Legislature may fix the rate of interest. In that way I think all difficulty will be provided against, and I hope the Senator from Iowa will permit the bill to be amended in that way.

Mr. GRIMES. I have no objection to it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The word "established," which has been substituted for the word "allowed," is the same word which is in the act of 1863, but there are in that act additional words which are necessary in this act to render it free from ambiguity. Section forty-six of the act of 1863 reads in this way:

"Such rate of interest or discount as is for the time the established rate of interest for delay in the payment of money, in the absence of contract between the parties, by the laws of the several States."

These words "in the absence of contract between the parties," which are in the act of 1863, I think ought to be inserted in this act.

Mr. SHERMAN. That would change the meaning undoubtedly.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then they could charge more.

Mr. COLLAMER. No; these words were only descriptive of the law.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. By inserting these words after the word "located" the clause will read:

"That every association may take, receive, reserve, and charge on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidences of debt, interest at the rate established by the laws of the State or Territory where the bank is located, in the absence of contract between the parties, and no more."

That will make it definite, I think.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know; but that is not what the Senator from Iowa wants.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from Iowa, as I understand, desires to have the rate of interest which these associations are allowed to receive the rate which is established in the various States and Territories by law in the absence of special contract to the contrary.

Mr. SHERMAN. The question that is now made by the Senator from Wisconsin is very different—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will allow the Chair to understand what the question is. Did the Chair understand the Senator from Missouri as proposing an amendment?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then that will be first in order.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to offer an amendment because the clause as it now stands, if I understand it, will seriously affect loaning in my State; and the effect will be that any banks established there under this law may charge ten per cent. under special contract when no other bank of issue in the State can charge more than eight per cent.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Allow me to inquire whether in the State of Missouri the law of that State does not fix a given rate of interest to be paid for the loan of money, in the absence of a special contract between the parties.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. What is the rate?

Mr. HENDERSON. Six per cent.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Then the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa with the additional words which I propose to insert would fix the rate of interest at six per cent. in Missouri under these associations.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to allow these banks to charge just exactly what other banks of issue in the State charge. I do not want to make any difference between them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to know whether the Senator from Missouri proposes his amendment to the Senate.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported.

The Secretary read the amendment to the amendment, as follows:

After the word "established" strike out "by" and insert "to be charged by banks of issue under;" so as to read:

The rate established to be charged by banks of issue under the laws of the State; &c.

Mr. SHERMAN. Suppose there are no banks of issue in the State; in some States the constitution prohibits the establishment of banks of issue, and there are no State laws regulating that; what then?

Mr. HENDERSON. Perhaps these words should be added:

And when no such rate of interest is fixed by the laws of the State or Territory, the bank may take, receive, reserve, or charge a rate not exceeding the rate allowed upon special contract between individuals.

That will cover the whole case.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I regret that the word "allowed" has been changed to the word "established." It was done under the impression on the part of some Senators that it does not alter the meaning of the law, and others think it would give a very different meaning to the law. My impression is that it would change the character of the law entirely to alter the word "allowed" to "established."

The rate established by the laws of the State of Illinois is six per cent. That is the established rate of interest in my State, but the law provides that parties may by special contract agree to pay a higher rate of interest; but that is not the "established" rate of interest; that is "allowed;" and if you leave the word "allowed" here, it is just right. The committee had the amendment in a perfect shape, as I think, as they reported it to the Senate, and I regret very much that the word "allowed" has been changed to the word "established."

While I am up I wish to reply to the Senator from Iowa in regard to the banks of my State. He assumes that the banks in Illinois can charge but six per cent. I thought he was mistaken at the time. I have since inquired of gentlemen conversant with the banking institutions of our State, and they tell me that it is so, that the law in the absence of a contract fixes the rate of interest of the banks at six per cent., but the banks of Illinois may by special contract take ten per cent., and are doing it every day.

Mr. GRIMES. Banks of issue?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; we have no other banks in Illinois but banks of issue.

Mr. GRIMES. You have bankers.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We have private bankers, but I am speaking of associations under our general banking law, who are allowed to form a bank and deposit State stocks as a security for their circulation, and are authorized to charge ten per cent. interest by special contract. If there is no contract the law is the same with a bank as with individuals. Money which is due draws interest after it becomes due, when no specific rate of interest is specified, at six per cent. both in favor of banks and other corporations and individuals; but there may, as I understand, and as I am informed by gentlemen familiar with the banking institutions of our State, be a higher rate by special contract. I admit that I am not familiar with those institutions; I know very little about banking; I have never had much money, and perhaps know as little about banking operations as any one; but I have been informed by gentlemen who are engaged in banking in the State of Illinois that the reason why they did not organize under the national banking system as it was adopted a year ago, is that they were prohibited by the bill from charging a higher rate of interest than six or seven per cent. Seven per cent., I believe, was the amount limited in the old law, and it was better for them to bank under the State institutions than under the national banking system at that rate. As has been well said by the Senator from Ohio, if we are to have this system adopted do not discriminate; do not pass such a law as will hold out an inducement for individuals to organize under the State banking system rather than under the national system. I hope that the amendment will stand precisely as the committee agreed upon it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri on the whole will cover the case exactly and put the national banks and State banks precisely on the same footing, because the next clause of the committee's amendment itself provides that where there are no laws fixing the rate of interest the national banks may charge seven per cent. I desire to treat all those associations alike and put them on precisely the same footing with the State banks so far as this matter of taking interest is concerned. I do not want to give to one an advantage over the other. If you say that the national associations are to take whatever they are allowed by the laws of the State, in some of the States they can take ten per cent. when by the laws of those very States the other banks are not allowed to take more than seven per cent. For instance, in the State of Iowa I understand banks of issue are allowed to take eight per cent. interest, while a contract may be made specially for ten per cent. interest, so that a bank under this act, under this language, could take ten per cent. while a State bank in Iowa could take only eight per cent. That certainly is not right. I do not propose to give the national associations this advantage over the State banks in this particular of receiving interest; nor do I wish to give the State banks an advantage over the national associations. I think, therefore, that the provision of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, that these associations shall be allowed to charge the same rate of interest which the banks of issue in the respective States and Territories are allowed to charge, will put them precisely on a footing of equality, and then as to those States and Territories where there are no banks of issue, the committee's amendment provides that the rate shall be seven per cent.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question. In our State private bankers are allowed to receive ten per cent. interest. Do you think those private bankers will give up ten per cent. to take seven or eight per cent. interest under this bill?

Mr. GRIMES. Certainly. They do not issue paper now.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Yes, a sort of paper.

Mr. GRIMES. That circulates as currency?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Yes. They issue notes, and they circulate. If you limit your national banks to seven or eight per cent., or anything below ten per cent., we shall not have any national banks in Kansas.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I can only say, for one, that I will never vote for a bill allowing national banks to go into the States and Territories and charge a rate of interest equal to ten per cent., unless the State or Territory where they are located allows its banking associations to do the same. It is too exorbitant to allow any corporation to have such power in the loaning of money anywhere in the country, to allow it to go to such a rate as that.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Our law does allow private bankers to receive ten per cent. on special contract.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not know precisely what the state of the banking system in Kansas is or what its private bankers are. Are those private bankers who issue by the laws of the State of Kansas a paper circulation to circulate as money? Is there such a system as that, or are those private bankers men who are mere brokers that get the bills of other banks and discount notes with those bills of other banks or associations?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. They loan their money under the law allowing the ten per cent. to be taken on special contract, and yet they issue their notes that are circulated as currency.

Mr. JOHNSON. They do not circulate them under the law.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. No.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Those notes are not issued under any law, and are not legal; they are merely shimplasters, as they are called, and I do not propose in any national bank bill that we pass to recognize such a system of banking as that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. I wish to know of the Senator who has charge of the bill if he is satisfied with the amendment of the Senator from Missouri as it now stands.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was satisfied with it until I found that gentlemen who are acting in concert with the Senator from Iowa are not satisfied with it, but are tinkering it and fixing it up. I know that the amendment as agreed upon in the Committee on Finance was well and carefully considered, and was intended to confer on these national banks the same privileges that are conferred by the laws of the States on other associations and individuals, and therefore, to avoid the controversy, I will move to reconsider the vote on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa which was adopted, and let us have the original amendment stand just as it was reported from the committee, which I know was considered carefully, and which will allow those national banks the same rate of interest as is provided for by the local law for the people within their own States. If the States choose to change their law, they can change it at any time. My own preference, however, as I have already stated, is to establish a uniform rate of interest by our law; but having been overruled on that point, I prefer now to place the national banks in each State on precisely the same footing with individuals and persons doing business in the State by its laws.

Mr. GRIMES. That is a very pleasant alternative that the Senator proposes to my State, for instance, that if they are not satisfied with the rate of interest this Congress establishes for them, the Legislature can be convened by the Governor two years in anticipation of the time fixed by law at an expense of one or two hundred thousand dollars to establish a different rate of interest from that which has been established by Congress at the instance of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. Allow me to suggest to the Senator that Congress does not say a word as to what shall be the rate of interest in Iowa, but takes the laws of Iowa, and presumes that the people of Iowa had sense enough to pass laws to fix the rate of interest for their own State.

Mr. GRIMES. We had sense enough, we supposed, to provide for what cases might arise, and fixed the rate which should be charged by the banks of the State; but now Congress, at the instance of the Senator from Ohio, creates a batch of banks and authorizes them to take what it is considered usurious interest for a bank to take in that State. No bank is authorized in that State to take ten per cent. a year; but under the law, as the Senator proposes to pass it, these banks will be authorized to take ten per cent., which, if taken by a State bank, would cause an entire vitiation of the contract between the bank and the individual of whom it received it. Now, when the people of the State of Iowa are satisfied that that is against the public policy of the State which has been settled by them for years, the alternative is presented to them that they can convene the Legislature, at an expense of $200,000, two years in anticipation of the time fixed by their constitution.

I understood the Senator from Ohio to be perfectly satisfied with the amendment substituting the word "established" for the word "allowed."

Mr. SHERMAN. I am yet.

Mr. GRIMES. Then the Senator must not lay on my back any of the sins of those gentlemen who he says are in collusion with me tinkering this bill. I have had nothing to do with it; I am willing to stand by the amendment to which the Senator agreed, and to vote against all these other propositions if the Senator will himself agree to stand by that amendment, and I will not accept anything more. If the Senator will withdraw his motion to reconsider the vote by which the word "established" was inserted in place of "allowed" I will vote with him on this amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will take the Senator at his word and withdraw my motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the Senator from Ohio will not do that. I think the clause does not stand right now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I look upon it that the word "established" and the word "allowed" have substantially the same legal signification. Senators may do as they please upon it, but I look on the two words as precisely the same.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not consider them the same, so far as Iowa is concerned, at any rate. I think as a general rule "established" and "allowed" are the same thing, but it seems that in the State of Iowa "established" and "allowed" do not mean the same thing.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Nor do they in my State.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Nor do they in the State of Illinois. That I did not understand when the words were put in. I do not know, however, that I object to it if other States are let alone.

Mr. GRIMES. We propose to let you alone.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But it strikes me that it operates very curiously. We must alter our bill, why? For the reason that they have in the State of Iowa three rates of interest: one for private persons at the present time; one for bankers at the present time; and a third for other private persons who do not make a special contract. If we just provide a general rule that the same rate of interest shall be allowed to be taken by these banks that is allowed in the State where the bank happens to be located, I do not see that it is unreasonable to say that the States may conform their legislation to it, and allow just what they please. I do not think we should legislate with regard to such a peculiar state of things existing in one or two States, and change our legislation to conform to it. I do not want any rule made such as is proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] by which these banks, under special contract, may take a rate of interest greater than is allowed by the laws of the State in the general course of proceeding.

Mr. CONNESS. Did I understand the Senator from Maine as moving to reconsider the vote on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa inserting "established" in place of "allowed?"

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not move it.

Mr. CONNESS. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not now in order. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There is in my judgment a very great difference between the word "allowed" and the word "established," and I will illustrate the case by what I believe to be the present law of the State of Wisconsin; at all events such was the law not long since, and I am not aware that a change has been made in the rate of interest. The rate of interest as allowed by law, certainly until quite recently, between individuals, on the loan of money in my State has been ten per cent. By the constitution of the State of Wisconsin, no banking system could be abolished but by submitting the banking system directly to a vote of the people. The banking system under this vote and under this constitution has been so arranged that the banks of issue should have this peculiar privilege over all other people, the blessed privilege of getting interest on what they owe instead of paying interest as other men do on what they owe; and the State has determined that they shall not be permitted to take more than seven per cent. interest on what they owe the community, for the whole secret of this paper money banking is nothing but a contrivance to get interest on what men owe instead of interest on what they lend; it is to exchange their notes without interest, to get other men's notes with interest. It is the highest privilege that ever can be given to a monopoly in the world, and a privilege which ought to be looked upon with considerable jealousy when we are thus parceling it out among certain favored individuals to exercise this right among the people. Now shall we by law establish here the right of these corporations that are to be framed under this act to go into the State of Wisconsin and go to banking at ten per cent. interest, when by the laws of Wisconsin the banks there can take but seven?

Mr. FESSENDEN. They cannot do it under the law.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Why cannot they do it under this law? "Allowed" is the word. "The rate allowed by the laws of the State or Territory." I say that if I am not mistaken the law has been until quite recently that the rate of interest on special contract between individuals on a loan of money might be ten per cent. in the State of Wisconsin. I am not quite certain whether that law was not amended at the last session of the Legislature. I have not had occasion to borrow or lend money, so that I am not prepared to state from present recollection. I will take the law of Iowa as it is stated to me by the Senator from Iowa. The Bank of Iowa in that State—and it is regarded as a good institution throughout the country as far as I know its character and standing—is allowed to take eight per cent.; but if a private individual loans his money in Iowa he can take ten per cent., and you propose by this bill to allow these associations to take ten per cent. in Iowa in banking and give them this advantage over the banks of the State of Iowa. That is the effect of retaining the word "allowed" instead of the word "established;" and therefore I hope the Senate will not reconsider. It is making an invidious distinction against the banking systems of these States which will bring on a conflict which I think it is no time now in the condition of the financial world for us to engage in.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You make an invidious distinction against your banks now.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The distinction is made against the banks because the banks are endowed with special privileges; and when you give them special privileges that private individuals do not have you have the right to put limitations upon them which you do not put upon individuals.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri to the amendment?

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope the amendment will be adopted, and then I suppose it will be in order to move a reconsideration of the vote by which "established" was substituted for "allowed," so that we can put in the word "allowed" again. I will state that, so far as my information extends, generally in the West banks of issue are not allowed to receive as high a rate of interest on their loans as private individuals are.

I believe that the rate of interest generally established in the West is about ten per cent. on contracts between individuals, perhaps in almost every State; but I do not suppose that any bank of issue in the West is allowed to charge ten per cent. on its loans. I am unwilling to enable these banks to charge a greater rate of interest than the banks already established. If gentlemen are determined to destroy the State banks, of course it would be perhaps well enough to pass the amendment as it came from the Finance Committee, because unquestionably if it be retained as it now is, the banks under this law may charge ten per cent., whereas all other banks of issue can charge only eight per cent. Therefore it is a bonus of two per cent. given in order to induce capital to enter into this system. It is a loan of their credit, and they ought not to be permitted to take as high a rate of interest as may be taken for the loan of gold as between individuals. It will be recollected that they receive five or six per cent. interest upon the bonds which they have deposited; and this proposition will allow them to receive in addition ten per cent. upon the loan of their credit in all the States of the West. The States generally do not permit banks of issue to charge as great a rate of interest as individuals. I hope that the amendment I have offered will be adopted.

Mr. POWELL called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Secretary called the roll.

Before the result was announced—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask permission to make a suggestion. I wish to suggest that if this amendment could be made a little more definite there might perhaps be no objection to it. There may be and there are States where no particular rate of interest is fixed for banks, and this provision ought to provide for that case.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator certainly did not understand what I said a few moments ago. I propose if this amendment be adopted to follow it by inserting the word "such" after "no," in the seventh line, so as to read, "when no such rate is fixed by the laws of the State or Territory the bank may take, receive, reserve, or charge a rate not exceeding seven per cent.," and instead of "a rate not exceeding seven per cent." I would say "a rate not exceeding that allowed to be charged on special contract to individuals."

Mr. FESSENDEN. That might carry it up to ten per cent.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not care.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think by general consent we had better suspend the call of the yeas and nays and let the whole question be passed over for the present and let us try to adjust it. In the present shape of the proposition I do not think the Senator will reach his object.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the Senator from Missouri withdraw his amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And then let the question be passed over for the present.

Mr. HENDERSON. I did not offer the amendment with any intention to cripple the bill, and I hope Senators do not ascribe that purpose to me.

Mr. FESSENDEN, Mr. SHERMAN, and others. Withdraw your amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am willing to withdraw it if Senators desire that it shall be withdrawn.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator withdraws it we can try and arrange the matter.

Mr. HENDERSON. I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment can be withdrawn only by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection; the amendment of the Senator from Missouri is withdrawn. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest that we pass over this amendment for the present, and go on with the others; and in the mean time this can be so worded as perhaps to meet all the difficulties of the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be taken, if there be no objection.

Mr. CONNESS. Do I understand the Senator as wishing to pass over the question of reconsideration?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I propose to let the amendment stand as it is for the present, pass it over, and come back to it; and then that question of reconsidering will be open.

Mr. CONNESS. I prefer to have the vote by which "established" was inserted in place of "allowed" reconsidered now. Then the amendment will stand as it came from the committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think that would be as well.

Mr. CONNESS. I make the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves to reconsider the vote on the amendment striking out "allowed" and inserting "established."

Mr. GRIMES. Do I understand that the Senator merely wishes to make the motion, and then let it stand over?

Mr. TRUMBULL and Mr. SUMNER. No; let us finish it.

Mr. GRIMES. Is it the understanding that then this section is to be passed by and we are to go on with the rest of the bill, and arrange this matter afterwards? ["Yes."]

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the understanding; and it may be as well, therefore, to let this vote be reconsidered.

Mr. CONNESS. I did not enter into that understanding; but if there is a general understanding on the part of the Senate, I do not wish to violate it. I do not see why we cannot bring the bill back now to where it was as it came from the committee, and then any arrangement that Senators see fit to enter into about it will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is precisely the understanding. It may be reconsidered, and then let the amendment be passed over for us to come back to it again.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well, then, I ask for the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Now let the amendment be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none. The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole will be read.

The Secretary read the next amendment, which was in line nineteen of section thirty-one, to strike out the word "its" before "deposits."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in line twenty-seven of section thirty-one, after the word "Boston" to insert "Portland, Maine;" before "San Francisco" to insert "and," and after "San Francisco" to strike out "and Portland."

Mr. HENDERSON. Is it in order now to move an amendment to that section, striking out all those places except the city of New York?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such a motion is not now in order. It will be in order after the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole shall have been disposed of.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section forty, after the word "association," in line seven, to insert "and the officers authorized to assess taxes under State authority."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was to strike out the following clause in the forty-first section of the bill:

And nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the taxation by States of the capital stock of banks organized under this act, the same as the property of other moneyed corporations, for State or municipal purposes; but no State shall impose any tax upon such associations, or their capital, circulation, dividends, or business, at a higher rate of taxation than shall be imposed by such State upon the same amount of moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State: Provided, That no State tax shall be imposed on any part of the capital stock of such association invested in the bonds of the United States deposited as security for its circulation.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

And in lieu of all other taxes, every association shall pay to the Treasurer of the United States, in the months of January and July, a duty of one half of one per cent. each half year from and after the 1st day of January, 1864, upon the average amount of its notes in circulation, and a duty of one quarter of one per cent. each half year upon the average amount of its deposits, and a duty of one quarter of one per cent. each half year, as aforesaid, on the average amount of its capital stock beyond the amount invested in United States bonds; and in case of default in the payment thereof by any association, the duties aforesaid may be collected in the manner provided for the collection of United States duties of other corporations, or the Treasurer may reserve the amount of said duties out of the interest as it may become due on the bonds deposited with him by such defaulting association. And it shall be the duty of each association within ten days from the 1st days of January and July of each year, to make a return under the oath of its president or cashier to the Treasurer of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe, of the average amount of its notes in circulation, and of the average amount of its deposits, and of the average amount of its capital stock beyond the amount invested in United States bonds for the six months next preceding said 1st days of January and July as aforesaid; and in default of such return, and for each default thereof, each defaulting association shall forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of $200, to be collected either out of the interest as it may become due such association on the bonds deposited with the Treasurer, or, at his option, in the manner in which penalties are to be collected of other corporations under the laws of the United States; and in case of such default the amount of the duties to be paid by such association shall be assessed upon the amount of notes delivered to such association by the Comptroller of the Currency, and upon the highest amount of its deposits and capital stock, to be ascertained in such other manner as the Treasurer may deem best: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the market value of the shares in any of the said associations, held by any person or body corporate, from being included in the valuation of the personal property of such person or corporation in the assessment of all taxes imposed by or under State authority for State, county, or municipal purposes, but not at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State. And all the remedies provided by State laws for the collection of such taxes shall be applicable thereto: Provided, also, That nothing in this act shall exempt the real estate of associations from either State, county, or municipal taxes to the same extent, according to its value, as other real estate is taxed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "thereto" and before the last proviso:

And provided further, That no tax shall be imposed under the laws of any State upon the shares in any of the associations authorized by this act at a rate exceeding that imposed on the shares in banks organized under the authority of the State where such association is located.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move this as a substitute for the amendment of the committee:

In lieu of all other taxes on the capital, circulation, deposits, shares, and other property, every association shall pay to the Treasurer of the United States, in the months of January and July, a duty of one per cent. each half year from and after the 1st day of January, 1864, upon the average amount of its notes in circulation, and a duty of one half of one per cent. each half year upon the average amount of its deposits, and a duty of one half of one per cent. each half year as aforesaid, on the average amount of its capital stock beyond the amount invested in United States bonds; and in case of default in the payment thereof by any association, the duties aforesaid may be collected in the manner provided for the collection of United States duties of other corporations, or the Treasurer may reserve the amount of such duties out of the interest as it may become due on the bonds deposited with him by such defaulting association. And each association shall, within ten days from the 1st days of January and July of each year, make a return, under the oath of its president or cashier, to the Treasurer of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe, of the average amount of its notes in circulation, and of the average amount of its deposits, and of the average amount of its capital stock beyond the amount invested in United States bonds, for the six months next preceding the 1st days of January and July, as aforesaid, and in default of such return, and for each default thereof, each defaulting association shall forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of $200, to be collected either out of the interest as it may become due to such association on the bonds deposited with the Treasurer, or, at his option, in the manner in which penalties are to be collected of other corporations under the laws of the United States; and in case of such default the amount of the duties to be paid by such association shall be assessed upon the amount of notes delivered to such association by the Comptroller of the Currency, and upon the highest amount of its deposits and capital stock, to be ascertained in such other manner as the Treasurer may deem best: Provided, That nothing in this act shall exempt the real estate of associations from either State, county, or municipal taxes to the same extent, according to its value, as other real estate is taxed: Provided, also, That all taxes imposed by this or any future act on banking associations organized under national legislation shall be applied exclusively to the payment of the interest and principal of the national debt of the United States.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. This bill has been dragging its weary way along till everybody is tired of it. I feel obliged, in the position which I occupy, to insist upon going on with it. There is no business in executive session that is pressing to-day.

Several SENATORS. It is near four o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. We cannot adjourn every day at four o'clock.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator from Ohio desires to go on with the bill, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, at last in this discussion it is clear that we have come to the place where the road branches in two opposite directions—one way toward the support of the whole country, and of that improved currency which is essential not only to the general welfare but also to the common defense, and the other toward State rights, State taxation, and State banks. Which road will you take, sir?

Or, stating the case in a different way, it is a question between the national credit, involving the interests of all, on the one side, and certain local pretensions on the other side. It is a question between the whole and a part; between the life of the Republic and a small percentage of taxation which Senators claim for their States. The enemy is at our gates and gold is at 130, and yet Senators hesitate.

All are watching, at this moment, the movement of our forces under General Grant, and are longing for victory. Nothing that the country can do to make him strong has been left undone. Men, money, supplies—everything has been lavished; and only yesterday the Senate voted another $25,000,000.

But there is another field, where the battle is bloodless, but scarcely less important. I mean the field of finance. If our pecuniary resources fail, it is doubtful if the Army and Navy must not fail also. But victory on this field would give triumphant strength and vigor to all the operations of Government. There is no argument for the support of Army and Navy—ay, sir, for the actual support of the Lieutenant General of the United States, now in the field at the head of our military forces—which at this moment is not equally applicable for the support of the Secretary of the Treasury at the head of our financial forces.

How different the treatment of these two officers. Everything is given to the one, almost without discussion. But little is given to the other without higgling at every stage of the question.

There are movements now pending in the field of national finance hardly less important than those in the field of war. A defeat in finance would be hardly less disastrous than a defeat in war.

Under these circumstances, and at this critical moment, a measure is brought forward whose real character is to be discerned in its title, as follows: "To provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof." The primary object of this bill is not, therefore, to establish national banks, but to secure the national currency. For the sake of the currency a system of national banks is to be established; they are the means to the end. But the end sought is an improved currency. Sir, this must not be forgotten. If it were a mere question of a national bank, if it were a question between two rival systems, Senators might take sides. But who will hesitate to give now all that is needed, even all that is asked by the proper authorities, for an improved currency? You may seem to give much when you abandon sources of State taxation; but you can give nothing that will not be returned to you ten-fold, a hundred-fold, when the currency at last becomes fixed and uniform.

Glance only for a moment at the incalculable advantages of a sound currency. Gold will assume its normal place; business will be sure; values will be fixed; fluctuations will cease; inflated prices will pass away. There is not a mart of commerce, there is not a village in the whole country, which will not feel the change. But this great boon cannot be secured without corresponding effort. Like victory in the field of battle, it must be fought for and paid for.

And now, when victory seems to be within reach, when an improved currency has been already begun, Senators hesitate in conceding to it those facilities without which victory is doubtful. They set up claims for their States and insist upon certain rights of taxation. If this were a moment of peace I could appreciate this pretension; but when I consider the peril of the country, filling us all with such anxiety, when I consider that its very life is assailed, and that it is to be defended on the field of finance just as much as on the field of battle, I feel that every endeavor to hamper the pending measure differs little in character from an effort to hamper our soldiers in the field. We spare nothing essential to the strength of our armies in the field: we should spare nothing essential to the strength of our currency. Armies and finances both are necessary; both must be cherished and protected with equal patriotic care.

As I listen to the local pretensions put forward at this moment, when the national life is staked upon the issue, I am irresistibly reminded of a kindred case which, at the very crisis of our Revolution, was chastised by the humor and eloquence of Patrick Henry. You remember the story. The army of Washington was reduced to the extremity of distress, exposed, almost naked, to the rigors of a winter sky, and marking the frozen ground with the blood of shoeless feet. "Where is the man," said Patrick Henry, "who would not have thrown open his fields, his barns, his cellars, the doors of his house, the portals of his breast, to receive the meanest soldier in that little famished band? Where is the man? There he stands; but whether the heart of an American beats in his bosom, you are to judge!" It was to John Hook that he pointed, who was then pressing a vexatious claim for supplies taken for use of these starving troops. "What notes of discord do I hear?" exclaimed the orator. "They are the notes of John Hook, hoarsely bawling through the patriot camp, Beef! beef! beef!" And now, among us, in our patriot camp, we are doomed to listen to a similar cry. Senators do not say Beef, beef, beef; but they say what means the same thing. They cry, State taxation! State taxation! State taxation! And they hold up State banks for us to fall down and worship.

Sir, I am unwilling to be misunderstood. I have no feeling except of kindness for the State banks, especially when they keep within the proper sphere of banks and do not undertake to supply a currency to the country. But at this moment, when we are seeking to create a new currency which shall be the foundation of national credit, and of national character too, I confess that I have very little sympathy with anything which puts itself in the way. The State banks have performed their task as agents of currency, and the time has come for them to abdicate; or, if they do not abdicate, at least to conform to the new system.

I do not stop to consider if any paper issued by State banks as currency can be constitutional; to consider if the States which cannot "coin money" can yet put paper in circulation as money. I content myself with insisting that, whatever may be the constitutional merits of this question, it is no longer expedient that States should be invested with this power. We must have another system. The best interests of the whole country require it, especially at a time of national peril.

It is clear that the State banks are not competent to meet the present crisis. They cannot do the business that is required. Besides, they are in the way. Putting their notes in circulation, almost at will, the currency is inflated beyond control. Depreciation naturally ensues. Bankruptcy may follow.

When I say that the State banks are in the way, I do not use too strong language. Authentic tables show the extent to which during the last year the currency has been affected by their interference. I hold in my hand a statement taken from the Bank Reports for 1862, page 208, and for 1863, page 210. At the risk of wearying the Senate I will read it:

These tables speak for themselves. They show the range within which the State banks undertake to operate, and their consequent interference with the national system. If it be said that in certain parts of the country, as in New England and New York, the State banks have performed good service, I reply that, even admitting all that is claimed, this service is local and incomplete. It does not embrace the West.

The present endeavor is to provide a remedy for this trouble by a comprehensive national system, which shall discharge the function that has been performed by the State banks, and shall embrace the whole country. It is called national because it belongs to the nation, and not to any particular State, and because its origin, aim, and inspiration are all national. It is conceived in no hostility or unkindness to the State banks, but in a patriotic purpose to do what can be done to secure what all desire—a national currency. The State banks will be welcome to a place in the system, like State troops coming forward for the defense of the Republic. But they cannot be tolerated, if they stand aloof or refuse to take the post which is assigned to them. At a moment of peril like the present, when the Government is bending all its energies to save the national currency, a mutiny among State banks will be hardly less disastrous than a mutiny among State troops. Every murmur or mutter of such mutiny ought to be repressed at once. All should be summoned to a perfect and harmonious cooperation in that cause which embraces the whole country, in every walk of life, whether of peace or war.

I know not how others may be impressed, but to my mind it is difficult to imagine anything short of those everlasting principles of human freedom involved in this war, which should at this moment be more carefully watched than the currency of the country. Let this be safe and everything will be safe—Army, Navy, and the whole national cause. Such a currency will constitute an epoch in the history of the country—ay, sir, in the history of the world. There have been ministers in other countries and other times whose names are immortal from association with commercial reforms. Colbert was the founder of the commercial system of France, Peel was the founder of free trade in England. But the present Secretary of the Treasury, when the new system shall be at last triumphant over all obstacles, including the mutiny of State banks and the lukewarmness of Senators, may boast that he has given a currency to his country. Next after the great gift of human freedom there is nothing greater that he could give—nothing which comes home so completely to the business and bosoms of the people, rich and poor, wherever they may be throughout our wide-spread empire. An improved currency will be like universal sunshine, penetrating every corner of the land, under which commerce, business, comfort, civilization, life itself, will put forth blossom and fruit. Nobody in the community will be too high, nobody too low, not to feel the new-found blessing, which will fill every household and will travel on every highway. But at this moment it may be seen in another aspect. An improved currency will be like a new levy of national troops—a new navy afloat—a new contribution of supplies. It is not too much to say that it will be the herald and assurance of untold success. In itself it will be a constant daily victory—fruitful parent of victory everywhere.

Such is the object proposed—important at any time—inconceivably important at this moment. And the question recurs, are you for a national life-giving currency, or are you for the State banks? You cannot be for both; one must yield to the other. If you are for a national life-giving currency, you must abandon the State banks or compel them to enlist in the national cause.

Massachusetts, which has a larger bank capital in proportion to her population than any other State, and which, moreover, has been accustomed to look to taxation of this capital as a chief source of income, has already, by her patriotic Governor, volunteered her support to the national banks; and now, in thus vindicating the new system, I simply follow the teachings of my State. It was as long ago as January, 1863, that Governor Andrew, in his message to the Legislature, thus expressed himself.

"The Secretary of the Treasury in his recent able report on the financial affairs of the nation, recommends to Congress the creation of a national system of banking which, if carried out, may interfere with our own, and may deprive the Commonwealth of a large income now derived from the tax on banking capital. The Secretary's plan is to authorize free banking, to be based on a deposit of national bonds. This course, he suggests, will create a demand for Government securities; will furnish a perfectly safe, convenient, and uniform currency; will check the circulation of bills of unsafe banks; and greatly tend to strengthen the union of the States."

"Moneyed corporations are naturally cautious in their movements, and are inclined to hesitate and deliberate before adopting new methods. But whatever may be the operation of the Secretary's system on the New England banks, there can be no doubt of its great usefulness to the West, where an abundant and safe currency has never existed, and thus indirectly the whole country will derive a benefit proportional to the advantages of a national currency, simple, uniform, and of unquestionable value. Should Congress adopt the system proposed, securing to the United States some part of the profit derivable from the issue of paper money, while it would probably compel Massachusetts to abandon the revenue received from its tax on the banking capital of the Commonwealth, it would at the same time relieve the people from their liability to other taxation for the support of the national Government and the payment of its debts, to an extent equivalent to the revenue realized to the Treasury of the United States from that source."

"Nor can it be doubtful that the substantial pecuniary advantage of New England business interests demands the nationalization of the currency, so that the paper representative of a dollar shall be alike valuable in Boston and in Chicago, and the indebtedness of the West to the East find at all times a medium of adjustment, and the trade between the two sections of the northern States flow unimpeded by oppressive and ruinous rates of exchange."

Such is the testimony of Massachusetts, by the lips of her brave and true Governor. Seeing the object proposed, he raises no question of State rights, presents no claim of State taxation, makes no plea for State banks.

Sir, it is vain to think that you can keep both systems at the same time. One must yield to the other. But if you sincerely desire that the national system should prevail, then you must so endow and protect it that it will be commended to the public, and that investments will naturally seek it. Therefore every privilege which you confer upon it, every immunity which you give to it, every exemption which you establish in its favor, must naturally contribute to its strength and make it more effective for its transcendent purposes.

This is the day of sacrifices. Families are giving sons and brothers. States are giving their citizens, and every citizen is contributing according to his means to the safety of the Republic. But there is one other sacrifice which is now required; it is the sacrifice of the State banks as agents of currency; and this sacrifice requires that the local taxation should be suspended with regard to the national currency, and that all the proceeds of such local taxation should be passed to the credit of the whole country. You must do for the national currency precisely what you do for the national securities. Here are the words of the statute:

"And all stock, bonds, and other securities of the United States held by individuals, corporations, or associations, within the United States, shall be exempt from taxation by or under State authority."—Statutes at Large, vol. 12, p. 346.

The reason which sustains the exemption in this case is equally applicable in the other case.

But there are other exemptions from local taxation.

There are the imports of the country, which no State or municipality undertakes to tax.

There are the Army and Navy and all the material of war, ships, arms, munitions, commissariat supplies—all exempt from local taxation.

There are the public lands of the United States, which no local authority can touch.

There is the Mint, which is untaxed.

There are the public buildings in Washington, the national Capitol, the Executive Mansion, the offices of the heads of Departments, covering large spaces of ground, all secured from local taxation.

But there is no reason for exemption in these cases, which does not prevail with regard to the currency. Nay, at this moment, when our object is, above all things, to secure a national currency, the reason for exemption is of special and unanswerable force.

We have more than once been warned not to slay the goose that lays the golden egg, meaning by this goose the State banks. But all who use this illustration forget that there is another bird, which lays such eggs as no State banks can hatch—eggs not merely of gold but of victory. It is the national credit, which Senators seem willing to abandon, if not to slay; and it is the national credit which I now insist shall be preserved at all hazards.

Mr. President, I was not a sharer in the counsels which originated this measure. Had I been consulted, I know not that I should have originally advised the experiment in its actual form. Clearly, something was necessary for the sake of the currency and for the sake of the country; and after proper consideration the present system was adopted. Operations under it have already commenced; $60,000,000 of capital have been organized according to its requirements. It is too late to retreat. It only remains that you should go forward—not sluggishly, heavily, reluctantly; but bravely, confidently. The financial enterprise that has been begun must be finished and protected. Here I cannot hesitate. If the system is to be maintained, if it is not to be utterly abandoned, it must be placed under the most favorable auspices, so at least that it may not fail from any want of care on our part. It should be made strong in itself, and then it should be surrounded with an atmosphere congenial and friendly. For this reason I shall vote to keep it free from all State hostility or even State rivalry, that it may become in reality as in name, national in all respects. Nor do I see how any real friends of the system can do otherwise.

Sir, I am told that it will be unpopular to make this sacrifice, and ancient ghosts are paraded through this Chamber to frighten us from duty. Naturally all who are against the proposed system will be against the seeming sacrifice. But the people are too intelligent not to see what is demanded by the best interests of the national currency; and, unless I greatly err, they will insist that what we do shall be so done as to make our work most effective and most triumphant, to the end that victory may be certain. It is on no narrow ground that I make my appeal. I speak for a national currency, which shall be to the whole country like the horn of abundance, and I plead for it now as essential not only to the general welfare but also to the common defense.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the country owes the Senator from Massachusetts a debt of gratitude for his patriotism and statesmanship. He has risen above small matters; above local, petty interests; and has come up to the standard of the broadest statesmanship in the argument he has just delivered, which is one of the ablest financial arguments ever delivered on this floor. Sir, for what are we legislating? We profess to be legislating for a national banking system, a system which shall furnish a currency that will be as good in one part of the land as in another; equally good in Minnesota, in California, in Louisiana, and in New York. And yet, sir, what is the proposition of the Committee on Finance? It is to place this great national system, which, if it is anything, as the Senator from Massachusetts says, must be universal, at the disposal of every State, town, county, and municipality throughout the land; for, sir, if a city or municipality can tax at all, it can tax ad libitum; it is placing one tax in Massachusetts, another in New Hampshire, another in Minnesota, another in California. But, sir, if the Senator's proposition be adopted—and I shall certainly support it with all my heart—the taxation will be not only uniform, but national. It is, however, very heavy, and I confess that had I been consulted by the Senator I should not have recommended so heavy a tax as he proposes to place on these banks; but during the continuance of this war let banks be taxed, let individuals be taxed, and let them be taxed to their utmost capacity to pay; and although the tax proposed is very heavy, I shall support even that because it is a national tax. Massachusetts, as the Senator has remarked, has a larger local banking capital than any other State in the Union compared with its population, and yet you have seen the Senators from Massachusetts and the Governor of Massachusetts coming up like men and statesmen and saying, "We will surrender this local tax for the benefit of the national Treasury." What difference does it make whether you collect $50,000,000 from the banking capital of a State and put it directly in your Treasury, or whether you call upon that State to pay an equal amount in some other way? It makes no difference; therefore let it rest upon the banking capital of the nation.

Mr. President, the West has suffered always for want of a banking system. The State of Michigan, I think, had less than five hundred thousand dollars of banking capital within its limits when the national banking law of last year was enacted; it has now several millions. The State of Michigan, and it is so throughout all the western States, has relied almost entirely upon eastern circulation in the transaction of its business; and it seemed to me—it does not appear so to me now, for I believe the Senate will adopt the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts—but it did seem to me three or four days ago that the eastern banks and their representatives were going to succeed in defeating this great banking scheme. I think now they will not. I think although they hold on with a death-grasp to this eastern circulation they will finally decide that it is best to yield gracefully rather than hold out hopelessly, and therefore I expect this measure to be carried.

Sir, the proposed system is perhaps the best, in my judgment, that ever was inaugurated on this continent or elsewhere. Every dollar's worth of this circulation is based upon a bond of the Government of the United States; not only based upon a bond of the Government of the United States, but a bond deposited at twenty per cent. less than its market value. Every dollar of this circulation is absolutely guaranteed by the Government and the bond deposited for it. It is absolutely under the control of the Government. How is it with the State banks? How is it with this eastern circulation which we have been accustomed to use for the last twenty years? There is not the least security except in the honor of the directors of the bank: they deposit no security; and in the West we have suffered terribly from depreciation and inflation of the State currency. But under this national system we may confine our circulation to $300,000,000, or we may reduce it to $200,000,000, or we may carry it up to the wants and requirements of the business of the country.

The Senator from Massachusetts read you some figures showing the enormous increase of banking circulation since the breaking out of this war. As he showed you, in the New England States the increase has been more than sixty-six per cent. Every dollar's worth of greenbacks that you issue goes into some paper-making machine in the eastern States, and upon that dollar are based two, three, four, or five of their worthless paper. You have seen that throughout the country, in every State, this circulation has gone on rapidly increasing ever since the suspension of specie payments. In the city of Pittsburg alone, at the breaking out of the war, the circulation of the local banks was $3,041,000; on the 1st of January last it was $7,382,000, or an increase of $4,341,000, more than double. Go where you will you find that the same state of things exists. Should there not be some control over this matter? What is to prevent gold from going up even higher than it is at the present day, unless the Government takes possession of the circulation and limits it to some particular point? It is not the issue of greenbacks which has inflated prices to any considerable extent as they are now inflated. The greenbacks are not very abundant in your moneyed centers, and why? Because every man throughout the length and breadth of this land, if he has any money to retain, retains it in greenbacks. You find that every farmer who sells a horse or a yoke of oxen, or his clip of wool, or his crop of wheat, puts his money into the paper of the Government of the United States, deposits it in some place, not in a bank, but in these bills, and hoards it as he would coin. Every man throughout the country knows that a dollar of these Government securities is a good dollar; he does not know that the bank bill without security is. You find the same thing in regard to the issues of these national banks. Their money is hoarded. It is very difficult for them to get back their notes when they have once gone out.

Let us banish from circulation, not suddenly, the State bank notes, or control them to such an extent that it will not be for the interest of those banks to go on increasing their circulation as they have done. I believe that we not only have the power to do that, but I believe it to be our duty to exercise the power. I will not make a constitutional argument, because I am no lawyer; but you will find in the Constitution these provisions: "Congress shall have power" "to coin money and regulate the value thereof;" and "no State" "shall coin money" or "emit bills of credit." It is not necessary to comment on these two clauses. Can a State delegate a power which it does not possess? If no State can coin money or emit bills of credit, can a State delegate to a corporation what it has not the power itself to do? It seems to me a perfectly self-evident proposition, requiring no explanation whatever. I hold in my hand a letter from a very distinguished bank president, the president of one of our national banks, relative to the amendment of the Committee on Finance. "If the inclosed report is correct," that is, of the amendment of the Committee on Finance, "the clause allowing States, counties, and towns to tax the banks as proposed by the Finance Committee, if it becomes a law, will ruin us; we must certainly stop or give up our national organization and organize under State laws." That is the opinion of one of the ablest financiers in the Northwest, the president of one of the largest banks. His opinion agrees with my own precisely. I believe that will be the result of the amendment proposed by the Finance Committee. I am glad, however, to find that the Finance Committee is not a unit on this point. I am glad to find that there is some practical business knowledge even in that Finance Committee. I have the most profound respect for the members of that committee as lawyers and as statesmen, but for their practical business knowledge I have about the same respect that they have for my legal attainments, and if they have the slightest for those they have more than I have. [Laughter.] I hope that the Senate will disregard the recommendation of that committee. I hope the Senate will adopt the broad view of the Senator from Massachusetts. I hope they will look above these little local interests, and adopt a national system of banking which will do credit to the country, save the Treasury, and fill your coffers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I do not feel disposed to attempt to answer the speeches that have been made by the two Senators who have addressed the Senate on this question; but I feel a little disinclined, either for myself or for the Senators and Representatives who voted with me in this House and in the other and who entertain the same views, to rest quietly under what I conceive to be the imputations of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts and the honorable Senator from Michigan.

The Senator from Massachusetts likened all who have supported the views of the majority of the Senate, and consequently all who voted with the committee as well as the committee themselves who originally framed the amendment, to those enemies of their country or those indifferent citizens who in the midst of war, while the nation is struggling for existence, are looking out for their own private interests, promoting their own personal advantage, and he illustrated it by reference to the very notorious case of John Hook, which, to be sure, is not an exceedingly original illustration, as I suppose it has been quoted some hundreds of thousands of times.

Mr. SUMNER. Millions.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should think millions, since it occurred. It is hardly just to the members of the Senate for the Senator to assume that all those twenty-eight—I think there were twenty-eight who voted for the amendment of the committee—were influenced by any such consideration. It is hardly just on the part of the Senator from Michigan to speak of the same class of Senators (because he could allude to no other) as those who were merely in the interest of local banks and advocating petty interests.

I disclaim for myself that I belong to either one class or the other; but while I am willing to allow to the honorable Senators and to the gentlemen who voted with them all the patriotism and all the wisdom that they would claim for themselves, I think it is hardly just to the rest of us to suppose that we are entirely destitute of both; and yet such is the condition in which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts in his written speech which he has read to the Senate, which he has carefully elaborated in his closet, chooses to put the members of the Senate who are acting with him here every day; for no other possible inference that I can conceive of can be drawn from the language he has used and the illustration he has made as applicable to the majority who have thus voted.

And, sir, it is not confined to members of this body. Let us see what was reported by the Committee of Ways and Means in the House of Representatives; certainly something as broad as the Committee on Finance have reported. Here it is: And nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the taxation by States of the capital stock of banks organized under this act the same as the property of other moneyed corporations for State or municipal purposes; but no State shall impose any tax upon such associations, or their capital, circulation, dividends, or business, at a higher rate of taxation than shall be imposed by such State upon the same amount of moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State.

That was the original proposition as reported in the House of Representatives; and the House put in this proviso:

Provided, That no State tax shall be imposed on any part of the capital stock of such association invested in the bonds of the United States deposited as security for its circulation.

Leaving out what might be a very small part of it; and that, as I have been told since, was put in under a misapprehension and not with any idea that it had the effect it has been found to have, or it would not have passed that House. It is well known that a very large majority of the House of Representatives have been from the beginning in favor of the proposition which was adopted by the Committee of Ways and Means and reported by the Representative of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, who supported it in a speech and has been from the beginning its friend, and who is known to be eminent in matters of currency. He is the gentleman who reported this bill and sustained it and carried it through and urged it from the beginning with untiring zeal; and is he therefore to be likened to John Hook? He reported the provision which I have read and supported it in a speech which has been printed and given to the public.

We are, then, in a very tolerable company. We are in company with the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives and with a very large majority of the House of Representatives, who from the beginning have sustained this principle. I may say, moreover, that I have in my committee-room a letter that was addressed to me as chairman of the Committee on Finance recently, since this discussion commenced, by the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, in which he does not pretend to put this question on the ground of currency, as argued by the honorable Senator, in any shape, but simply puts it on the mere question that is involved in the last provision of the Senator's amendment; and that is that the money being appropriated to national uses, and appropriated by law, and pledged to the public creditors, would have an effect to raise and strengthen the public credit. That is the argument, and the only argument, I may be permitted to say, which I have heard from the honorable Secretary of the Treasury on the subject from the beginning. He has presented it merely as a question of money, what should be the amount of the tax, which is not very large at the best.

Mr. SUMNER. Is there any objection to having that letter read?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly not, if I can find it.

Mr. SUMNER. I think it an excellent letter, and I should like to have the Senator read it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Has the Senator seen it?

Mr. SUMNER. I have.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator can have it read if he desires. That is the only ground on which it is placed in the letter. I have no time now to look it up. If the Senator has it he can have it read.

With reference to the particular provision here which the Committee on Finance have recommended and to which the Senator has objected, all of it down as far as the proviso, and in fact including the proviso, was drawn by the Comptroller of the Currency himself, and handed to the committee as what he preferred; and the only difference between the two is that the Comptroller of the Currency made the stock of these institutions liable to State taxation and not to county and municipal taxation. He recognized and adopted the principle which is now denounced as "beef," with all the "State rights" in it, drew it with his own hands, gave it to the committee, and that provision thus given recognized the right of the States to tax for State purposes; and the alteration that the committee made in it was to add county and municipal taxation, just increasing the taxation. Now it seems to me that there is "beef" in the Treasury. It seems to me that when we, the twenty-eight, are denounced for our want of patriotism, for our want of sense, we have very excellent company in the Committee of Ways and Means of the other House, and a very large number of that body, as I have said, and also a recognition of the same thing in the Department itself.

I have said all I proposed to say in reference to that particular point. The Committee on Finance was of opinion that the good of the bill itself, the good of these institutions, their establishment and strength in the country, would be advanced by not undertaking to say that the property of private citizens of the States invested in them should be free from State taxation; that such an exemption would create a feeling of dissatisfaction and anger with regard to it that might in the end be fatal to the institutions themselves. I can say to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts that a letter from a gentleman, whom, if I should name to him, he would say was beyond all question to be relied upon, was written to me three or four days ago, opposing the amendment of the Committee on Finance; but I received a letter from him yesterday morning, in which he said that he had been about, and the opinion was so universal among business men and bankers that without the provision these banks would be utterly odious, and could not be sustained, that he was willing to acknowledge his mistake; that the opinion was universal among bankers and business men in Boston that the whole thing would be odious, and he felt bound to write me that he had changed his opinion. He said, moreover, that it was the belief of many of the best men that our stock which we put into market free from State taxes was of less value and would be in a very short time, on account of that very exemption, for the reason that it created such prejudice against it in the minds of the people that it would be better without that exemption, and that some men were selling out and investing in other stocks for that very reason.

And yet in the face of that, those of us, friends of the measure, who propose to vote for the measure, who doubt the expediency of affixing so odious a feature to these banks, are taunted with the cry of "beef," and likened to men who have neither patriotism nor conscience. Sir, I think we are hardly dealt with by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts in the attempt to place us in such a predicament before the country. There is no personality in it, because it comprehends the body; that is to say, a large majority of the body, more than two to one of those who voted.

Before sitting down I wish to allude to another thing. The honorable Senator from Michigan has complimented the Committee on Finance by saying that he had a very considerable respect for them in some particulars, but none at all for their practical sense. Sir, I am not here to sustain it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I beg the Senator's pardon. Not practical sense, but practical business knowledge.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Practical business knowledge. I think there is not very great difference in the two cases between the suppositions. Practical business knowledge and practical sense are almost convertible terms. The compliment is a sort of left-handed one, and was intended to be so. I would refer him to the practical gentlemen in the other House. He would hardly set himself up for practical business knowledge above the author of this bill, as a banker or anything else; and yet he is complimented in the same way. He would hardly put himself above the Committee of Ways and Means who reported it with the same provision. While I admit with all humility the great inferiority of all the members of the Committee on Finance in "practical business knowledge" to the honorable Senator from Michigan, and also to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts whom he has complimented so highly, I must claim that we are in excellent company. We have the support of a great many practical business men in the other House of Congress who seem to think as we do on the subject and who act upon their opinion; and I must say that I hope we are doing the best we can and endeavoring to approach the high standard of the honorable Senator from Michigan and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts in practical business knowledge, and they should at least give us credit for good intentions, and not afflict us with the cry of "beef," but while we are denied on the one hand any practical sense by the one Senator, we are denied on the other any decent intentions. It is a hard place to put men in.

One thing more, sir, and I have done. The larger part of the remarks addressed by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts to the Senate has been on the subject of the currency; that it is necessary to have good currency. Sir, the friends of this bill are trying to bring that about; but I may ask him what the question of State taxation or of United States taxation, or the difference between the two, has to do with the question of currency. The bills when out will circulate. The tax proposed by the amendment which the Senator presents to place upon these institutions is much larger probably in the whole than would be placed by the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance and which has been acted on. One would think that it was the amount of the taxation which would affect the institution and not the point from which it comes. One would think it is the burden they have to bear, and not who lays the burden, that affects the question. The bills of the institutions, if well founded, will circulate. If the system is a good one, the object of having a good currency will be advanced. That question is not at all affected by the question of who shall lay the burden, from what quarter it shall come, upon the institutions themselves, provided, as I said before, they are not attempted to be taxed out of existence, and that is provided against.

As for the suggestion that this proposition comes from the advocates of State institutions, I need only say that the same burden is provided by this bill upon both, and that upon these national institutions cannot be made greater by any State legislation than that on the State banks themselves, and it is so specially provided. There is no connection between the two questions. All that the honorable Senator has said about the question of currency and the necessity of having a sound currency, I might agree with; but I deny that it has the slightest connection in the world with the question now before the Senate on this amendment; and that is whether or not the Government shall allow the States to tax the private property of their own citizens when invested in these institutions in the ordinary form.

One other thing I had almost forgotten. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts has said that while we were doing everything to sustain General Grant in the field we were carping and quibbling at the demands made upon us to sustain the Secretary of the Treasury. Sir, that is rather an unkind remark, allow me to say, with regard to myself especially, for I have been in a position where I have sustained the Secretary of the Treasury from the beginning, and where in many cases I am perfectly willing to admit that owing to his position as the head of the finances I have sacrificed my own judgment to his, because I believed it was important to sustain his policy and his views. I do not say I have made these sacrifices in anything very material, but in matters of detail. But, sir, if the day has come, if the time has arrived when a member of the Senate must be called upon to surrender his views of right and his judgment of high expediency to an officer of the Government who fills an office in the Cabinet, and to say that he has no mind, no thought, no views except such as are dictated to him from the head of a Department, it is time this form of Government should be broken up. No man has more respect or more personal regard for the Secretary of the Treasury than I have, and the Senator from Massachusetts knows that full well. I do not know that there is any man who sustains better and kinder personal relations with him; but, sir, I should lose his respect and his regard—such is my opinion of his manliness and character—whenever he believed that I was ready to sacrifice my judgment in a matter of high import, and my sense of duty as a public man, to his wishes; and I should lose mine for him, and consider him my enemy, when he dared to demand such a thing of me; the idea is that of a slave and not of a free man and a Senator of the United States, who must stand here on his own responsibility on these high questions and act as he believes to be right, without reference to the wishes of those in power, especially in matters of legislation which are to affect the country perhaps for all future time. Sir, I do not belong to that class of men. If any Senator does, let him hug himself upon his proud position.

MR. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I certainly meant no disrespect to the honorable Senator from Maine, or to any member of the Committee on Finance. I simply stated that I had the same respect for their practical business knowledge that they had for my legal attainments; that was all. Men are not born financiers any more than they are born lawyers; men are not born educated business men; and it is no disrespect to a man who has never been engaged in the practical business operations of the day to say that he does not as thoroughly understand them as though he had been educated to them. A banker learns his vocation by years of practical application, a lawyer by hard study.

With regard to the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, I have the most profound respect, not only for the members of that committee personally, but for their practical business knowledge. The Senator from Maine did not read the last clause, which, as I said the other day, was the saving clause in the bill as it came from the House of Representatives. The proviso which saved the bill, and which the Finance Committee of the Senate proposed to strike out, was this:

Provided, That no State tax shall be imposed on any part of the capital stock of such association invested in the bonds of the United States deposited as security for its circulation.

That proviso saved the bill and made it practical. The gentlemen of the Committee of Ways and Means in the other House knew very well what they were preparing. They were preparing a national banking law. Who constitutes the committee in the other House? JUSTIN S. MORRILL, a merchant of large and long experience; REUBEN E. FENTON, of whom I may say the same; SAMUEL HOOPER, one of the most extensive and wealthy business men in the United States; HENRY T. BLOW, the same; H. G. STEBBINS, of whom the same remark may be made.

MR. FESSENDEN. The proviso was not put on by the Committee of Ways and Means. They reported it without the proviso.

MR. CHANDLER. It is in the original bill.

MR. FESSENDEN. It is in the bill as it comes here from the House of Representatives.

MR. CHANDLER. Then there is at the head of that committee THADDEUS STEVENS, who, although a very able lawyer, is one of the heaviest business men in the State of Pennsylvania, as I am informed. There are six out of the nine practical business men and merchants of large experience. They were preparing a national banking system, and they meant that it should be a practical one, one that could be adopted in all the States of the Union. We are to-day in the very crisis of our fate. If we fail at all, we fail financially. We have men enough, material enough, enough of everything except finances. We are in the very straining point. If we pass this point, we go through. If we fail financially now, we fail altogether. Now, sir, I believe that the Senate of the United States, the Congress of the United States, and the nation are prepared to make any sacrifice that may be requisite to keep our finances in a sound condition at this hour of our peril. I believe that they would consent to the sequestration, as the Senator from Maine called it the other day, of all the bonds issued by the Government; that is, sequestration for the benefit of the Treasury of the United States. The tax proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, as I said before, is a very heavy tax, it is enormous, but during the continuance of this rebellion I believe there will be no objection on the part of bankers or citizens anywhere and every where to taking that capital out from local taxation and making it subject to national taxation only.

The Senators from New Hampshire, Maine, Vermont, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, the other day, each and all argued that it was just as important, in this hour of our country's peril, to sustain the State credit as it was to sustain national credit. Why, sir, did it ever occur to those gentlemen what would be the effect of a financial failure with $2,000,000,000 of our Government paper afloat, which is made a legal tender? Have they ever thought what would be the result of financial ruin to us at this time as a nation? Why, sir, your banks would not be worth the paper on which their bills are written. They would all be compelled to receive their dues in this Government paper, which would be worthless. It would lead to universal ruin. Banks, individuals, cities, towns, States, would go into one mass of ruin if the nation failed.

Sir, I believe there is but one State in the Union that owes as much as $40,000,000. Most of the States owe very little. Will you say that the States cannot stand this? Will you say that they will not permit it? Sir, you little know the temper of the people of this nation if you do not know that they will stand anything and everything to sustain their Government at this hour. They do not come in conflict. All the real estate of the States is subject to local taxation; all other property is subject to local taxation; and now you simply come in and say, what you have the power to do, as I believe, under the Constitution, that the financial issues of this Government shall be simply subject to national taxation. I believe you have a right to say it. I believe you have a right to insist upon it. I believe it to be the duty of the Senate to insist upon it in this hour of peril.

MR. JOHNSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

MR. SUMNER. Before that motion is put I ask to have the proposition which I have moved printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

MR. JOHNSON. I renew my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 5, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, REV. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

A. BUSH.

MR. McBRIDE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 38, to authorize the settlement of the accounts of A. Bush, late public printer for the Territory of Oregon.

There was no objection; and the bill was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

OREGON BRANCH MINT.

MR. McBRIDE. I also ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 185, to establish a branch of the Mint of the United States at Dalles City, in the State of Oregon.

There was no objection; and the bill was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

DANIEL H. BINGHAM.

MR. LONG, by unanimous consent, moved that the papers in the case of Daniel H. Bingham be taken from the Speaker's table and recommitted to the Committee of Claims for further examination.

The motion was agreed to.

FOREIGN AND COASTING TRADE.

MR. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, moved to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 223, to regulate the foreign and coasting trade of the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, and for other purposes.

There was no objection; and the bill was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REBELLIOUS STATES BILL.

MR. BRANDEGEE, by unanimous consent, recorded his vote in the affirmative on the rebellious States bill; and Messrs. McKINNEY, MORRIS of Ohio, KING, ROBINSON, McDOWELL, and ENGLISH recorded their votes in the negative.

EMPLOYÉS IN GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

On motion of MR. FENTON, the Committee of Ways and Means were discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of three hundred employés in the Government printing office for such modification of the law as will place them on an equality with other Government employés in regard to the hours required for labor, and the same was referred to the Committee on Printing.

MR. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the special order.

MR. GANSON. I desire to call up at this time the contested-election case of Bruce vs. Loan, of Missouri. The case has been deferred already to accommodate other business.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules takes precedence; because that motion suspends the rule under which election cases can be taken up as a matter of privilege.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

MR. STEVENS. I ask leave of absence for MR. THAYER for one week.

No objection being made, leave was granted accordingly.

CLAIMS OF PENNSYLVANIA.

MR. STEVENS. I want the Pennsylvania claim disposed of, and I must insist upon my motion.

MR. KING. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allow me to make a report from the Committee on the Judiciary, with a view to have it referred to the Committee of the Whole.

MR. STEVENS. A number of gentlemen around me also desire to make reports, and those things can be done after this matter is disposed of.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (MR. PIKE in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being a bill (H. R. No. 117) to reimburse the State of Pennsylvania for expenses in calling out the militia of said State during the recent invasion.

MR. STEVENS. There was a substitute offered for this bill. Before the question is taken on that substitute, I ask to amend the original bill by striking out all after the word "reimburse," and inserting what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. There are two amendments pending to the original bill; one proposed by the gentleman from New York, [MR. GANSON], and an amendment to that amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [MR. FARNSWORTH].

MR. STEVENS. I supposed those were amendments to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. They were offered to the bill.

MR. STEVENS. The substitute which I offer is merely changing the wording of the original bill, and I hope there will be no objection to my offering it.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "reimburse," and insert the following:

The institutions and individuals who advanced money to pay the Pennsylvania soldiers who were called out by the proclamation of the President of the United States and the Governor of Pennsylvania to repel the invasion in Maryland and Pennsylvania by the rebel forces under General Lee in the summer of 1863, and who were in the actual service of the United States, the sum of $700,000; and any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated is hereby appropriated to pay to the Governor of Pennsylvania in trust for the above-mentioned purposes.

No objection being made, the substitute was adopted.

MR. STEVENS. I suppose the vote will first be taken upon the amendments to the original bill as it now stands. I hope they will all be voted down.

The amendment offered by MR. FARNSWORTH to the amendment was read, as follows:

Provided, That only so much shall be paid out of the Treasury in pursuance of the provisions of this act as shall appear from the muster-in and muster-out rolls to be necessary to pay those troops only who were mustered into the service of the United States, and were regularly mustered out.

MR. FARNSWORTH. I call for tellers upon the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and MR. KELLOGG, of Michigan, and MR. NOBLE, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 45, noes 60.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The amendment offered by MR. GANSON was then read, and is as follows:

Provided, That the expenses of none of the militia of any State shall be paid under this act who refused to be mustered into the service of the United States.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The substitute offered by Mr. Cox was next read, and is as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That to defray the expenses incurred in the raising, equipping, transportation, and subsistence of minute men, militia, and volunteers in Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, Michigan, Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, Missouri, Iowa, Illinois, West Virginia, and Kansas to repel rebel raids, the sum of $15,000,000 be and the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; said expense to be settled upon proper vouchers, to be filed and passed upon by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury: Provided, That in determining the claims to be allowed under this act the same principles, rules, and regulations shall be observed by the accounting officers in auditing said expenses as have been applied to the claims allowed to States under the act approved July 27, 1861, entitled "An act to indemnify the States for expenses incurred by them in defense of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] moved to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio by substituting therefor the following:

Sec. 1. That a board of three commissioners, to be appointed by the President, is hereby established to ascertain the total amount of indebtedness that has been incurred by the loyal States, and by the towns, cities, and counties within those States, in their efforts to raise, organize, and equip troops for the present war; and said commissioners shall hold their sessions in the city of Washington from and after the 1st day of October next, and shall have power to employ such number of clerks as they may find necessary, not exceeding four, one of each class.

Sec. 2. Said commissioners shall give notice, by advertisement in at least one paper in each loyal State, of the time and place of their sessions; that all duly authorized agents may attend and present their claims for debts incurred for the general or particular defense during the war, and on the evidence thereof according to the principles of general equity, (although such claims may not have been sanctioned by the laws of Congress,) to allow the same as a charge against the United States, subject to the approval of Congress, to be liquidated and paid by the issuance to said claimants of bonds of the United States, payable in — years, with interest at the rate of — per cent. per annum, or in lawful money of the United States to be hereafter appropriated as may hereafter be elected by Congress: Provided always, That the rule for apportioning to States the amounts to be refunded under this act shall be the same that is prescribed by the Constitution of the United States for the apportionment of Representatives and direct taxes.

Sec. 3. Said commissioners shall respectively take an oath before a judge of the United States court that they will faithfully discharge their duties; they shall each be paid at the rate of eight dollars per day, and shall make final report of their doings to Congress on or before the first Monday of December, A. D. 1865.

Mr. PEREA. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] will include New Mexico in his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Maine.

The question was taken; and Mr. BLAINE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. COX. I modify my amendment so as to read as follows:

That to defray the expenses incurred in raising, equipping, transporting, and paying the minute men, militia, and volunteers called out and in the actual service of the United States in repelling rebel raids and invasions of the State of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and the other loyal States, the sum of $15,000,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; the said expenses to be settled upon proper vouchers, to be filed in the proper offices in the Treasury and passed upon by the Second Auditor.

The question was put on the amendment; and there were—ayes 42, noes 60.

Mr. GANSON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KING and ARNOLD were appointed.

Mr. STEVENS. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio whether this amendment is offered as a substitute for the bill of the Committee of Ways and Means, or as an addition to it.

Mr. COX. As a substitute.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope he will move it as an addition to the bill.

Mr. COX. I moved it first as a substitute, but I will withdraw that motion and move it now as an additional section to the bill.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to insert after the word "States" the words "and Territories."

Mr. COX. I accept that as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is this question open for remarks?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say, before the vote is taken on the amendment of my colleague, that the subject contained in that amendment is before the Committee on Military Affairs; and a request has been made to the War Department to forward to that committee all the facts that relate to such claims as are referred to in this amendment. We are daily expecting a full report from the War Department. These claims are of various classes—some strong and some, perhaps, weak claims; and it is exceedingly important that we have the whole subject before us officially before we take action. I hope that the committee will not appropriate any money out of the Treasury in this general way until we know the scope and character of these claims. I hope that this amendment will not prevail.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope it will.

Mr. SMITH. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio how the Committee on Military Affairs can arrive at any estimate as to the amount of money that will be required to pay these men that have been actually called out in the loyal States for temporary exigencies. I would also inquire why an appropriation cannot be as well made now as it can afterwards? There is not before the War Department nor is there in the city of Washington any evidence—or scarcely any—of the claims of these men who have been called out. Men have gone into the service for twenty, thirty, forty, and fifty days whose claims are not here, and who have never presented them, for the simple reason that Congress has made no appropriation, and there has been no legislation on the subject, and consequently they believe that there is no chance for them to be paid. The War Department, therefore, knows nothing about those claims; and the Committee on Military Affairs can never hear anything about them. I believe that the claim is a just one, and that these men who have gone out temporarily and served are as much entitled to be paid, and the widows and children of those who fell as much entitled to compensation, as if they had been regularly mustered into the service. I therefore hope that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD. In answer to the gentleman from Kentucky I will say that the Secretary of War states there is a large amount of papers in his Department—claims filed for all these States referred to by the gentleman—which papers he is now collecting and preparing to send to the Committee on Military Affairs. These claims embrace parties who have served eight or ten or fifteen days; some of them for a much shorter period. Others, as those in Missouri, have served for one hundred days; and still others for six months. They embrace all grades, some where the men were not mustered into the service at all, some who have gone off in organizations, and others who have gone off without organization, as the squirrel-hunters of Ohio. Some of them went half way to the place of rendezvous when they were met and ordered to return. There is a large class of claims, and it seems to me that it is impossible for Congress to appropriate money in any degree of justice or equity in the present state of information on that subject. It is the intention of the Committee on Military Affairs to introduce a bill for the appointment of a commission to hear all these claims that may be presented by any of the States, to sit during the recess of Congress, to be made up of civilians and military men as may be determined, and to report at next session the result of their investigations. It appears to me that to appropriate money, before we know anything as to the extent of the claims—which I believe will go far up among the millions—would be, in the highest degree, impolitic. I hope, therefore, the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. SMITH. I ask the gentleman from Ohio whether other parts of this bill do not provide that none of this money shall be paid except on good vouchers. As a matter of course these claims have to be determined by a commission. How can the Committee on Military Affairs get any idea as to whether the claims are good or not? The matter might be discussed before the committee for a month without any determination being reached.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not say that the Committee on Military Affairs is to adjudicate these claims. It is only a proposition that the Committee on Military Affairs may learn enough of the character and extent and scope of these claims as to be able to frame a law and such rules as will guide the commission to be appointed for the purpose of investigating fully and reporting to Congress at its next session.

Mr. ODELL. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] asks, how can these claims be adjusted? They can be adjusted according to the precedent established by Congress in relation to the claims of Missouri. We have twice made an appropriation of money to pay these claims, and they have been paid by a commission appointed to investigate the claims of the State of Missouri.

Mr. SMITH. I understand that; but the gentleman will allow me to say just here that the commission appointed to investigate these Missouri claims was appointed under a preceding act of Congress. This bill provides that a similar commission shall be appointed to investigate all these claims.

Mr. KING. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ODELL] misapprehends the facts, as to the manner in which the claims of Missouri have been provided for. These claims were of the character attempted to be provided against by an amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH]. The troops had never been regularly mustered into the service. They had been called into service, had done a good deal of service, and had been engaged in several battles where many were killed. When compensation was sought it was ascertained that they never had been mustered into the service of the United States. The whole question was how they should be paid. A commission was appointed to take testimony, and the report showed that there was some eight hundred thousand dollars due. They recommended that to Congress and we appropriated that amount. It is to go through the hands of the War Department. I am sorry that it is the last we of Missouri have heard of that appropriation since the day that we passed it here. There has been no order to pay it. There is no money I suppose to pay it. It says that the amount is to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and I expect that all that has been in the Treasury up to this time has been otherwise appropriated. How long these Missourians will have to wait I do not know. But I am not complaining about that. I want the House to understand that.

This is a different kind of case. And I am glad that the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD], of the Committee on Military Affairs, has disclosed what he intends to do in reference to these claims. Although we have come here and obtained an appropriation of $700,000 for men in the first emergency of the war called irregularly into the service by General Fremont when he was in command there, since then we have had the militia organized and mustered into the service, and it has been recognized by the Federal Government. Missouri has been compelled to raise $3,000,000 and pay it out to these men in what are called State defense warrants. We have made these warrants receivable for taxes in our State. In that way it deprives us of the means to carry on our ordinary State affairs. We are in the position that we ought to have this money back. I do not know what other States will do, but Missouri will not ask a cent except what will pass the ordeal of the War and Treasury Departments.

I have been of the opinion that the act of July, 1862, was sufficient to cover our case; but the Secretary of the Treasury takes a different view of the matter, as was said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS], when asked why the Secretary of the Treasury did not pay these claims under that act. The Treasury Department has decided that a special appropriation is necessary. I make no issue with the Treasury Department; yet its understanding of the law is not my understanding. We of Missouri and Pennsylvania are driven here under that construction of the act of 1862.

Now, if the States interested are to wait until a commission is appointed, the testimony may not be taken before next winter, and then it may be put off to another Congress. In the mean time, what are we to do? We have already paid out $3,000,000, and the State of Missouri has incurred great expense in doing it. We did it because we wanted to sustain the honor and the integrity and the good faith of the Government. We wanted to show our people when they volunteered their services for the country that they should be paid. Now we are to be kept out of that money for an indefinite length of time. We have our pay rolls, our muster-in rolls, and all of the papers required under the military organization of the Government. They have been brought here, and I think are now before the Committee on Military Affairs. We want no commissioners. We are willing to pass the ordeal of the War and Treasury Departments.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, we have already provided, so far as we can in this House, for the payment of the claims of Missouri, unless they have others outside of what we have acted on.

Mr. KING. Have you provided for Missouri?

Mr. GARFIELD. We passed an appropriation in a former Congress for the payment of such troops from the State of Missouri as have been in the United States service.

Mr. KING. Does the gentleman refer to the law passed at the early part of the session to pay what are called home guards?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir; and $800,000 have already gone to the proper disbursing officers to be paid out in the gentleman's State.

Mr. KING. I understand that.

Mr. ODELL. My friend, the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. KING.] says that I am mistaken in the statement I made in reference to the provisions of the act passed for the payment of the Missouri militia which were not mustered into the regular service of the United States. I have no better evidence than the act itself which I hold in my hand, and which I will read:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of ascertaining the amount due said State for money so expended, the Secretary of War shall, immediately after the passage of this act, by a commission or otherwise, cause the accounts to be examined and a report made to him of the amount due, which being approved by the Secretary of War and by him certified to the Secretary of the Treasury, the amount thereof shall be allowed to said State, and deducted from the amount apportioned thereto by the aforesaid act, and the remainder only, if any, shall be collected as therein prescribed."

One word more. The gentleman from Missouri not only claims that I am in error in reference to the law, but in reference to the appointment of the commissioners upon whose report this money is to be paid. Now, I hold in my hand a speech, a remarkable speech, made by my friend from the St. Louis district, [Mr. Blow,] in which he makes the statement to his constituents that on or before the 15th of this present month that money, $800,000, will be paid; that he has the assurance of the Secretary of the Treasury to that effect. Now, all I ask in this matter is that the same course shall be pursued in reference to the balance of the indebtedness to the State of Missouri and every other State; that the claims shall go before a commission, be examined, and come before the House where alone we can take that action which will secure a faithful distribution of this money. It must be paid through the War Department, or not at all, in harmony with what we have already done in this case, but once before in the case of Missouri.

Mr. BLOW. I desire to say to the gentleman from New York that he has correctly stated the proposition in regard to the bill passed last December for paying the home guard of Missouri. Those claims are at this very moment in process of being paid.

And I desire to correct what I think is a wrong impression in this House in regard to the difference between the position of Pennsylvania and that of any other State making a claim before this body. In our committee we examined the claim of Pennsylvania and reported to this House. For myself I see no difference between the position of Pennsylvania and the position that the State of Missouri occupied before this body in the month of December last. I consider the claims of Pennsylvania presented to the Treasury Department and audited under the law of 1861, and presented to this body, as just as the claims which Congress has allowed to the home guards of Missouri; and, sir, I think it almost unfair to make a distinction and to place Pennsylvania in a situation in which her just claims will be deferred.

Mr. KING. I desire to make myself understood by the gentleman from New York. He certainly misunderstood me. I say that the claims of Missouri provided for last December were irregular claims—claims for the services of soldiers whom we could not show had been regularly mustered into the service of the United States. Consequently the Secretary of War could not recognize them, nor could the Secretary of the Treasury.

But the difference between the claims of Missouri now and the claims then is, that our claims now are regular, and we can show that our men were regularly mustered into the service of the United States, so that we want no commissioners to ascertain anything. There is a marked difference between the two cases.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say only a word upon this whole subject. This House has already determined, in a measure before it some weeks ago, that it will not at the present time take up all that class of claims known as incidental damages and pay them. If a man's farm has been utterly broken up by our armies, or by the rebel armies, we do not now pay nor have we at all up to this time paid such a claim. We have confined ourselves entirely to paying for supplies taken for commissary and quartermaster stores.

It is now proposed by the amendment of my colleague, notwithstanding this wise and conservative legislation, to appropriate beforehand $150,000,000 to be paid in a variety of ways, for which at present there is no law. It is referred to the Second Auditor of the Treasury to see that the vouchers are proper in their form. Now, by the rules of the Department, the Second Auditor of the Treasury can pay no claims of soldiers for services unless they have been mustered into the United States service. That is the law of the country and the law of his Department. But here is a proposition that he shall pay these claims, no matter whether the men were mustered in or not.

Well, now, what are these claims? They are of every description, from four hours' service to four months' service.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to ask my colleague if his opposition is to the whole bill or only to the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. My opposition is not to the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] The merits of that bill may be perfectly good, for aught I know. I presume it stands upon a different basis.

Mr. SPALDING. I would like to have my colleague state the difference between the claims.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is not my purpose. I have seen only this amendment, and I have seen that it is a sweeping measure to cover all the States and Territories, and to appropriate money beforehand for the payment of claims not yet made up. If Pennsylvania has a claim that has been made up, that has been adjudicated, audited, and passed upon as a just claim, then it has a basis to go upon and we are ready to appropriate the money. If the other States and Territories referred to come here with claims made up, adjudicated, audited, and vouched for, let them be presented and let us see what they are and then appropriate money for the payment of them; but let us not beforehand advance money to pay claims of which we know nothing. Let us do as we have done in the case of Missouri, have a commission appointed to investigate the nature and scope of these claims. It will be the special work of that commission to examine the whole subject, and they can do it better and more thoroughly than we can possibly do it here. We can then pay on a uniform system of equity all such claims of all the States and Territories. I do not believe in our paying a little here in a special way and a little yonder in another special way, or in paying the whole in a general, loose, and irregular way. I hope this amendment will be voted down.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would inquire of my colleague if he knows any reason why the claims of Pennsylvania should not be disposed of in the same way as the claims of other States, and go to commissioners to be investigated and reported on hereafter?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not say that there is any reason. I am not informed on that subject. I only say that I am clearly and decidedly opposed to this amendment. I do not know that the claim of Pennsylvania is different from others, but I think it ought to be acted on on its own merits.

Mr. SMITH. The gentleman does not seem to take into consideration the reasons why these claims of other States have not been presented, although the service has been rendered. One great reason why they have not been made out is that the men have had no hope of their payment until Congress should take some action in the matter. These men whose names do not appear and have never appeared on the muster-roll have no reason to hope for anything hereafter.

It is proposed that a commission shall be appointed to inquire into the justice of all these claims. Hundreds and thousands of men have been called out in all the border States temporarily, many of them without the hope or expectation of compensation. Many of them have been killed; many of them have been wounded; many of them have lost various kinds of property; and they stand to-day unpaid and unrecognized by any legislation upon the part of Congress. I commend in the highest degree the energy of gentlemen from Missouri and Pennsylvania in urging their claims upon the consideration of Congress.

But while we of other States look upon and admire that energy on their part, we feel that we too have equally strong claims to be satisfied. While in other States men have been called out once or twice, in Kentucky they have been called out thirty or forty times. While other States have lost comparatively few of their citizens in this way, Kentucky has lost a very great many in defense of the country, without any consideration whatever on the part of the Government.

Now, here is a plain proposition on the part of Congress to pay these men for the time absolutely given to the country. Most of the men who have thus gone out are men who have been dependent on their daily labor for their bread and raiment. I know the fact, in my own community, in my district, in my own State, because I have been all over it. I have seen it in all of its phases and conditions since the rebellion began. And I know that ninety-nine out of every one hundred of those who have taken up arms temporarily for the defense of the State and country, and to repel invasion, were men taken from the plow, from the anvil, from the shop, from the machinery, and who gave labor and time, for days and weeks and months, to the country. These are the men who are to be indemnified under this bill, and under the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. Why should we hesitate? Why should we hold back? Why should we have all these claims referred to the War Department? The War Department is to-day so full of papers that you can scarcely turn round in it; and there are not enough of clerks there at this time to look over and adjust these papers in twelve months. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] asks that the Committee on Military Affairs shall be allowed to consider this matter that they may approximate the amount necessary to be appropriated; and that then Congress at its next session can make the appropriation. But in the mean time the just claims of these people are to be ignored. Now is the appropriate time when these claims should be satisfied.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. Chairman, the principle has been long since adopted and recognized of paying men who did actual military service, whether they were regularly mustered in or not. Some considerable time ago, before any claim had been audited, before any commission had been issued, the first step on the part of Missouri was to have an act passed providing for the payment of men who had been actually in military service in the department of Missouri, whether regularly mustered in or not. That gave notice to Missouri. There was some chance for them then to get their vouchers ready. After that preliminary act was passed, recognizing the validity of these claims, a movement was made for the appointment of a commission to ascertain their amount, and then the report of that commission was followed by an appropriation of $800,000.

All this was done, Mr. Chairman, passing by and ignoring the claims of other States quite as meritorious as those. I do not complain that justice was thus done to Missouri; but it surely was unjust to pass by and ignore the claims of other States equally meritorious. The principle has been recognized long since, and the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] merely goes on that principle. If this bill be passed a commission will issue, and the claims of citizens of Kentucky and other States will be ascertained under it; but until some such commission is authorized the claimants will not move in the matter. I give notice that before the vote is taken, I shall move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio by inserting after the words "actual service" the words "whether regularly mustered into the service of the United States or not." That will embrace all men who did actual military service, and put them on the same footing with the soldiers of Missouri.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to explain the reasons why the claims of Missouri were submitted to a commission. They were submitted to a commission because they were neither mustered into the service of the State of Missouri nor of the United States. They went into the service in defiance of the laws of Missouri and in defiance of the laws of the United States. The President of the United States called on the Governor of Missouri for troops. The Governor of Missouri at that time was Claiborne F. Jackson, who was a traitor, and at that time engaged in negotiating with the southern confederacy and acting in concert with it. He refused to answer the call of the President of the United States. These men—these home guards, as they were then called—went into the service under General Lyon, without a call from Missouri, and in defiance of the laws of Missouri, for the secession Legislature of that State had passed a law prohibiting the enrollment of any troops in Missouri under the Federal Government. These troops were mustered in as home guards. There were no means, either through the State of Missouri or the Federal Government, of ascertaining that they had rendered service. But in regard to the militia called into the service of the United States since that time there have been such means, because they were mustered into the service of the State and called out in conformity to the laws of the State. The reason why the commission was necessary in the former case was that the service could not be ascertained either through the Governor of the State or through the officers of the United States. It could not be ascertained that these men had rendered service. They were in fact an illegal organization, admitted to be so, but necessarily raised under the emergency of the occasion. The militia that the resolution proposes to pay are regular State militia, and the State has vouchers that the service was rendered. The money has been paid, or the State has pledged its faith for its payment. That is the reason why in this particular case, and in this class of cases, there is no occasion for a commission.

Mr. HARDING. I make no issue with the gentleman from Missouri in regard to these matters, but I want him to say whether I am not right that the act was passed long before any commission was established, and before any claim was ascertained of this general character for men who performed service but who were not regularly mustered in? Am I not right that it was provided they should receive pay, bounty, and pension as if they had been mustered in?

Mr. HALL. Most unquestionably the gentleman is right.

Mr. HARDING. That is the whole matter in regard to Missouri. I am not making any objection in regard to it.

Mr. HALL. I do not understand that the gentleman made objection.

Mr. HARDING. What I want to be understood in regard to is this: that when that act was passed, notwithstanding these Missouri men were not mustered in, it was provided that they should receive pay, bounty, and pension the same as if they had been mustered in. I say that that principle embraced a numerous class of soldiers in other States whose claims for the time being were ignored, and those of Missouri were put upon a high and advanced ground.

There are a number of men in my own State who rendered the same character of service that these men in Missouri have. Yet the latter have been paid $800,000 by the Federal Government, and the same men in my State have not been paid. There were organizations not completed called suddenly into service—the country being in a state of excitement, terror, and alarm—and but a few organizations were mustered into the service. We have been as patient in regard to the claims of our soldiers as any other State. Every man familiar with Kentucky knows this to be true, that the State was thrown into a terrible alarm. All troops, whether the organizations were complete or not, were hurried into the service by order of the commander there, and to my knowledge a great many of those soldiers have never been paid. Many were killed who were never paid. They were not mustered in because of the exigencies of the time. They were gallant, brave, and loyal men, and many of them fell in various skirmishes before they had been mustered regularly into the service of the United States. They were raised and regularly mustered into the State service, but they had to be passed over and mustered into the service of the United States. During the intervening period important services were rendered, for which no provision has been made. All I insist upon, however, is that the benefits of the provision for Missouri shall be extended to the other States, including my own.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to say but a few words, and then I will move that the committee rise. I regret that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] should have found it necessary to offer his amendment, not because I have much objection to the provision itself, but because it seems likely to embarrass the bill. I should greatly prefer that the question be taken upon the naked merits of the claims of Pennsylvania. The amendment is evidently offered for the purpose of killing the bill. I again say, that to the general provisions of the amendment I should have no objection were it in the proper bill.

It appears by a communication from the Secretary of War, indorsed by the President of the United States, that the troops which were called out from Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New York, to meet Lee, went into the actual service. I do not know that there was time to go through the process of what is called mustering in.

Mr. HARDING. I understood the gentleman to intimate that he intends to move that the committee rise. Will he allow me, before he does that, to offer an amendment?

Mr. STEVENS. I only desire to rise in order to close debate. The gentleman can offer his amendment after that just as well as now.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I hope my colleague will give me a few minutes before he moves that the committee rise.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman may proceed now.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, before entering at all upon the discussion of the bill immediately under consideration, I desire to say a word or two upon a subject of more immediate concern. I find in to-day's paper an order issued by General Meade reflecting upon certain troops of the army of the Potomac. I have more than once to-day heard that that order related to the Pennsylvania reserves. I desire to say here—and I say it upon the best authority, which I am ready to give to the House if it be disputed—that it in no manner relates to the Pennsylvania reserves, and that two or three days before this order which appears this morning was promulgated, the difference which existed between the United States Government and the Pennsylvania reserves as to the date of mustering was settled satisfactorily by the appeal which General Meade indicated in a former order as the proper source of relief, to wit, the War Department. The War Department acceded to the justice of the demand in reference to the mustering, so far as these troops were concerned. I make this statement in order that the rumors and the common talk about the Pennsylvania reserves may at once be stopped.

Now, sir, when the claim under consideration was before this House upon a former occasion an attempt was made to mystify it between two existing laws. It is sufficient for me to know that those whose duty it was to execute the laws which Congress passed had decided that under no law existing could the War Department or the Treasury Department assent to the payment of these claims; therefore additional legislation is necessary. The matter of the mustering of these troops has been referred to. These troops were called out by the Governor of Pennsylvania after the proclamation of the President. They did not inquire, but they believed that they were mustered into the service of their country in good faith, and they acted accordingly in good faith. They marched side by side with the best soldiers of the United States; and, to their honor be it said, they acquitted themselves well and nobly, and at the end of their service received the thanks of the officers of the United States who commanded them.

Now, as to the immediate occasion for this duty, let me say to the House that Pennsylvania, when her borders were being invaded, found herself in exactly the condition the United States was in when she found herself without money wherewith to pay these troops. An appeal was made to the United States Government upon this subject, and the officers of the Government reported that they possessed neither the law nor the money to pay the expenses. Then, sir, was it that the patriotic citizens of Philadelphia, who upon a former occasion had in part advanced $150,000,000 in the true spirit of nationality and patriotism, came forward and advanced this money. This money is not to be paid to Pennsylvania. She stands, as it were, simply as an indorser. And, sir, I ask is there any equity, is there any justice in this House in refusing to pay these individual citizens, who, in violation perhaps of their strict duty to the stockholders of these banking institutions, came forward and advanced the money? I mistake the disposition of this House if they will do it.

Mr. Chairman, I voted on a former occasion with the greatest possible pleasure for the claim of the State of Missouri for the payment of their citizens, who had not been mustered into the service it is true, but who, having performed the duty of soldiers, were entitled to payment for such service. The House, I think, unanimously voted in favor of the payment of that claim. Can they now refuse to pay this to Pennsylvania? Can they make a distinction among the States in this respect?

Sir, I need not go so far back as that. Only within a few days past the two Houses of Congress have passed a bill, and perhaps it is now by reason of the President's signature a law, appropriating $25,000,000 to pay the troops called out from Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and other western States, who will occupy precisely the same position that these Pennsylvania soldiers occupied upon the occasion to which we allude.

Now, sir, the Legislature of Pennsylvania is about to adjourn. It will adjourn to-day. I trust, therefore, that the House will at once pass this bill. I do not object to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] per se, which proposes to pay all the States which have likewise contracted debts of this description, but I say, to use a homely phrase, "Let every tub stand upon its own bottom." We have placed in the appropriate Department proper vouchers as to all these claims. They have been audited and approved, and they have been said to be correct by the President and Secretary of War.

A word more, sir, and I will close. On more than one occasion a personal allusion has been made here to myself in reference to some service that I rendered in having the privilege to command a company on this occasion, (the first city troop Philadelphia city cavalry.) I wish to say to this House and to my constituents and to the people of my State that not one cent of the money now asked for will ever directly or indirectly reach me or any member of my company. They went there at a moment's notice, and they have not to this day asked a cent of the Government nor do they intend to. I say it to their honor. I should not have thrust this before the House but for the fact that one or two gentlemen here have said that I am a willing witness in this matter. I was a willing actor then. I hope the gentlemen who have called me a willing witness will do as some of my men have done, be willing actors hereafter should the necessity occur. Sir, these men performed—no man will gainsay it—important services. They scouted the country and enabled General Meade to have a knowledge of the movements of the enemy. They did all they could. They acted in good faith. All we ask is that they shall be paid for their services.

Mr. STEVENS. As I said before, I have but a few words to say, for I think the House understands this matter.

Mr. SCHENCK. Understanding that the gentleman from Pennsylvania designs to move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate, I ask him to yield to me for four or five minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield to the gentleman. Mr. SCHENCK. It strikes me that the House manifests a disposition this morning to dispose of, or in some way act upon, a question of very grave importance as it regards the means of the country and its Treasury, and what is due to the citizens of the different States, without a very great deal of consideration of the effect of its legislation.

This bill, introduced in behalf of the State of Pennsylvania, has called out, as might naturally be expected, comments from gentlemen upon it, and allusions to like claims from the people of other States, and reference has been made to the history of legislation at this session upon the subject. I understand what we have done heretofore, at the present session of Congress, to be about this: the last Congress having entertained an application for payments to be made for the services of the home guards of Missouri, authorized the appointment of commissioners to investigate thoroughly and carefully the claims of Missouri for such services of her citizens, and provided that the amount awarded to that State should be paid to them when ascertained. This Congress was called upon to pay that award. I voted for the bill to pay $800,000 to Missouri upon the distinct ground and understanding that it was not an original claim brought here for payment, to be here established, by proofs submitted, to the satisfaction of Congress, but that it was a mere call upon the part of the State of Missouri for an appropriation to meet and satisfy a verdict rendered in her favor under previous legislation. That makes the case of the State of Missouri entirely different from the case which is now presented, either in behalf of other States, or in behalf of Pennsylvania according to this original bill.

Now we are called upon, first, by the bill introduced by the Committee of Ways and Means, to vote several hundred thousand dollars to satisfy the claims of Pennsylvania for the service of soldiers who turned out for the defense of the State and country on account of the rebel invasion. It was not to be expected that this would be permitted to pass without remark from other States, because there are like claims existing in behalf of citizens of other States, and presented by Representatives of those States. If we open the door for one we must open it for all. I claim, therefore, that the principle, at least of the amendment offered by my colleague on the other side of the House, is correct; that whatever legislation there should be on this subject ought to be an all-embracing legislation, providing for the citizens of all States who have been thus called upon to render service to the common country, unless it can be shown that the claim of Pennsylvania stands on a different footing from the claims of other States.

To show, Mr. Chairman, what a door will be opened if we take up any one of these claims and act upon it, without reference to other claims, let me again refer to the history of the claims of the State of Missouri. We have paid to Missouri some eight hundred thousand dollars for the service of her home guards. But the appropriation of this money which is now ready to be paid over to her seems to be but the opening wedge for a greater claim which she has since preferred. I do not say this, meaning to infer that the second claim is not as just as the first, or not entirely just; but to show that Missouri is by no means satisfied with what Congress has done for her, in appropriating the amount of the awards, $800,000. A bill has been reported by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAIR,] who has left this Hall—whether to resume his seat or not I do not know, [laughter,]—from the Committee on Military Affairs, with the distinct understanding on the part of the committee that it was not to be considered as binding the committee, but that it was to be recommitted immediately on being reported, to be considered in connection with other claims of like character. That bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to the Governor of the State of Missouri or to his duly authorized agent, the costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred by that State for enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, and transporting its troops, employed in aiding to suppress insurrection against the United States, such troops being commonly known as the six months' men and the enrolled militia of the State of Missouri; such payment to be made on the filing of the proper vouchers.

It is not worth while, Mr. Chairman, to remark on the crudeness of that bill, its looseness, its provision that the payment shall be made in gross to the Governor of the State, and its failure to provide to whom the vouchers shall be exhibited, and who shall determine the accuracy of the claims. I refer to it now for the purpose of saying that while, on its face, that bill does not intimate the amount of this additional demand of Missouri, yet, on being interrogated by the Committee on Military Affairs, it was ascertained that it would amount to $3,000,000, or over. Three millions, in addition to the $800,000 already paid to Missouri! Now, for the purpose of this argument, I do not say whether or not this is a just demand against the United States, but the claim is that having already received, under the award made by the commission, $800,000, Missouri still claims that for her six months' men and her enrolled militia there is $3,000,000 yet due.

And Missouri does not stand alone in this. Kentucky also has similar claims. No one who has not been within the borders of those States knows how much they have suffered. Kentucky must be expected to have a very large claim of like character. She has not sent forward, as Missouri has, the evidences of her claims, because the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARDING] says she did not expect payment. But the claims are known to exist there probably quite equal to the claims of Missouri. Ohio has presented her claims, amounting to between three and four hundred thousand dollars, in connection with repelling a raid within her borders, and other services of a like character rendered under State authority, for which we have received no compensation. Maryland has a claim; Indiana, Illinois, and New Mexico have claims. Half of the loyal States have claims of this kind. And under these circumstances, I put it to the House whether it is right and proper to take up the subject by piecemeal unless there is a special case with peculiar reasons for our doing so. I ask whether we shall only legislate for Pennsylvania and one or two other States. I ask whether it will not be better to adopt some general policy to be initiated by the Committee on Military Affairs? Having ascertained what these claims are, and what States present them, will it not be better to provide by law for the appointment of commissioners who shall sit to take testimony and to sift these claims. Having ascertained the amount, and reported it, it would then be right and proper for us to pay it, as we did in the case of Missouri. That was done under a law passed during the last Congress, with the understanding that the award was to be received by Missouri in full payment, and that no additional claim should be made against the General Government.

Now, unless we adopt some policy providing for opening the door and paying what is due and closing the door against claims ascertained by commissioners to be unjust, no man can tell to what extent Congress may go in this loose way in reference to the claims of the several States.

I repeat that it is not necessary that I should be interested in opposing the claims of Missouri or Kentucky, or any other State; and I am willing to postpone the claim of my own State until some general policy has been adopted. I think that these claims ought to be postponed on several accounts. Even if the Treasury were full to overflowing I should still insist that we should first prescribe the mode by which the exact amount should be ascertained. Let the commissioners make their awards, and then let payments be made on those awards. Do not let us open the Treasury, as is here proposed, like a crevasse in the Mississippi river, to have it flooded with these claims. Do not let us act in reference to particular cases, but let us establish some general rule covering all these claims.

Mr. Chairman, it will not do to quote the case of Missouri as a precedent for what it is proposed to do for Pennsylvania. On the contrary I quote the action in the case of Missouri under the legislation of the last Congress as a precedent in favor of adopting the policy I contend for, with this difference, that that policy was applied to a single State which I would have applied to all. We have merely paid the award found in favor of the State of Missouri under the law of a former Congress. I propose a like award in all cases from all of the States shall be made under some general legislation. As I have already said, we are now preparing in the Committee on Military Affairs general legislation, so that Pennsylvania and all the States shall come in upon a like footing. In view of these considerations I intend to propose when the bill is brought into the House that it shall be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, to be reported back whenever the committee pleases.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, as I have already stated, I believe that the House is pretty well satisfied with the discussion on this bill. I only wish to restate the case for Pennsylvania. As to the other States, I will not follow the debate. I am sorry that this question has been embarrassed by any proposition affecting any other State, although I have no objection to them individually.

When Lee invaded Pennsylvania the President called for sixty thousand troops. These troops came from New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania; the larger portion from Pennsylvania, which was nearer. They went into the service of the United States, were put under the command of General Meade and General Smith; they were clothed by the United States; their arms were furnished by the United States, and they marched down to the front and joined General Meade. Some of them were in battle, and one of them, within sight of my place in another county, was killed. They were all in the service. I do not know whether there was time for what is called mustering in, technically speaking, but they all received their rations, their clothing, and their arms from the United States. They were all under the command of United States officers, and they fought in the United States cause. All those troops from New York and New Jersey were regularly paid by the Government, but the appropriation ran out before Pennsylvania was reached, and I believe one or two thousand dollars are yet due to New Jersey. When that was done the President of the United States called upon the Governor of Pennsylvania, and the Secretary of War, in a communication which I have read before and which I hold in my hand, asked the Governor of Pennsylvania to negotiate a loan and pay the Pennsylvania troops before they were mustered out. The Governor immediately employed agents in Philadelphia, and those agents borrowed the money from the banks and from rich individuals there upon a promise of the President and of the Secretary of War that when Congress met an appropriation should be recommended to pay them again. And I ask now that the recommendation of the Secretary of War, indorsed by the President, which possibly some gentlemen may not have heard or may have forgotten, may be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The communication is not in the Clerk's hand, but will be sent for.

Mr. STEVENS. The Secretary of War, in compliance with the promise of the faith of the Government, sent a communication through this House to the Committee of Ways and Means asking an appropriation for the liquidated amount settled by the Second Auditor of the Treasury upon vouchers which were satisfactory to him—vouchers of the companies and of the regiments. He asked this Congress to make an appropriation of $700,000 to pay the claims. The President of the United States, upon the back of that recommendation, indorsed his sanction of all the facts stated, and requested Congress to make the payment.

Here, then, was a case wholly different from any case of militia called out by a Governor and not paid. Here was money borrowed upon the faith of this Government, upon the promise of the Executive, upon the promise of the Secretary of War, that as soon as this Congress met it should be repaid. The Governor of Pennsylvania pledged his faith to those individuals that it should be paid. They have advanced the money, and have not received it yet. Now, I ask this House whether they are prepared to violate the faith of the Government, and to refuse to pay the troops of Pennsylvania, when the troops of New York and New Jersey, who were out in the same campaign, were paid? I trust the House is not prepared for anything of this kind.

I know that Pennsylvania has other claims. She has her claim for the three months' militia who were called out to defend the country, and who served for the three months. They were State troops, were militia, and although they served, Pennsylvania has not asked to be paid. Those claims are to lay back with those referred to by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

I say that after paying $800,000 to a portion of the troops engaged in that service, after appropriating $25,000,000 to pay troops about to be called out to lay upon the border, after paying without objection $1,200,000 the other day to Minnesota for the damages which she has sustained from Indian depredations, it does seem hard to refuse to pay this, and it seems as if there were some settled design to make a victim of Pennsylvania, for some reason to me unknown.

As I said before, I do not desire to consume the time of the House. I now ask to have that communication from the Secretary of War read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, January 4, 1864.

STR: The Department has this day received returns of the amounts required for the payment of the militia called out for the defense of the State of Pennsylvania on the 26th of June, 1863, against the invasion by the rebel forces under command of General Lee. There being no appropriation out of which these payments could be made at the time they were required, patriotic citizens of Philadelphia advanced the money, and it is proper that they should be reimbursed without delay. I would respectfully recommend, therefore, that an immediate appropriation for that purpose be made. A copy of a letter of the Second Auditor of the Treasury is herewith communicated, showing the amount of claims audited by him to be $671,476 43 up to date. It is supposed that $700,000 will cover the whole amount of these claims.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours,

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

HON. THADDEUS STEVENS, Chairman Committee Ways and Means.

Mr. STEVENS. It is enough for me to say that upon that the President indorsed his request that Congress should make the appropriation. I will read a word from our Governor, and then I will be done:

"The troops were called at the request of the President, and the money was advanced in Philadelphia to pay them, on the assurance then and to me that Congress would be asked for an appropriation when you met. The assurance was made by the President and Secretary of War."

I now move that the committee rise, with a view to close debate.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PIKE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly a bill to reimburse the State of Pennsylvania for expenses incurred in repelling rebel invasion, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that all debate upon this bill terminate in five minutes after the Committee of the Whole shall again resume its consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 69) for the payment of volunteers called out for not less than one hundred days; and an act (H. R. No. 119) to regulate the admeasurement of tonnage of ships and vessels of the United States; when the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PIKE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill to reimburse the State of Pennsylvania for expenses in calling out the militia of said State during the recent invasion.

Mr. HARDING. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] by inserting after the words "actual service" the words, "whether regularly mustered into the United States service or not."

Mr. WHALEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to occupy the attention of the committee for a few moments only. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania on my left [Mr. RANDALL] to say that in this matter every State would have to stand upon its own bottom. I think there is evidence enough to convince the House that there have been many men in West Virginia and eastern Kentucky who have reported to at least three different generals and have been under military restraint for twelve months without receiving a dollar of pay. There is at least $150,000 due to the militia of eastern Kentucky and West Virginia. The gentleman from Ohio, [General GARFIELD,] who was in command in that section of country, knows very well that the militia of West Virginia rendered him valuable service as scouts. I have certificates from General Julius White, showing that some of our companies rendered him valuable services; and also evidence from General Crook, who was in command in the Kanawha valley. If every State is to stand upon its own bottom I wish the House to understand these facts. We do not ask or expect that every person shall be paid who shouldered a gun for three or four hours, nor do we expect that persons shall be paid for two or three weeks' service.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I did not say that every State must stand on its own bottom, but every tub. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHALEY. I am aware the gentleman said every tub, but I did not know whether he referred to States or to individuals. [Laughter.] I repeat that there is at least one hundred and fifty thousand dollars due to the militia of West Virginia.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman is addressing the Republican side of the House exclusively. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHALEY. I turn to that side of the House for the reason that there are some generals there who are witnesses to the valuable services performed by the militia of my State, and if the gentleman from Ohio will only be patient I will address the other side of the House, as I am anxious that justice be done to every State. These men have never received one dollar for their services, and I hope their claims will not be ignored in this bill. I know that the militia of eastern Kentucky, along the border between the two States, have also performed important services.

Many of these men and their families are now reduced to indigent circumstances, and many have, from necessity, in order to support their families, since volunteered in our Army, and are now gallantly fighting the battles of our country.

While Missouri has received $850,000, and while the present bill would pay the militia of Pennsylvania for their services, it would leave every other border State unprovided for, and I hope that gentlemen on this floor will consider the justice of the claims of other States as well as Missouri and Pennsylvania, and if that cannot be done, then let us all be equal.

I regret exceedingly that by a rule of the House this debate is limited to five minutes, as I desired to give a history of the valuable services rendered by the brave militia of my State; and I appeal to the justice of this House not to leave our brave militia and their families unprovided for, as many of them have been driven from their homes, and are now in a suffering condition, and I hope you will not abandon or forsake them.

Mr. HARDING's amendment to Mr. Cox's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ODELL. I offer the following amendment, to come in as a proviso at the end of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox]:

* Provided, All claims of loyal States and Territories shall be ascertained by three commissioners appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall examine and ascertain the amounts due. Said commissioners shall report the claims with the facts to the Secretary of War, and by him shall be certified to the Secretary of the Treasury. The amounts thus ascertained shall be paid by the proper accounting officers to the claimants or their heirs: Provided further, That in the adjustment of all accounts under this act no greater rate of compensation shall be allowed than by laws existing at time of service of said claimants.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment; and it was disagreed to—ayes twenty-six, noes not counted.

The question recurred on Mr. Cox's amendment.

Mr. CRAVENS demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. A. MYERS and Cox were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 43, noes 54.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PIKE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly bill of the House No. 117, to reimburse the State of Pennsylvania for expenses in calling out the militia of said State during the recent invasion, and had directed him to report the same to the House with amendments, and with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. STEVENS moved the previous question on the third reading of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the bill be laid on the table; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 66, nays 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Boutwell, Brandegee, James S. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Cole, Cox, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Randall, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Shannon, Smithers, William G. Steele, Stevens, Siles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Upson, Webster, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—60.

So the bill was laid on the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. STEELE, of New Jersey, stated that he was paired on this question with the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. KELLOGG,] who was in favor of the bill, he [Mr. STEELE] being opposed to it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, stated that his colleague, Mr. THAYER, was paired off with Mr. PIKE.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. SPALDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. L. MYERS called for the yeas and nays on the latter motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 60, nays 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Boutwell, Brandegee, James S. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Cox, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Randall, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Smith, Smithers, William G. Steele, Stevens, Siles, Strouse, Sweat, Upson, Webster, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—62.

So the House refused to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. SPALDING. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. STEVENS. I make the point of order that the motion cannot be withdrawn after the House has voted on it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. There has been no vote on the question of reconsideration; and it is within the power of the mover to withdraw it before voted on. That is the usage of the House.

Mr. KNAPP. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. ANCONA. I raise the point of order that that question has been already decided in the negative.

The SPEAKER. This same motion to reconsider has not been decided.

Mr. ANCONA. It refers to the same subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SPALDING called for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Boutwell, Brandegee, James S. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Cole, Cox, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Randall, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Upson, Webster, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—62.

So the motion to reconsider was not laid on the table.

The question recurred on the motion to reconsider, on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order while the House is acting under the operation of the previous question, unless upon an actual count the House is found without a quorum.

The question was taken on the motion to reconsider; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 67, nays 57; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Ashley, Baily, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boyd, Broomall, William G. Brown, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Hale, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Philip Johnson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, King, Lazear, Loan, Long, Longyear, Marcy, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, Middleton, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orin, Patterson, Pendleton, Price, Samuel J. Randall, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Upson, Webster, Williams, Wilder, Windom, and Woodbridge—67.

Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scott, Sloan, Spaulding, John B. Steele, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, and Wilson—57.

Mr. LE BLOND. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, for the purpose of submitting the amendment submitted by my colleague [Mr. Cox] in committee.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman will be in order if the motion to lay the bill on the table shall be determined in the negative.

Mr. SPALDING. I will withdraw the motion to lay the bill on the table, if there be no objection.

There being no objection, the motion to lay on the table was withdrawn.

Mr. LE BLOND. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. ANCONA demanded tellers on the motion.

Tellers were not ordered.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to—yeas 62, nays 53; and the question recurred on ordering the main question.

The main question was not ordered.

Mr. LE BLOND. I now move to amend by submitting the following as an additional section:

That to defray the expenses incurred in raising, equipping, transporting, and paying minute men, militia, and volunteers called out and in the actual service of the United States, whether regularly mustered into the service of the United States or not, in repelling rebel raids and invasions of the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and the other loyal States and Territories, the sum of $15,000,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such expenses to be settled upon vouchers to be filed with the proper officers of the Treasury and passed upon by the Second Auditor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to commit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STEVENS. It has never been before that committee.

Mr. SCHENCK. These claims of all the other States were referred to that committee except Pennsylvania, which by some means got before the Committee of Ways and Means. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. SPALDING demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to commit.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 54, nays 80; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Boutwell, Brandegee, James S. Brown, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Thomas T. Davis, Deming, Dixon, Eldridge, Eliot, English, Farnsworth, Ganson, Garfield, Gooch, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Higby, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hutchins, William Johnson, Julian, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Littlejohn, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Daniel Morris, Noble, Norton, Odell, Perham, Pomeroy, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Schenck, Sloan, Spaulding, John B. Steele, Ward, William B. Washburn, and Wheeler—54.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Baily, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boyd, Broomall, William G. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Fenton, Finck, Frank, Grider, Hale, Hall, Harding, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Philip Johnson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, King, Lazear, Loan, Long, Longyear, Marcy, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, Moorhead, Morrill, Charles R. Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, James O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orin, Patterson, Pendleton, Price, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Scott, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Upson, Webster, Whaley, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Yeaman—80.

So the bill was not referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The question then recurred on the amendments of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and they were concurred in.

The question recurring on Mr. LE BLOND's amendment, the House divided, and there were—yeas seventy-six, nays not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. MORRILL. Does this bill appropriate $15,000,000? And is it in order for me, Mr. Speaker, to move that its further consideration shall be postponed until the first Monday of December next?

The SPEAKER. That motion is not now in order.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Is it in order to move that the bill be laid upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I make that motion.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 52, nays 76.

Mr. MORRILL demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 59, nays 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Boutwell, Brandegee, James S. Brown, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Hubbard, Hulburd, William Johnson, Julian, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Littlejohn, Marvin, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Norton, Odell, Orin, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spaulding, John B. Steele, William B. Washburn, and Wilson—59.

NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Anderson,

Baily, Baxter, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boyd, Broomall, William G. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, English, Finck, Frank, Grider, Hale, Hall, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Hooper, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, King, Knapp, Lazear, Le Blond, Loan, Long, Longyear, Marcy, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, Moorhead, James R. Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Noble, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Scott, Smith, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Upson, Webster, Whaley, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, Windom, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—78.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. If the previous question be not seconded, will it not be in order to move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until the next session of Congress?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I hope that it will not be seconded.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 67, nays 50.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. MORRILL demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 71, nays 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Anderson, Baily, Baxter, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boyd, Broomall, William G. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Cox, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Grider, Hale, Hall, Harding, Charles M. Harris, Hooper, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, King, Knapp, Lazear, Le Blond, Loan, Long, Marcy, McAllister, McClurg, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, Moorhead, James R. Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Noble, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Scott, Smith, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Webster, Whaley, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, Windom, and Yeaman—71.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Boutwell, Brandegee, James S. Brown, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Eliot, Fenton, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Herrick, Higby, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, William Johnson, Julian, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Norton, Odell, Orin, Perham, Pomeroy, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spaulding, John B. Steele, Upson, Ward, William B. Washburn, Wilson, and Woodbridge—63.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that evening sessions of the House be dispensed with until otherwise ordered, and that the House adjourn at such hour as it shall see fit.

Mr. COX. I hope that will be done.

Mr. WILSON. I hope that the evening sessions will be continued for business until the committees have been gone through with.

Mr. MORRILL. We will find it impossible to get a quorum to do business, and I understand no one desires to speak.

Mr. WILSON. Many of the committees have not been called for a long time, and they have business prepared which they desire to report to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that the only way in which that object can be attained is to have evening sessions for business, as there are now several reports pending in the morning hour which must be disposed of before other committees can be called.

Mr. WILSON. Then I hope we shall have evening sessions for business.

Mr. COX. I hope the House will dispense with the evening sessions unless there is some long debate on hand. We are laboring much harder than any preceding Congress has done, and I see no necessity for taxing the members of the House to the extent we are doing now. Not only are our labors here severe, but we have much to attend to at the Departments and all around the city, and we ought at least to have some of the evenings of the week, if not all of them, to ourselves.

Mr. STEVENS. If the motion of my colleague should prevail, could a majority afterwards resume evening sessions?

The SPEAKER. A majority of the House would have power to do so.

Mr. WILSON. My motion to amend is that we shall have evening sessions for business.

Mr. PRICE. I hope the amendment will prevail. I hope the House will remain in session until their business is done, and then adjourn. I call for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

Mr. WILSON demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. W. J. ALLEN and Mr. PRICE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas twenty-nine, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 55, nays 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Branderage, Broomall, William G. Brown, Cole, Dawson, Eliot, Finck, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Charles M. Harris, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Julian, Kasson, Kernan, King, Lazear, Littlejohn, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, McDowell, Samuel F. Miller, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Ponderston, Perham, Pomeroy, Price, Scofield, Sloan, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stuart, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—55.

NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Anderson, Baily, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Clay, Cox, Creswell, Dawes, Deming, Denison, Eden, Eldridge, Feunton, Frank, Gauson, Grider, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Herriek, Hooper, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knapp, Le Blond, Loan, Long, Longyear, McKinney, Moorhead, Morrill, James R. Morris, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Noble, Norton, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Patterson, Perry, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Robinson, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scott, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Upson, Ward, Webster, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, and Williams—69.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to amend the motion so that the evening sessions shall be dispensed with until Tuesday of next week, and that after that time the evening sessions shall be for the transaction of business.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The motion of Mr. MORRILL was agreed to.

So the evening sessions were dispensed with until otherwise ordered.

MASSACRE AT FORT PILLOW.

Mr. GOOCH, from the joint committee on the conduct of the war, made a report concerning the late massacre at Fort Pillow; which was laid on the table, and, with the accompanying testimony, ordered to be printed.

Mr. GOOCH introduced the following resolution; which, under the rules, was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That forty thousand copies of the report of the joint committee on the conduct of the war, with the accompanying testimony in relation to the late massacre at Fort Pillow, be printed for the use of the members of this House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 267) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to enable the people of Nevada to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States;'" in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of March 14, 1864, the proceedings of the court-martial in the case of Captain Hunt, assistant quartermaster, in relation to the chartering of vessels, &c.; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

MISSOURI CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. GANSON. I desire to give notice to the House that I shall call up the contested-election case of Bruce vs. Loan to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. KING. I ask leave to make a report from the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BEAMAN objected.

CAPTAIN HUNT.

Mr. MORRILL. I rise to a question of privilege. I do not understand that any regular vote of the House was taken upon printing the document laid before the House by the Speaker in reference to Captain Hunt. I would like to know whether there is any necessity for printing so large a document of that kind?

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I should like to see it in print.

Mr. MORRILL. Do you think anybody else does?

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I do.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the papers were ordered to be printed, with a view of having the matter referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion to print, it was put, and decided in the negative.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the matter be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. SCHENCK, (at half past four o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 6, 1864.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COWAN. I move to postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 162.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that the rule had better be followed in receiving petitions and reports. The rule requires them first to be received.

Mr. COWAN. Very well.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

* Mr. FOSTER presented a memorial of J. S. and C. Adams, and other citizens of Amherst, Massachusetts, remonstrating against the extension of the Goodyear patent for the manufacture of vulcanized India rubber; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

He also presented a memorial of D. W. Huntington and others, citizens of Coventry, Connecticut, remonstrating against the extension of the Goodyear patent for the manufacture of vulcanized India rubber; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. POMEROY presented the petition of John Beeson, praying for the appointment of a special committee to examine into the treatment of the Indians generally, and of the Sioux Indians in particular; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HOWE presented a petition of citizens of Illinois, praying for the establishment of a Bureau of Freedmen; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. FOOT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 199) relating to the compensation of pension agents, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. BUCKALEW, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally adversely:

A bill (S. No. 2) granting a pension to Ellen M. Whipple, widow of the late Major General Amiel W. Whipple, of the United States Army;

A bill (S. No. 44) granting a pension to the widow of the late Major General Hiram G. Berry; and

A bill (S. No. 122) for the relief of Mary A. Baker, widow of Brigadier General Edward D. Baker.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 268) for increased facilities of telegraphic communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States and the Territory of Idaho; which was read twice by its title; referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 117) to reimburse the State of Pennsylvania for expenses in calling out the militia of said State during the recent invasion; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had yesterday approved and signed the following acts:

An act (H. R. No. 220) to vacate and sell the present Indian reservations in Utah Territory, and to settle the Indians of said Territory in the Uinta valley;

An act (H. R. No. 360) for the prevention and punishment of frauds in relation to the names of vessels; and

An act (H. R. No. 371) for the relief of the settlers upon certain lands in California.

FINAL PATENT FEE.

Mr. DIXON. I move that all prior orders be postponed for the purpose of taking up Senate bill No. 114.

Mr. COWAN. I hope the gentleman will allow me to take up two or three little bills from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office. I have been endeavoring to obtain the floor for some time in order to call them up. They are of some importance, but will only require a few minutes to pass them.

Mr. DIXON. I yield.

Mr. COWAN. I now move to postpone all prior orders, and take up Senate bill No. 162.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 162) amendatory of an act to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the progress of the useful arts," approved March 3, 1863, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that any person having an interest in an invention, whether as the inventor or assignee, for which a patent was ordered to issue upon the payment of the final fee, as provided in section three of an act approved March 3, 1863, but who has failed to make payment of the final fee as provided by that act, shall have the right to make the payment of such fee, and receive the patent withheld on account of the non-payment of the fee, provided such payment be made within six months from the date of the passage of this act; but nothing herein contained is to be so construed as to hold responsible in damages any persons who have manufactured or used any article or thing for which a patent was ordered to be issued.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This is a species of partial legislation which, unless there be some reason given for it, I am opposed to. The law now provides the mode of obtaining a patent, and requires the fee to be paid within a certain time. If the time limited by the law is not the right one, extend it, and let it be done by a general law; but here is a special provision to allow somebody to obtain a patent who has not complied with the law. It is of a temporary character. It simply proposes to allow a person to come in within six months after the passage of this act. It only applies to persons who have not paid this fee heretofore. If there is a necessity for such a law as this, make it general, and provide that in all cases everybody shall have sixty days after the time now limited by law within which to pay his fee. It is based upon some case, manifestly, as will be seen by an inspection of the bill. Somebody has not complied with the requirements of the law and wants to obtain a patent, and provision is made here that he may within sixty days after the passage of this act comply with the law and get his patent. If one person is to obtain an extension of sixty days after the passage of this act, why should not everybody else have sixty days beyond the time to which the law is limited within which to pay the fees requisite to obtain a patent? This is a species of legislation which, unless there are some peculiar circumstances to justify it, ought not to be indulged in.

Mr. COWAN. I think the honorable Senator is utterly and entirely mistaken as to the character of this legislation. This is not special legislation but general legislation in every sense of the term; it is applicable to everybody. In the first place, on the 3d of March, 1863, an act was passed which required persons to whom patents had been ordered or decreed upon the payment of a final balance fee, to pay it within six months or the order would not be executed. When that became a law, of course a great many of these fees were in arrear and a great many people say they knew nothing about it, or had overlooked the passage of the law, and they let the six months go by. There are a great many of them. The Commissioner now desires, in order to secure the payment of that balance fee, and allow everybody, all on the same terms, to come in and pay it, that we extend the time six months longer. What objection can there be to that? None in the world that I have ever heard suggested. It is not made for the benefit of one man or for any particular number of men, but for all persons who overlooked the passage of the act of March 3, 1863, and did not pay the final balance fee. They are allowed six months longer to come in and pay it, and by that means a very considerable amount of revenue will be procured for the Patent Office. That is all there is of the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Pennsylvania who has the matter in charge what the law was before the passage of this act of March, 1863; whether they had more than six months before that time.

Mr. COWAN. There was no limit. They would very frequently have an order issued allowing them a patent and then let it lie for years. In that way a large number of them had accumulated. Then the Commissioner suggested the passage of the act of March 3, 1863, in order to compel them to come up and take out patents and pay the final balance fee. Large numbers of them did so, but there are still a very considerable number, perhaps a hundred or more, who neglected to do so. This bill is to provide a remedy for their cases. The patents have been decreed and ordered, but have not been taken up on account of this failure to pay the final balance fee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to the bill if that is the object of it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that the President had yesterday approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 31) making a grant of lands to the State of Minnesota to aid in the construction of the railroad from St. Paul to Lake Superior;

An act (S. No. 126) to amend "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington," passed May 15, 1820; and

An act (S. No. 160) granting lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads in the State of Wisconsin.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS.

Mr. DIXON. I now move to take up Senate bill No. 114.

Mr. COWAN. There are one or two other little bills in my charge that will not take a moment, and I should like to dispose of them.

Mr. DIXON. I trust the Senator will not insist upon it. The bill I propose to take up is of very great importance, and if passed at all it should be passed immediately, because it is proposed to affect the election in this city, which takes place on the first Monday of June.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 114) to amend section five of an act entitled "An act to continue, alter, and amend the charter of the city of Washington," approved May 17, 1848, and further to preserve the purity of elections and guard against the abuse of the elective franchise, by a registration of electors for the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

Mr. DIXON. I propose an amendment to come in as a new section after section twenty-one of the bill:

And be it further enacted, That if the board of registration, or any one or more of them, shall refuse or neglect from any cause to perform the duties herein required of them, or be incapable of performing the same at the time herein specified, the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or either of the judges thereof, upon being informed of the fact by any citizen of the said city of Washington, and satisfactory proof thereof being made, shall forthwith appoint proper persons to supply the places of those so refusing to act, or incapable of acting, on said board, and the persons so appointed shall immediately thereafter proceed to do all the acts and things required of said board, and the acts and things so done by them, completed at any period prior to the day of election, shall be in all respects valid and operative as if done and performed by said board of registration.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COWAN. I move to amend the bill in the third line of the first section by inserting the word "white" before the word "male," so as to confine the right of voting in Washington to white male citizens.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope not.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, the bill as it now stands would confer upon male citizens, whether white or black, the right to vote in this District. It is proposed in the amendment I have just offered to limit the suffrage to the whites, as it has been heretofore, and I will state very briefly my reasons for opposing the change contemplated.

In the first place, I think this a most inopportune time to make any change, especially as it seems to be opposed by the people of the District almost universally. But apart from their wishes, I think the innovation will be found of no benefit to any and may be disastrous to the whole. Our form of government, extending the right of suffrage to all free white males above the age of twenty-one years, has always been considered but an experiment with the danger of failure supposed to lie in that provision. If we could continue to sustain ourselves with political power equally distributed among the people upon so wide a basis as that, the wisest men everywhere would be satisfied; but they have feared for it a long while. Still no positive trouble happened until the present rebellion, which presents the ordeal we have to pass in order to test our ability to make good our present position.

If we can succeed in restoring the Union and the supremacy of the Federal Government, the elective franchise will most likely remain as it is; if we fail, no one can doubt but that in the anarchy and confusion sure to follow, the power in the State will come to be lodged in fewer hands, and our boasted universal suffrage will be lost.

I know it is not generally thought that this question is involved in the struggle now going on between the North and the South, and yet such is the fact, because it is well known the leaders of the confederacy wished for a separation, knowing as they did that the popular institutions of the North would soon be too strong to brook any resistance, and that all must be subject to the overwhelming power of the people. It is also now pretty clearly shown that they further intended, in case they secured their independence, to restrain the right of suffrage enough to stifle the voice of the masses of their own people. Now, to put them down is to prove the principle now prevailing is sound and effectual to save the nation; to fail, however, is equally to prove it unsound, and in the latter case it most likely would be abandoned to a great extent. This is the problem now in process of solution.

The great battle now perhaps at this moment taking place on the banks of the Rapidan, may settle this question either for or against us. Is it then, in an hour fraught with such momentous results that we ought to engage ourselves in making a fundamental alteration like this in the structure of any part of our social fabric? Would it not be wiser to await the issue of the conflict which now reaches a crisis, in order that we may see whether or not we can sustain the present frame of things, rather than adventure ourselves upon an uncalled-for innovation, and one which even its advocates cannot argue would be more than tolerable?

It may be said that at present large numbers of white men vote who are no better qualified than negroes. I admit it is so, but if the surplus intelligence and virtue of the whole has been sufficient to neutralize the effect of the vicious element heretofore, are we sure that it will suffice if we impose upon it the burden of a new element equally dangerous? If we can indulge thousands of white men for the sake of a uniform rule in a privilege which they abuse, surely that is no argument why we should indulge a like number of negroes in the same.

Sir, I know there are persons who think that all people have an inherent, natural, and indefeasible right to the elective franchise, but no greater mistake ever was committed. The proposition is not true in theory, and not possible in practice. The right to choose a ruler is precisely like the right to rule. Nobody has a right to do either the one or the other unless the community, State, or nation to be ruled chooses to confer it upon him. But no people ever conferred this power to choose upon everybody. On the other hand it has always been given to certain individuals exactly designated and chosen, to the exclusion of all others. In the United States all the females and all the males under twenty-one years of age are denied the right. Next, all aliens not naturalized, all Indians, and nearly all the negroes, leaving the males over twenty-one not more than one in five to exercise it. So that it is seen even here, where the right of suffrage is more nearly universal than anywhere else, it is confined to a comparatively small class of the citizens, and it turns out to be a delegated instead of a natural right, and is purely conventional.

It is proposed in this bill to alter this convention by a new one which would confer this upon male negroes over the age of twenty-one years. Now, it must be evident that this is a mere freak of habit, and that it has no support in reason, because if the franchise was not wide enough already why not open it to white women? Nobody can pretend but they would be safer than semi-barbarous and uneducated negroes, many of whom have just emerged from slavery. And yet no reformer here has ventured to propose anything of the kind, nor has anybody proposed to make minors, between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one, the repositories of this power; and yet who would not rather trust them than negroes in the use of it?

It may be said, however, that the negro performs military service, and that because he fights the battles of the country he ought to share in the choice of its rulers; but this is utterly fallacious, and it might as well be said that every voter was qualified to be a soldier, as that every soldier would make a good voter, when everybody knows that there are very many respectable voters who would not do credit to the country on the field of battle, and that there are many good soldiers who would be worse than useless at elections. The truth is there is no necessary connection between the two kinds of qualifications necessary to the elector and soldier. They may exist together in the same person, but it happens in too many cases that they do not to make it worth anything as a rule. Hence, our young men are required to be soldiers long before they are allowed to be electors, and I think no State in the Union has ever proposed or enacted that all her soldiers in camp should vote, but only those who would have been so entitled had they remained at home, showing clearly thereby that it was not done on the ground that they were soldiers, but that they were already electors.

One word more. I think the soldier on the battle-field is of all others the person most interested that this privilege should remain just as it was when he went forth with his life in his hand to defend it. It will be remembered that it is a fundamental institution of his country—the one upon which its whole governmental structure is based, and the one which it is incumbent upon us to protect most sacredly. To enlarge it is not only to confer rights but also to give away privileges; and he might well complain if in his absence on his perilous mission we introduced such an organic change as this bill contemplates, and bestowed his darling prerogative on negroes. How would we answer his inquiry as to what special quality we found in the African race that would warrant us in making such a gift? Could we satisfy him of their intelligence, of their independence, of their virtue? Could we convince him that these negroes were competent judges of the "truest and capable" men in the community who were proper to be its rulers, when he himself had been so often at fault in trying it?

I think, sir, the true friend of the soldier, white or black, is he who watches over and preserves the institutions of his country while he is gone, and that it will be time enough when he comes back victorious to make such alterations as may be thought safe in a matter so vital as this one is.

I think, too, that no friend of the negro ought to desire for him the right of suffrage in this country. Of what advantage will it be to him to be thrown into the arena of politics? How will he acquit himself in the strife, in competition with his powerful, cunning, and unscrupulous neighbors? Will he achieve anything for himself, or will he be the dupe of the demagogue and the tool of a faction?

These, sir, are questions which experience will conclusively answer. The gift, if effectual at all, will be found fatal to him who receives it, as well as to the giver. This brings me to another and final objection, which is, that political power ought never to be conferred upon any class of a community when that class was separated from the great bulk of the people by marked difference of race, color, capacity, and condition; because if this class be superior in all these respects, it will constantly usurp and finally become tyrannical and despotic. If on the other hand it is inferior, its privilege provokes antagonism which it is powerless to resist, obliging it in self-defense to manifest itself in a way fatal to its own constitution. It must vote as a class, sell itself out to one or the other of the parties of the dominant race, and purchase favor at the expense of its independence. The strife engendered between parties on account of class voting has been always considered dangerous; and we all remember that but a few years ago a powerful party was formed in this country which charged this offense upon foreigners, and especially those of them who belonged to a particular religious faith, so it was well-nigh adding to the every-day political dissensions the bitterness of religious animosity. I think, therefore, that no man can doubt that if negroes were allowed to vote at all that they would all vote together on the same side.

Mr. SUMNER. I would remind the Senator that in Boston, where we have a practical experience on this subject, the colored voters have divided at the polls.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I think the remark made by the Senator from Massachusetts furnishes the key to all the errors which he and those who think with him fall into on this subject. It is supposed that because in a community like that of Boston, where there are very few negroes, and where it is strong enough and healthy enough not to feel any mischief to result from their voting, that therefore the experiment is conclusive, and that it would be safe to allow them the same privileges in other places where they form a considerable part of the population, and where they would be felt.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator misunderstood me. The point I made was that the colored people in Boston actually divided at the polls. I understood the Senator to assert that colored people, wherever they were, would act together as a unit.

Mr. COWAN. I understood the Senator. Why is it that they divide in Boston? It is because, as I said before, their weight is not appreciable; they could not achieve anything there by any combination they could make; and I suppose, besides, there is no antagonism between them and the people of Boston on account of the paucity of their numbers.

But if their number had been considerable enough to hold the balance of power between two angry factions of white voters, I think they would not have been allowed to enjoy the privilege long. In Pennsylvania, when there was hardly more than one or two in each election district they were suffered to vote even illegally for a long time, but when their numbers began to swell with the accession of fugitives from the border States and with those whom their masters had emancipated to come there, their right was challenged and cut off immediately. A State convention to amend the constitution afterwards expressly confined the franchise to the whites, and public sentiment has been unanimous enough to withdraw the subject from any agitation ever since.

There is a further reason why I suppose there is no difficulty experienced in Massachusetts in regard to negro voting; that is that there all electors must be able to read, which would still further limit the mischief. In this bill, however, there is no such limitation, and it would allow a numerous class here to vote which even the few in Massachusetts would not be allowed to do if in their condition.

Mr. President, I hope the amendment will prevail, and that whatever we may do at another time we will not now introduce an untried and doubtful alteration in the laws of this District. Let us bide our time, and if the foremost races can succeed with a general distribution of political power among these masses, we will then be able, perhaps, more judiciously to admit the inferior to a participation of that privilege which, if bestowed now, would benefit no one and might injure us all.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up one or two Indian bills which must be called up for action. The bill now before the Senate is likely to lead to interminable debate; and with the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Finance I propose to take up some Indian bills this morning. He has no objection to disposing of them this morning. It is very necessary to take them up. I move first to take up bill No. 226.

Mr. DIXON. I hope that will not be done. I have already stated that it is important that this bill should be acted upon now, if at all, as it is expected to go into operation before the coming election. If the Senator insists on his motion, I must ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There is no such necessity for acting on this bill now as there is for acting on the Indian bills to which I have referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to postpone.

Mr. DIXON. I ask for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILLEY. I trust that this measure will be postponed. This amendment will evidently lead to considerable debate. If no other Senator shall do so, I propose to submit some remarks on it myself. I did not understand that the bill was coming up this morning, and I hope it will be postponed.

The yeas and nays being taken on Mr. DOOLITTLE's motion, resulted—yeas 14, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Carlile, Davis, Doolittle, Foot, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Riddle, Sherman, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Willey—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Foster, Grimes, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Wilkinson, and Wilson—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Fessenden, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Hendricks, Hicks, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Saulsbury, Wade, and Wright.

So the motion to postpone was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SUMNER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I should like to have the amendment reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again read.

The amendment was again read; in section one, line three, before the word "male" to insert the word "white," so as to read, "that every white male citizen of the United States," &c.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, if Senators will take the trouble to examine this bill and compare it with the law as it already exists, they will find that the principal effect and the evident intent of this bill is simply to extend the right of suffrage to persons of color. That is evidently the intent and the design of the bill. Apart from that effect, it will have very little effect and will confer very few privileges, and make very few revelations which are not already incorporated in the law of this District. At first, it may seem that this is a matter of very little importance; but in the moral influence of the principle which will be established if this bill passes with this amendment, I fear that the country will realize not only disastrous results in the District of Columbia, but that its influence will be felt throughout the length and breadth of this land. And, sir, while it seems to me it ought to be and I trust is the desire of every true friend of his country to allay excitement, I regret to say it, and I say it with all possible respect to Senators, that it appears to be our policy day after day to invoke the very storm-king to let loose upon us the tempest of disaffection and of disaster to this land.

Mr. President, what is to be accomplished by the introduction of this new policy into the history and into the legislation of this country? What is there that demands it at this particular crisis; and why should an effort of this kind be made at this hour, when the destinies not only of the negro race, but of the entire white race of this country are hanging in almost equal balances; and why should we introduce into the Senate a matter of legislation calculated to produce additional excitement in this tremendous hour of our country's fate, unless there be some essential principle involved of human rights or of fundamental policy in the Government?

Now, sir, let us look at this matter a moment in the light of sound, practical common sense. I imagine it will not be argued by any Senator here that we have not the political right to exclude persons of color from exercising the right of suffrage in this District or anywhere else where Congress has the authority to legislate on the subject. The right of suffrage, as I understand it, is not a natural right, or, to speak more correctly, it is not an original right. It does not necessarily belong to every member of the community alike. Every political community properly organized has the right to say who shall be or compose a portion of the political power or authority of the State. This right is not universal anywhere upon the face of the earth; it is not universal anywhere in the United States. However far it may have been extended in some of the States, there is no State in the Union which has not imposed limitations on this power and upon the exercise of this right of suffrage. Women have not the right of suffrage in any State. Minors have not the right of suffrage. Paupers are excluded from the exercise of the right of suffrage; and there are limitations more or less imposed upon the exercise of it everywhere and under all circumstances. I deem it unnecessary to detain the Senate by attempting to argue the question that it is not a natural and original right to which every person is alike entitled. There must be a rule, then, by which this matter is to be regulated, by which the exercise of it is to be governed; and in fixing this rule there are two fundamental considerations to be observed. One of them is, has the party that applies for this right, or to whom it is proposed to extend this right, an identity of interest with the political community into which he seeks to be introduced? Identification in interest and in feelings and in destiny is one of the fundamental rules that should be observed in regulating this great principle of republican institutions.

Another rule, and it is the most important rule, and one which ought never to be neglected, but always to be observed, and which in every well-regulated community is more or less observed, is this: intelligence, capacity to understand how to exercise this great duty; and inasmuch as this is one of the fundamental principles of republican government, inasmuch as there can be no secure republican institutions unless this foundation of free institutions is securely laid, it is by no means a matter of trivial importance, and it ought to be well considered before we vote upon a question of this character.

I believe it is a constitutional provision in the fundamental law of the State which the Senator from Connecticut represents that no person, either white or black, (he will correct me if I am wrong,) is entitled to exercise the right of suffrage unless he can read and write. Political communities in fixing the standard of suffrage, the rules which shall regulate the right of suffrage, have generally settled down on twenty-one years of age as the proper standard and the proper principle by which it is to be regulated. All history shows that that has carried this rule full far enough. Upon the whole, I suppose it is about the best rule which can be adopted. We must have some general rule on the subject that will operate against the interest and against the rights, perhaps, of some individuals in the community; but being under the necessity of fixing some general law and regulation in regard to the subject, twenty-one years of age for a man born in the community is perhaps the wisest rule that could be fixed, and all our experience and all history show that this rule everywhere has been extended as far as expediency, to say nothing of right, would justify its being extended.

Now, sir, to show that we have a right to limit the exercise of this privilege, I may refer to the Constitution of the United States, which made it the duty of Congress to pass uniform naturalization laws.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must interrupt the Senator: the time has arrived for the consideration of the special order, and the Chair brings to the notice of the Senate the bill to establish a national currency.

Mr. DIXON. I move to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of going on with the consideration of this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. On that question I shall have to call for the yeas and nays if the motion is pressed. We must proceed with some regularity with business, and I trust we shall go on with the special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved by the Senator from Connecticut to postpone the consideration of the special order that the bill now before the Senate may be proceeded with.

The motion to postpone was not agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. SHERMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Hale, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Sumner, Van Winkle, and Wilkinson—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Sherman, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Willey, and Wilson—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Harding, Harlan, Hendricks, Hicks, Howard, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Richardson, Saulsbury, Wade, and Wright.

So the motion was not agreed to.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 395) to provide a national currency, secured by the pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, the pending question being on the following amendment submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] as a substitute for the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole to the forty-first section of the bill:

And in lieu of all other taxes on the capital, circulation, deposits, shares, and other property, every association shall pay to the Treasurer of the United States, in the months of January and July, a duty of one per cent. each half year from and after the 1st day of January, 1864, upon the average amount of its notes in circulation, and a duty of one half of one per cent. each half year upon the average amount of its deposits, and a duty of one half of one per cent. each half year, as aforesaid, on the average amount of its capital stock beyond the amount invested in United States bonds; and in case of default in the payment thereof by any association, the duties aforesaid may be collected in the manner provided for the collection of United States duties of other corporations, or the Treasurer may reserve the amount of such duties out of the interest as it may become due on the bonds deposited with him by such defaulting association. And each association shall, within ten days from the 1st days of January and July of each year, make a return, under the oath of its president or cashier, to the Treasurer of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe, of the average amount of its notes in circulation, and of the average amount of its deposits, and of the average amount of its capital stock beyond the amount invested in United States bonds, for the six months next preceding the 1st days of January and July, as aforesaid; and in default of such return, and for each default thereof, each defaulting association shall forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of $200, to be collected either out of the interest as it may become due to such association on the bonds deposited with the Treasurer, or, at his option, in the manner in which penalties are to be collected of other corporations under the laws of the United States; and in case of such default the amount of the duties to be paid by such association shall be assessed upon the amount of notes delivered to such association by the Comptroller of the Currency, and upon the highest amount of its deposits and capital stock, to be ascertained in such other manner as the Treasurer may deem best: Provided, That nothing in this act shall exempt the real estate of associations from either State, county, or municipal taxes to the same extent, according to its value, as other real estate is taxed: Provided also, That all taxes imposed by this or any future act on banking associations organized under national legislation shall be applied exclusively to the payment of the interest and principal of the national debt of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to continue the debate; but a letter was referred to yesterday by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Maine, and I request that the letter be read, and I ask the attention of the Senate to it.

It is from the Secretary of the Treasury on the point now before us. I send it to the Chair.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 2, 1864.

SIR: Nothing but my deep sense of the importance of sustaining by every possible means the public credit, upon which the sole dependence of the Government for means to suppress the insurrection must rest, would induce me to address you this letter upon a subject which has already received so much consideration.

The bill in relation to the national banking system now under debate is in the nature of an amendment to the act of last session. Though a complete bill in itself, it contains few provisions not substantially embraced in that act, among which that in relation to the measure and distribution of taxation may be regarded as perhaps the most important.

Under ordinary circumstances there might be no insuperable objection to leaving the property organized under the national banking law subject, as are almost all descriptions of property, to general taxation, State, national, and municipal. But in the present condition of the country, I respectfully submit that this particular description of property should be placed in the same category with imported goods before entry into general consumption, and be subjected to exclusive national taxation.

At the present moment, the duties on imports form the sole reliance of the Government for means to pay the interest on the public debt. If to these means the taxes to be paid by the national banks shall be added, a most important addition will be made to those resources. The mere fact that these taxes are made payable to the national Government, and so available for the payment of interest on the public debt and for the reduction of its principal, will greatly strengthen the public credit and facilitate the negotiations of the necessary loans at moderate rates of interest. I have no doubt that such a disposition of these taxes would be worth more to the Government during the present struggle in practical results than three times the actual value of the taxes themselves.

I do not at all suggest that this description of property should not be taxed as heavily as any other description. On the contrary, I think it only just that it should bear its full proportion of the public burdens. I am only anxious that the taxation upon it shall be made to contribute as largely as possible to the general welfare; and it is the conviction, deeply impressed on my mind, that it will contribute more when aggregated in one mass and made to tell upon the general public credit than when distributed between the nation and the States and numerous municipal corporations, that prompts me to address these views to you.

Under any plan of partition that may be adopted, the amounts of taxation distributable to the several States and municipalities will be comparatively small and unimportant, and it is quite possible that the total taxation of banking property for all purposes will be less than it will be if taxed exclusively for national purposes. The advantages of partition to States and municipalities will therefore be small, and the banks may not lose by it. The nation alone will be injured.

It will not be understood of course that the foregoing suggestions are intended to apply to real estate held by any banking association. That description of property must necessarily be held by titles under State laws, and should properly be subjected exclusively to State taxation, except in the event of a direct tax by Congress. The case is otherwise with the personal property and credits of the banking associations. These receive their organization from national law and for great national purposes, and may therefore with great propriety, and as I have endeavored to show, at the present time with great public advantage, be subjected to exclusive national taxation.

Very respectfully, yours, S. P. CHASE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. WILLIAM PITT FESSENDEN, Chairman of Committee on Finance, Senate Chamber.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to continue the discussion on this question, because I am very desirous to press a vote on the bill at as early a day as possible; I will merely make this remark, that the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts shows that the friends of exclusive national taxation do not wish to relieve these banks from their fair share of taxes. The tax imposed by the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is greater in amount than the amount proposed by the Committee on Finance. The tax that will be yielded under this pending proposition is considerably larger than the entire tax that will be yielded under the amendment of the Committee on Finance, including all State, municipal, and corporation taxes. The rate proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts is two per cent. on circulation, one per cent. on deposits, two per cent. on capital in excess of circulation, which is equivalent to not less than three per cent. on circulation. This is a very large tax—greater, far greater, in my judgment, than the tax imposed by the Committee on Finance. The tax proposed by the Committee on Finance is one per cent. on circulation and one half of one per cent. on deposits, and then it reserves the stock of the shareholders for State and municipal purposes. My statement is correct that the amount proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts is greater in the aggregate than that proposed by the Committee on Finance. The only question in my mind is whether it is not better to levy all the taxation that may be imposed on these banks by the national Government exclusively; and therefore I come back to the argument I submitted before, that to secure uniformity of taxation, uniformity of burdens, and certainty, so as to secure the amount of the tax beyond a doubt, I think it better to leave all the taxation to national authority. For this reason I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts; but if that shall fail, I trust that the friends of the bill may take the amendment of the Committee on Finance and let us proceed to close the consideration of the bill at as early an hour as possible, and I hope it will be during the day. If the Senate will bear with me and adhere to the subject, I shall press a vote, hoping to close the matter to-day.

Mr. SUMNER. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment offered by me.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POWELL. Is it in order now to amend the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is an amendment to an amendment, and a further amendment is not in order.

Mr. POWELL. If it shall be adopted, can it then be amended?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certain amendments will be in order, but not any changing the character of the amendment that has been agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I presume that an amendment by way of addition would be in order after this has been adopted? ["Certainly."]

Mr. POWELL. I desired to move an amendment to the amendment before the vote was taken, but as it is not in order, of course I cannot do so.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 11, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Conness, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Wilkinson, and Wilson—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, and Van Winkle—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Saulsbury, Wade, Willey, and Wright.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, as it was amended yesterday on the motion of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER.]

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish now to amend the amendment of the committee in one small particular. I wish in the beginning of the amendment to strike out the words "in lieu of all other taxes."

Mr. SUMNER. If I understand the operation of that amendment, it is to save to the States the right of taxation. I hope the words will not be struck out.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is only to save our own taxes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then say "in lieu of all existing taxes." In the act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, approved March 3, 1863, not the currency act but an act subsequently passed, there is a tax on national banks, and this is to supersede that. The Senate will remember that in the bank bill of last session there was a tax of two per cent. on circulation, but that was modified by a subsequent act at the same session, and therefore the tax here proposed ought to be "in lieu of the existing taxes" provided in those acts.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have no objection to that change of the phraseology. What I want is that we shall not tie up our hands. I modify my amendment so as to propose simply to strike out the word "other" and insert "existing;" so as to make the clause read "in lieu of all existing taxes."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as amended.

Mr. HOWARD called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 29, nays 8; as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, and Sumner—8.
ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Harding, Harlan, Hendricks, Hicks, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Saulsbury, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright.

So the amendment as amended was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was in section forty-four, after the word "than," in line thirty-four, to strike out "$100,000, nor less than $200,000 if in a city of more than fifty thousand inhabitants," and to insert "the amount prescribed for banking associations under this act."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section forty-six, to insert after the word "currency," in line eighteen, the words "retaining a copy thereof;" in line nineteen to strike out "and" after the word "default;" and in line twenty before the word "notice" to strike out "his," and after "notice" to insert "by him."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section forty-seven, line twenty-four, to strike out the word "equal" before "amount."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section fifty-three, line eight, after "United States" to insert "in a suit brought for that purpose by the Comptroller of the Currency in his own name."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section fifty-nine, line twenty-two, to strike out the words "to be" before the word "fined."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section sixty-one, to strike out the words "to suggest" in line seventeen, and the words "to report" in line twenty-one.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in section sixty-four, after the word "Congress," in line two, to strike out the words "reserves the right" and to insert "may," and after the word "time" to strike out "to."

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been gone through with; but one amendment made by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole remains to be acted upon. It is the amendment in relation to the rate of interest in the thirtieth section.

Mr. HALE. As that will perhaps take some time, and as I desire to propose a short amendment that I think will consume no time, I should like to have consent to offer it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive it.

Mr. HALE. In the ninth section, after the word "loan," in line twenty, I move to strike out the words "obtained from," and after the word "debt," in the next line, to strike out the words "owing to the association of which he is a director." The section now reads that a man shall not be a director who does not own certain shares as required, standing in his own name on the books of the association, "and that the same is not hypothecated or in any way pledged as security for any loan obtained from or debt owing to the association of which he is a director." There is nothing in the bill as it stands to prevent a director from hypothecating and pledging all the stock that he owns to any other association except the one of which he is a director. By striking out the words which I have moved to strike out it will read in this way: "and that the same is not hypothecated or in any way pledged as security for any loan or debt," it makes no odds to whom.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move in section thirty-one, after "San Francisco," in line twenty-eight, to insert this clause:

And one half of said twenty-five per cent. in banks organized under this act in the cities of St. Louis, Louisville, Chicago, Detroit, Milwaukee, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Pittsburg, and Portland may consist of balances due to the association available for the redemption of its circulating notes, from an association in the cities of New York, Boston, or Philadelphia.

I will state that the whole business of the Northwest is done in exchange, and balances are required in these cities to draw on. The amendment which I propose is very important to the western banks.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think western banks ought to keep themselves strong.

Mr. CHANDLER. But their strength lies in their exchange. I do not know that one dollar is redeemed at their counters in anything else than exchange on the eastern cities. This is a very important measure for the Northwest, and I have consulted the bankers in regard to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a great privilege to the banks in these cities, and I will state why. If they are allowed to keep their balances in New York instead of at home, they will always have large balances in New York in order to get interest on their deposits in New York, while if they are required to keep their funds at home they will keep them at home in their vaults or loan them out to people there. The cities named in this section are centers of redemption. The law expects the banks there to be very strong, and requires them to keep one fourth of their deposits and one fourth of their circulation on hand. Under these circumstances it seems to me they ought to be required to keep the money at home; otherwise they will send it to New York where they will receive interest on it, and I do not think they will strengthen themselves by keeping their money in New York. They ought to be required to keep this one fourth on hand. It is no hardship to a bank in a large city to keep that amount on hand. They get interest on three fourths at home by loaning out money to the people or sending it to New York if they choose. A bank at a center of redemption, where they are liable to be called upon to redeem not only their own issues but the issues of all these local banks, it seems to me ought to be required to keep one fourth of the whole amount of their indebtedness on hand.

Mr. CHANDLER. The argument would be very good if all their redemptions were not in exchange. All the brokers, all the merchants, all that do business with them, require exchange on these eastern cities instead of any other redemption. Suppose a bank in Detroit has half a million of capital and a million of deposits; it must keep in coin after the resumption of specie payments, and now in greenbacks, $375,000 on hand all the time, that it does not want and cannot use. It has to be just as strong in Boston, New York, or Philadelphia as though it has not this fund on hand. It is the usual way to make redemptions in exchange. Every broker, every merchant, every man throughout the Northwest takes his redemption in exchange on the East. Every Senator from the Northwest understands that perfectly.

Mr. POMEROY. The objection in my mind is that if we allow these various places of redemption, we make this nothing but a local currency; it destroys its nationality. If the redemption of these bills is required to be in New York, then they will have a uniform value everywhere, and we shall not have to pay the heavy discount which we are now obliged to pay on exchange. I want all these cities, every one of them, except the city of New York, erased from the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. My amendment is not compulsory; it simply permits the banks to keep this money where all the banks of Chicago and Detroit want to keep it. The bankers there have urged very strongly that such a provision as this should be made. One half was first proposed, but on consultation with Mr. HOOPER, of the House of Representatives, it was finally made one fourth. All other banks are allowed to keep three fifths of the fifteen per cent. on deposits in any of the depositories, and we propose now to say that these redemption banks may keep one half of the twenty-five per cent. on deposit in these three eastern cities if they choose. I think it very important indeed to the Northwest.

Mr. COLLAMER. I had supposed from misapprehension that this was to substitute these three places of redemption for those mentioned in the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. No, sir. It permits those mentioned to keep one half of their twenty-five per cent. reserve there.

Mr. COLLAMER. I think it would be a very great improvement of this bill, if the claims and pretensions on which it goes are well founded, that it is to secure a uniform currency, if they would make the bills not only redeemable in these three cities, but strike out all these other places, for the effect of it as it now stands is nothing but to make the places named the centers of a little larger circle of local circulation; and I move to amend the gentleman's amendment by striking out all of the cities mentioned in the section except New York, Philadelphia, and Boston.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope that will not be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Vermont that his amendment is rather an amendment to the bill than to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, proposing as it does to strike words out of the bill, and not out of the amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am not tenacious of the form of it. I shall vote against the gentleman's amendment, with a view to making the one which I suggest; and I do not know but that I can move that after I voted for his just as well.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not know that I understand the proposition of the Senator from Michigan. I should like to inquire whether his object is to allow all of the banks except the banks located in the three cities named to keep one half of the twenty-five per cent. in those three cities, to wit, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston; whether he intends to leave to them the privilege of keeping that one half as a reserve there, instead of keeping it at the point of redemption. He will remember that at St. Louis, Louisville, Chicago, Detroit, and the other points named in the bill, the banks there located will have to redeem at home. Then do I understand him that they can keep half of the reserve required, at either of the three cities of New York, Philadelphia, or Boston, as a substitute for the amount to be kept at home?

Mr. CHANDLER. Precisely. Nine cities are named which are to come within the provision.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am perfectly willing to put that in; but New Orleans is a great center of her own.

Mr. HENDERSON. I shall vote against this proposition because I am in favor of the proposition of having a clearing-house for all these banks somewhere; I want it at some point. I will vote to put it first at New York. I want but one clearing-house. If I cannot get it at New York, I will vote to put it at Philadelphia or Boston. I want but the one, and the idea of our getting anything like a uniform currency out of this bill in any other way is perfectly absurd to my mind, and therefore I shall vote against this amendment, hoping that when it does come in order a proposition may be made striking out all of these points except the city of New York. I believe that exchange in all western cities is always in favor of the city of New York; it rarely ever occurs that it is otherwise; and a currency redeemable in the city of New York would be good almost anywhere; it certainly would be at any point east of the Rocky mountains. I do not know how it would be upon the Pacific coast. Certainly we shall approach nearer to uniformity by having one point of redemption, and therefore I am not in favor of any proposition whatever that will tend to make the system worse even than it is in the bill; I will not vote to establish a system which looks to having different points of redemption. The Senator's amendment is proper perhaps in its place, based on the idea of a multiplicity of points of redemption; and I would not object to it if I could go upon that idea, but desiring to have another motion made, and desiring that there shall be one point, of course I wish that all amendments of this character looking to a continuance of this system shall be voted down.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator, I suppose, is aware that all the banking business of the Northwest is done upon bills of exchange. The wool clip of Michigan, the wheat crop of Michigan, the hog crop of Iowa, are all purchased with drafts drawn chiefly upon these three cities. The wool clip is chiefly bought by drafts upon Boston. I put in the three cities because it is convenient to the customer, to the broker, to the merchant, to be enabled to purchase a draft upon either one of these three places.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator means thereby that the funds of the banks in these several cities, and deposited in the city of New York, will be just as good as in their own vaults?

Mr. CHANDLER. Better.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is just my idea, and therefore I want to make a clearing-house in New York for all of them, and thereby we shall have an infinitely better currency than otherwise.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am not tenacious about retaining the three names, but I should prefer the three, and it will certainly be a very great convenience to the northwestern States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SHERMAN. On that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to say a word before the question is put. The only object in making these various centers of redemption is to approximate, as near as we can now, to a uniform redemption in one place in the United States of all bank bills. Under the present law a national bank is only bound to redeem at its counter. Under this law you require of these banks to redeem at certain centers of redemption. That is a great step forward. Finally, perhaps within a very short time, I would require them to redeem all their notes somewhere; whether in the city of New York or not is another question; but in some one place. I will tell the Senator from Michigan, however, that I would not confer upon the banks in these cities, the centers of redemption, the right to draw interest on the money which they are bound at any time to pay out to redeem the notes of the country banks. If this privilege is granted to the banks of these various cities to deposit their money in the city of New York we had better at once abandon this part of the bill and go in for universal redemption at one place, and that I think will be so burdensome to the national banks that they cannot carry on their business now when there are sixteen hundred local banks scattered throughout the United States that only redeem at their counters. If you require these national banks to redeem at par in the city of New York, when there are sixteen hundred State banks that are not bound to redeem anywhere except at their own counters, you make a discrimination against the national banks that in my judgment will put an end to the system. The very moment, however, that the State banks go out of existence or are absorbed into the national system, as I verily believe they will be in a year or so if we do not injure this bill by amendments, I shall then be in favor of a uniform place of redemption. But at present we can only approach it gradually, and I trust the Senator from Michigan, who is really a friend of this bill, will not now cumber it with a provision that will embarrass it and embarrass the friends of the bill. We had better adhere to these places of redemption as they are fixed in the bill. We have selected only several large cities. Let us commence and make a step forward by requiring all the local banks to redeem at these centers of redemption. Then next year, when we shall have dispensed with the State bank currency, let us go a step forward and require all these national banks to redeem in the city of New York or wherever else may be designated.

But why are certain particular points always put forward? Why is Boston selected in this amendment? There is more business done in Cincinnati than in Boston; Cincinnati has a larger population, I think, than Boston; an immense aggregate of business is collected there. Why subordinate the large cities of the West, Cincinnati, Chicago, and St. Louis, to the cities of the eastern States? It may be necessary after a while to have one place of redemption, but in my judgment that place eventually will be the capital of the country, Washington, or wherever the political capital of the country is. The accumulation of large capitals and all the deposits of this country in the city of New York would be dangerous. During the riots only last July the whole banks of the city of New York were at the mercy of a mob. I would not combine in any large city, at present at least, all the circulation of the country. It would be dangerous to do so in the present condition of the country; and it would be very harsh on these national banks to require them to redeem at par in New York at this time when there are sixteen hundred rival banks running the tilt with them which shall live and which shall die. You have got to approach this question of a general point of redemption gradually, and you cannot do it more rapidly than we propose.

A year ago we passed a banking bill which required these banks to redeem at their counters. All the banks were rested upon the same basis, rested on the same security—the bonds of the United States. Now we make a step forward and require them to redeem at six or eight large cities of the Union. That is enough for the present until they are freed from the competition of the local banks. Then it will be soon enough to require them to redeem in one place—in the city of New York, if that be the proper place. I trust, therefore, the Senator will not press this amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. All the northwestern banks practically redeem to-day in these three large eastern cities.

Mr. SHERMAN. At one per cent. discount.

Mr. CHANDLER. No, sir; at from one eighth to one fourth of one per cent. I should be perfectly willing to adopt the Senator's idea of letting them all redeem at one fourth of one per cent. in the city of New York or any one of these eastern cities. I should be perfectly willing to accept that to-day, and strike the others out. But this seems to have been adopted as the best system for the present, and if it is to stand as it now is, I have no doubt that a year hence, or two years hence perhaps, we shall be ready to permit all these banks to redeem in New York at one fourth or one eighth of one per cent. or whatever the cost of sending their bills there may be; but at present all the banks of the country redeem in these great cities. Why compel a bank in Detroit or in Chicago, which perhaps is not called upon, I was going to say, ten times a year for redemption in anything else except exchange on the East, to keep on hand this large amount of notes which is not wanted and cannot be used there? It looks to me like a hardship. I hope the Senate will adopt my amendment. I know all the bankers of the West have united in this request, and I trust it will be granted.

Mr. GRIMES. I have not had as much experience of banking as the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from Michigan; but what little experience I have had has taught me to believe that this would be a boon to the national banks that may be established in my State and in all that region of country. What they would desire over and above everything else is, to be permitted to redeem their bills in one of these eastern cities, because exchange always flows in their favor upon these eastern cities, against which they want to draw. If they can be permitted to redeem there, you will strengthen the banks and strengthen the system that you propose to establish. Besides, it will make the system popular with the people if you allow them to redeem in the eastern cities, say at one fifth of one per cent.; and that would be a bonus to the banks, because there never has been a time, in the history of my State at any rate, when any bank there could not more easily have redeemed its bills in the city of New York or the city of Boston than it could over its own counter; and for the sake of having the thing uniform and satisfactory to all parties, I should be willing to vote for allowing all these banks to charge one fifth of one per cent. and compel them to redeem in the cities of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia. The reason why I would insert Philadelphia and Boston in addition to New York is because there is not any very great material difference between the rates of exchange on those different points, and because then you give all these banks an opportunity to select in which of these particular localities they will keep their deposits.

What the Senator from Michigan has just said, that all the banks in the West now and for a number of years have practically made all their redemptions in these eastern cities, is I think true according to my own observation. They do not pay out gold and silver when their bills are presented to them, but they pay out bills on New York, or Boston, or Philadelphia. That is the way our business is transacted. If we can reduce the number of points of redemption to three, and allow the banks that have been or will be established under this act to charge one fifth of one per cent. for redeeming their bills in either of these eastern cities, I think we shall remove a great many obstacles in the way of the strength and popularity and efficiency of this act and of this banking system.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is another objection to this proposition besides that which I stated before, which I will mention now. The matter has been thoroughly considered. The express charge from the State of the Senator from Iowa, from the town of Des Moines, for instance, to New York, is very different from the express charge from Buffalo or New England. What equality or justice is there in establishing the same rate of exchange? You cannot do it. The rate of exchange from Cincinnati on New York is very different from the rate from Chicago on New York, and so of St. Louis and other points. You cannot make a fixed standard of exchange. You may destroy this system and prevent banks being organized west of the city of Buffalo, by putting it at one fifth of one per cent., because at that rate they cannot pay the express charge. It seems to me that now we ought to establish this system of several centers of redemption which will finally assimilate itself and lead to having one common center of redemption, after a while, at regulated rates of exchange, that will be varied according to the geographical position of the banks. From Iowa it will be a little more, and from Ohio a little less. One fourth of one per cent. may be sufficient in Ohio, while it might require one half of one per cent. in Iowa. We have not now the means of ascertaining the precise value and rate of exchange. It varies from year to year, and time to time, and place to place. You cannot by arbitrary legislation fix any specific rate of exchange.

Mr. GRIMES. I will not say that the argument of the Senator from Ohio would justify me in the conclusion that he was looking after the interests of the banks rather than the interests of the bill-holders, but some might draw that conclusion from what he has said. I said that the western banks can redeem more easily in the East than they can anywhere else; and why? Not because it would be easy for them to send their bank bills to New York to be converted, but because exchange is constantly making in their favor against New York, and all the expense of transporting that exchange will be the three cent postage stamps upon the letter that sends it. How is it with the men who hold the bills? There is a bank in my town, and its place of redemption is in Louisville, a place with which we have no intercourse whatever. Does the Senator expect of a private individual who holds $500 of the bills of that bank redeemable in Louisville that he will be at the expense of traveling all the way down there? If he does not he is to be at the expense of forwarding his notes by express. Who is injured by that? Is it the bank? Surely not. The bank would not be injured in either case, but the individual who holds the bills is injured to the extent that he has to pay the express charges.

Now, sir, we relieve all these people from any expense, relieve both the bank and private individuals from the expense of express charges, whenever we pass the proposition to make these banks redeem in either one of these three eastern cities. Just take the case that I have already partially put. A bank in my town, instead of redeeming over its own counter, redeems in Louisville. I have $1,000 of its bills and I want to get eastern exchange. I have got to go to a broker and get my notes changed in order to get a check on Louisville; and I have to pay the difference of exchange between the place where I live and Louisville; and there being no intercourse between the two places, I am charged a pretty round figure. Then when my exchange goes to Louisville I am there compelled to buy a bill on New York, and pay whatever the broker chooses to charge me between New York and Louisville. What kind of a roundabout system is that by which the business of the country is to be conducted?

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 14, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Collamer, Davis, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Howard, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sumner, Trumbull, and Wilkinson—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Doollittle, Fessenden, Hale, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Powell, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wilson—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cowan, Harding, Harlan, Hendricks, Hicks, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Richardson, Saulsbury, Wade, and Wright.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole which was passed over will now be taken up. The amendment is to strike out in section thirty, lines four and five, the words "a rate not exceeding seven per cent. per annum," and in lieu of them to insert:

The rate established by the laws of the State or Territory where the bank is located, and no more. And when no rate is fixed by the laws of the State or Territory, the bank may take, receive, reserve, or charge a rate not exceeding seven per cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after "no more" the words "except that where by the laws of any State a different rate is limited for banks of issue organized under State law, the rate so limited shall be allowed for associations organized in any such State under this act."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment as amended was concurred in.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move to strike out the names of all the cities except New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, and to permit all the banks to redeem in those cities at not exceeding one per cent.

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows:

In lines twenty-five, twenty-six, twenty-seven, and twenty-eight of section thirty-one, strike out "St. Louis, Louisville, Chicago, Detroit, Milwaukee, New Orleans, Cincinnati, Pittsburg, Baltimore, Portland (Maine), Albany, and San Francisco."

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "Philadelphia and Boston" wherever they occur.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope not. I think we had better have the three cities named.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want the Senate to fall under a misapprehension. If the Senator's amendment were to prevail it would not carry out his purpose; he would have to offer about forty other amendments to the bill. This section does not provide for the redemption in these cities. It simply provides that the local national banks may keep their deposits there. He will have to change the phraseology of the entire bill. The bill is framed on the idea of centers of redemption, several sections of it. I trust the bill may be allowed to stand and that we may allow these banks to redeem first at their counters, and also in addition to that at the centers of redemption provided. If the number of cities is too large strike them down, but I would leave certainly all cities of the first class. Then hereafter when the State banks shall have been absorbed into this system, as I trust they will be, it will be time enough to make one common center of redemption; but now, in establishing and organizing these national banks, if this amendment prevails we require them all to redeem in the city of New York, putting all the deposits of this country in that city, now the most dangerous and uncertain place in the United States, I think. It is asking too much to ask us to put the whole currency and wealth of this country in a single city where a mob might destroy it—the most uncertain—

A SENATOR. Disloyal.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not say disloyal, but the most uncertain place in this country. To put all the wealth of the country there at this time and require these banks to redeem there, when there are sixteen hundred banks of issue throughout the United States who redeem only at their own counters, it seems to me would destroy the system. It can only be done after we have substantially absorbed the State banks, and then it will be soon enough to require one universal center of redemption.

Mr. CHANDLER. What I propose has been done for half a century; it is done now, and will continue to be done. All the banks all over the country keep their balances and redeem in these three cities to-day, and they will do it in any event. They cannot do their business in any other way. As I said before, the great lack in the Northwest is circulation. If the eastern banks send out $100,000 they do not see it perhaps for months; it is used by our western banks. Bills are offered every day, short sight bills on these cities, for the purchase of produce, for the purchase of wool, for a thousand things. The balances naturally are in these cities; and exchange being the only kind of redemption that is desired, the eastern notes that reach the West are left there until they are wanted for return. It must continue to be so. No matter what laws you make you cannot prevent it. Why compel these banks to keep a large amount of funds that they do not want and that you know they do not want in their vaults? A bank in Chicago with a couple of millions of deposits and a couple of millions of stock is compelled not only to keep one third of its stock but one fourth of the whole of its deposits on hand; and consequently a bank in Chicago with $2,000,000 of circulation and $1,000,000 of stock would be compelled to keep $750,000 in its vaults all the time where it requires scarcely a single shilling. There is no redemption wanted except exchange on the eastern cities. I desire to perfect the bill by permitting all these banks to redeem where their redemption is required and where their business carries it, which is in these eastern cities. I hope the amendment will prevail. If it does not, I shall in another form offer the same proposition I did before, hoping the Senate will review its previous decision.

Mr. GRIMES. Doubtless it is very true, as the Senator from Ohio says, that this is a very important proposition, and it may necessitate a recommitment of the bill to the Committee on Finance in order to adjust it to the sentiment of the Senate on this subject; but we may as well decide the question now and in this way as at any time. I think the sentiment of the country, and I trust and hope the sentiment of the Senate, is in favor of compelling these banks to redeem at the points indicated by the Senator from Michigan; and if that be the sense of the Senate it will cost the Committee on Finance very little trouble to put the bill in such a shape as to correspond with the wish of the Senate.

Let me say, furthermore, that I know from my own personal knowledge, from my personal intercourse with the Comptroller of the Currency—I apprehend that may be the sense of the Secretary of the Treasury also, though I do not know that fact, but I know it is the sentiment of Mr. McCullough—that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan fully carries out his views. Why are we to accept the views of the Comptroller of the Currency on one subject, and utterly reject and ignore them on another, can perhaps be explained; but I do not know why it is. I think that the officer in charge of that bureau is one of the most intelligent and capable men that I know in charge of any bureau of the Government; and I am prepared on this subject, as I am on a great many others, to accept his opinion as strengthening my own convictions and my own experience for the last twenty years in the western country in regard to banks.

Mr. POMEROY. I think it would be better not to have any places named in the law than to have all these cities, and let the law be as it was last year, obliging them to redeem at their counters. There is nothing on the face of these bills that tells any bill-holder where the place of redemption is except at the counter of the bank. Take the case of a bank located in Iowa; the Comptroller may know where its notes are redeemed, and once a year the people may find out by its being published in his report that that Iowa bank redeems its bills at Chicago, but the bill-holder would not know it, the community would not know it during the year. There is no practical importance in having a bank in Iowa or Kansas redeem its bills in Chicago, because the bill on its face does not show, the community does not know it. The only practical, real importance is to have it redeemed somewhere on the Atlantic coast, because our trade and balances are there, and then it becomes a kind of national currency that will circulate everywhere. Otherwise than that there is no need of having it redeemed anywhere except at the counter, and if an amendment of that character cannot prevail, we had better take out all the names, and let the law remain as it was last year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CHANDLER and Mr. GRIMES called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Secretary called the roll, but before the result was announced—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not know but that I voted under a misapprehension. I understand that the amendment is to require the banks to redeem at par in the city of New York.

Mr. CHANDLER. No. I have another amendment to follow this, allowing them to charge one fourth of one per cent.

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Collamer, Doollittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Pomeroy, Sumner, and Ten Eyck—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Hale, Lane of Kansas, Powell, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wilson—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Cowan, Harding, Harlan, Hendricks, Hicks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, I move to amend section thirty-two by inserting after the word "par," in line five, the words "or an association in the city of New York, Philadelphia, or Boston, at which it will redeem its circulating notes at a discount of not exceeding one quarter of one per cent;" so as to make the section read:

That each association shall select, subject to the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, an association in either of the cities named in the preceding section at which it will redeem its circulating notes at par, or an association in the city of New York, Philadelphia, or Boston, at which it will redeem its circulating notes at a discount of not exceeding one quarter of one per cent.

Mr. JOHNSON. All the cities are stricken out, I think, except the three named in the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. They are.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then there is no necessity of repeating "an association in either of the cities named."

Mr. CHANDLER. The language can be altered, and I modify it in that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The language will be modified as proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I wish to inquire, for information, whether the effect of this will be to compel all those associations to redeem in the city of New York, Boston, or Philadelphia at one fourth of one per cent.

Mr. CHANDLER. They may do it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But there is nothing compulsory to make them redeem there.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is perfectly manifest—Senators must see it—that this bill must be recommitted; and I move that it be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce. It is now incongruous, and it is not possible to pass it in this shape. Some twenty or thirty amendments will have to be made in consequence of the change last made, and I think it ought to be recommitted at once; but I shall not press the motion unless Senators think it necessary.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for the vote on this amendment, and then I shall consent to the recommitment.

Mr. SHERMAN. The basis of the bill is changed, and, as a matter of course, it ought to be recommitted. I do not wish to have anything to do with it in its present incongruous shape. I will not make the motion to recommit at present, however.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I voted for the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, supposing that it compelled them to redeem in one of the three cities named.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will put in "shall" instead of "may."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Otherwise I would vote against it. The mere giving them the privilege to do it amounts to nothing. The object is to compel them to redeem.

Mr. CHANDLER. That would suit me better. Put in "shall" instead of "may."

Mr. POMEROY. "Each association shall select," is the language of the bill now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is that compulsory? It must be so arranged or I will not vote for it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the bill as it will stand if amended as it is proposed to be amended.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will modify it by striking out "will" and inserting "shall."

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER.) The amendment as modified will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment as modified, which was in section thirty-two, line five, after the word "par," to insert:

Or an association in either of the cities named in the preceding section at which it shall redeem its circulating notes at a discount not exceeding one quarter of one per cent.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to offer an amendment in section twenty-two, line three, after the word "exceed" to strike out "$300,000,000," and in lieu thereof insert "the amount authorized to be issued by the Comptroller to banks already created."

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the mover of the amendment what is the amount of circulation already issued?

Mr. HENDERSON. The amount, as I understand, issued to banks already organized is about thirty-two million dollars. I do not recollect the amount of bonds positively; I cannot tell that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator from Maryland will allow me, I believe I can answer his question precisely, for I have the evidence in my hand on that subject.

Mr. HENDERSON. What is the number of bonds filed?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have a letter from the Comptroller of the Currency stating that the amount of bonds actually deposited to secure circulation up to this date—that is, May 4, 1864—is $32,555,100; circulation to be issued therefor, $29,299,590; circulation actually issued to-day, $19,046,950; circulation yet to be issued, $10,252,640.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand it. The effect of the amendment if adopted is to stop the system where it is; that we can only have $32,000,000 of circulation under this bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir; that is what I mean by it.

Mr. JOHNSON. The effect of that will be to arrest this whole measure practically, provided it be true, as I suppose it is admitted, that if this national circulation is to exist it should be coextensive with the wants of the community.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I offered or rather gave notice that I should offer an amendment bearing on the same point involved in this amendment, with certain provisions which would allow the amount of national currency to be increased almost to $300,000,000, the limit fixed in this bill. This amendment of the Senator from Missouri, raising the issue, is good so far as it goes; but as it seems to me does not cover the whole issue. As this question is now up, and the principles involved in my proposed amendment are directly brought in issue, I will briefly call the attention of the Senate to its provisions. I regard it of the greatest importance. In my opinion it reaches and resolves the greatest financial issue of the hour—the currency question.

The first purpose of it is to stop the swelling of the volume of paper money by any means whatever, whether by means of State banks or by means of national banks or by the Government of the United States itself. The foundation of all of our financial difficulties, so far as currency and the price of gold are concerned, is the fact that we have already too much paper money.

When we issued Treasury notes and made them legal tender, as a matter of course they went into circulation as money. We did not restrain the State banks already in existence from going on and issuing, reissuing, and increasing their circulation as they pleased. The bill before the Senate, as it stands, authorizes the creation of banks with power to issue $300,000,000 more. What is the true state of the currency? When we issued our Treasury notes there were in circulation already about one hundred and sixty or one hundred and seventy million dollars of paper money issued by State banks, and about one hundred or one hundred and twenty-five million dollars in gold, making as the actual currency of the country circulating as money about $275,000,000; in round numbers say $300,000,000 of currency. In this condition of things the Government of the United States began to issue Treasury notes. They at once entered into circulation as money. They became the most favored and popular of all the paper money of the country. This added nearly if not quite $500,000,000 more; I believe a little over that sum, including the interest-bearing notes, which also circulate as money. Thus we have raised up the paper and gold circulation from $300,000,000 to about $800,000,000, which is now in round numbers the actual amount of the circulation of the country; and now, by this bill as it stands, it is proposed to authorize the creation of banking associations, based upon the bonds of the Government, with power to issue $300,000,000 more, as much more as constituted our whole circulation at the beginning of this war, which will swell the volume of our circulating medium to the enormous figure of $1,100,000,000. With such a volume of paper money gold will go above two hundred per cent., or rather a paper money dollar will sink below fifty cents of constitutional currency, of the money of the world.

Giving to this subject the best thought of which I am capable, I have come to certain conclusions in my own mind which I do not propose to argue at length, but to state briefly to the Senate for the consideration of men much abler than myself.

The first question, the one before all others, the one to which every mind should be directed first and constantly in resolving this currency question is, to stop the making of another paper dollar in any form or by anybody unless it is made to take the place of some other paper money now actually in circulation. I am not unfriendly to the system so much desired by the Secretary of the Treasury with this limitation. I therefore have no objection to allow the State banks to draw in and cancel their present circulation and to enter into associations under this banking law and issue this national currency to take the place of their own circulation now existing; but to authorize the creation of this amount of new national currency in addition to the State bank currency, and in addition to the Treasury notes—the greenbacks—which we have put in circulation, would be, in my judgment, little short of madness. We must grasp the whole question at the same time. I have not a doubt that unless we put some restraint upon the amount of circulation to be issued by State banks and by these national associations we shall carry up the price of gold to 200, and when we do that we may expect such a financial revulsion as we have never seen in this country.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he means to say that he would never make another paper dollar in all time to come? Suppose our population increases to one hundred million, would he never issue any more paper money?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am speaking of the state of things now, with gold at 180, and with a circulating medium, as I have already shown, of about $800,000,000. I say it would be financial madness to make more paper money and put it in circulation and not expect to increase the price of gold. We can no more do it than we can reverse the laws of nature. The laws of trade, the laws of supply and demand, the laws of currency will control, and legislation cannot prevent it.

Mr. POMEROY. I simply asked if the Senator would never make another paper dollar?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Well, sir, if I am here a hundred years hence, or when our population is one hundred million, and I should then be called upon to legislate on that subject, I will answer my honorable friend's question. But now I am legislating for this day and this hour. I do not say what we should do when we have a population of one hundred million. If I live at that day and have an opportunity to say anything on the subject, I will try and meet the crisis then. What I want to meet now is the crisis of the present hour.

For the purpose of giving expression to my ideas on this subject, I propose, first, that there shall be no more paper money made which can swell the volume now actually existing—

Mr. POWELL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no objection.

Mr. POWELL. I merely wish to know if I understood the Senator to state we had $800,000,000 of paper money in circulation. I did not think it was so great.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I did not say $800,000,000 of paper money. My computation was this: There was from $175,000,000 to $200,000,000 of paper money in circulation when these difficulties began; then there has been, as I understand, about $500,000,000 of paper circulation which the Government itself has issued; and that, in addition to the gold which was in circulation, made the amount of money in circulation in the country about $800,000,000.

Mr. POWELL. I think the Senator is very nearly accurate. I have a tabular statement here which shows that, including the certificates of indebtedness, it is $779,000,682 22.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am not undertaking to state the precise figures. I am stating in round numbers, and, as I understand the real state of the currency of the country, I am stating it very nearly when I say that, including what gold there is in circulation in the country and what paper there is in circulation, there is about $800,000,000. That constitutes the volume of the circulation of the country at the present time.

Mr. POWELL. Do you include in that the circulation of the local banks?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. POWELL. Then it will amount to $1,000,000,000.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think the Senator is mistaken in that, because the circulation of the local banks has never exceeded about $200,000,000.

Mr. WILSON. I understand it is about $233,000,000.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Perhaps the Senator from Massachusetts may be correct when he says the amount of paper circulation of the State banks has gone up to $233,000,000. But at the time our difficulties commenced, on the 1st of January, 1861, the circulation of the State banks was $202,000,000, and on the 1st of January, 1862, $183,000,000. In consequence of the troubled state of the times, there was a contraction of the circulating medium of the banks, reducing the amount of banking circulation to $183,000,000 on the 1st of January, 1862, as I see by reference to the National Almanac, which has a tabular statement on that subject.

Mr. POMEROY. The statement of 1861 included the southern banks.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That might have made a difference.

Now, Mr. President, when gentlemen say that it is owing to the expansion of the currency by the State banks that gold has gone up to 180, it is, as it seems to me, the greatest mistake in the world. The whole amount of the expansion by the State banks has been at the outside but about thirty or thirty-five millions, while the Government has expanded the currency by $500,000,000.

What is the $35,000,000 of inflation by the State banks compared with the $500,000,000 we have poured into the volume of circulation in the shape of greenbacks? Men are utterly mistaken when they attribute the rise of prices and the rise of gold to an increase of the paper currency by the State banks. It is true, as was stated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] yesterday, that in New England, New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey they have swelled the paper circulation. His statement showed that there was an increase in the circulation of the banks of New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey from 1862 to 1863 of from $50,000,000 to $75,000,000, and in the New England States from $39,000,000 to $65,000,000. But it will be remembered that in 1862 there had been a very material contraction of the currency in those States, and the amount of paper in circulation in 1862 was not near as much as it was in 1861, while at the West the State bank circulation has been largely decreased. Upon the whole, therefore, the swelling of the volume of the paper currency has been but slightly affected by what the State banks have added to that circulation.

But, sir, I agree that the State banks ought not to have swelled the volume of circulation at all. I for one believed at the time we passed the law to issue Treasury notes that we ought then to have exercised the power of restraining the State banks from increasing their circulation. I advocated such a proposition then in the Senate, but it did not prevail, and the State banks have to some extent increased their circulation and some have done so enormously. I desire to provide not only against any further increase, but to compel the State banks to reduce the amount of their circulation within some reasonable limits as near as may be to the amount of their actual cash capital paid in. The precise figure I will not state, for I do not undertake from any practical knowledge of banking to state the precise sum to which it should be brought down. The opinion of my friend from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] would be worth much more than mine upon that.

Mr. WILSON. Why should they not be put on the same footing as those national banks, and confined to a circulation of ninety per cent. of their capital stock?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Perhaps that would be the true limit, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

There are three systems of paper banking. There is the system of New England, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, where the State Legislature authorizes them to organize banking institutions and to pay in their capital and then commence doing business with permission to issue notes. In some of the States they are allowed to issue twice the amount of their capital; in some two and a half times the amount of their capital; and in some States I believe even three times the amount of the capital actually paid in. Then there is the free banking system of New York, which prevails to a considerable extent in the western States; and that is, that upon the stocks of the United States or the stocks of the State where the banks are located, associations may be formed, and by depositing those stocks with the comptrollers of the several States they are permitted to issue circulation to the amount of ninety per cent. of the stock thus deposited. The banks of these States have been unable to swell the volume of their circulation because the laws of the States would not allow them to do it; their own laws requiring them to secure their circulation by the deposit of stocks of the United States or of the States where the banks are located. Then there is this third system of national banking, a system not of monopoly, but of free banking under the laws of the United States, based upon Government securities. These three systems are in operation, and we must see them all and have reference to them all in our legislation upon this subject. The amendment which I desire to have adopted, and which bears on the same point to which the amendment of the Senator from Missouri is directed, and which at the same time recognizes these three systems, and without aiming to destroy either would master and regulate them all in this crisis, is in these words: or reissue any bills, notes, or certificates of any kind or denomination whatever designed to circulate as money; which at the passage of this act shall not be actually issued and in circulation as money under the laws of the United States or of the several States, unless the said person, banker, banking association, or corporation shall redeem the same at its place of business in gold and silver coin on demand.

Before reading the provisos which qualify this general provision, I will remark that this would stop the swelling of the paper volume, and any further expansion of circulation by any bank or banker in the existing state of things, by new issues or by reissues.

It applies to all new banks which may be organized under the laws of the States. If any associations not already in existence form themselves into banking companies to issue notes to circulate as money they are to redeem those notes in gold and silver coin. Then I would have no objection to such companies being formed; and the more the better perhaps for the country. I now read the provisos:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit those associations which have become duly organized under the provisions of an act to provide for a national currency secured by a pledge of United States stocks, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, approved February 25, 1863, and shall have transferred and delivered to the Treasurer of the United States the bonds of the United States, under the provisions of the fifteenth and sixteenth sections of said act, from receiving the currency to which they have become entitled, and from putting the same into circulation as money under the provisions of said act.

The purpose of this is to keep faith with these associations; to allow those persons who, on the faith of the legislation of the last Congress, have organized themselves into associations, and deposited their securities and become entitled to this national currency, to receive it at the hands of the Government and put it in circulation. The whole amount to be put in circulation under that provision as it stands would be the sum of $29,229,590, as appears by a letter I have received from the Comptroller. But, sir, the second proviso of that amendment, and that perhaps is the most important, is in these words:

And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit any existing banker, bank, banking association, or corporation existing under the laws of any State, and having notes, bills, or certificates in circulation as money, from organizing themselves into banking associations under the said act of Congress and acts amendatory thereto; and in case of such organization, and upon complying with the provisions of said act, they shall be entitled to receive and put into circulation, of the national currency provided for in said act, an amount equal to the amount of the notes, bills, or certificates of said bank in circulation, which shall be from time to time withdrawn from circulation, redeemed, and canceled, not exceeding the amount of its capital stock.

The effect would be this: by allowing the State banks as they now exist to withdraw their circulation and to come in under the provisions of this national banking law, it would authorize the amount of currency to be issued under this act to reach probably $250,000,000. The Senator from Massachusetts states that the amount in circulation by the State banks is $238,000,000.

Mr. HARRIS. One hundred and sixty million dollars.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to state that the amount of paper circulation of the State banks is about $238,000,000.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from New York says it is only $160,000,000. I will not decide between these different statements, because I have not the documents before me to show the exact amount.

Mr. HENDERSON. The bank circulation in the loyal States now does not exceed $163,000,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is about $170,000,000.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The honorable Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, whose attention has been particularly called to this question, states that the amount is about $170,000,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In that neighborhood.

Mr. HENDERSON. It has been much reduced within the last few months.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The effect of this proviso, and herein it differs from the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] would be that national currency might reach the sum of about $200,000,000, the $170,000,000 to take the place of so much State bank currency now in circulation and the $29,229,590 which the Comptroller informs me by his letter of the 4th of May the associations under this law already made are entitled to receive. The good faith of the Government has been given to the men who have organized these associations and deposited their securities. We cannot now refuse to carry out on our part that good faith and allow them to go on.

The whole effect of the adoption of this first section of the amendment that I propose would be to prevent an increase of circulation; to stop where we are. In the first place, it proposes to allow the associations which have been organized upon the faith of the Government to take the circulation to which they are entitled; and in the second place, it authorizes any of the State banks now existing to withdraw their present circulation and organize under this system, and substitute the national currency for their circulation thus withdrawn.

Mr. JOHNSON. What do you do with the State banks that do not come in?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have a section expressly intended to reach that, bearing upon them; which contains a full answer to that question, and is in these words:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passage of this act, every person, banker, banking association, or banking corporation, shall reduce the amount of its notes, bills, or certificates in circulation as money, to the amount of its cash capital actually paid in and — per cent. added thereto, or to the amount actually secured by the pledge of the stocks of the United States, or of the State where the bank or banking office is situated, pursuant to the laws of the United States or of the State where the bank is situated; said reduction to be made in the following manner: one fourth of said excess of circulation beyond what is above provided shall be redeemed and canceled on or before the 1st day of — next; one half on or before the 1st day of — next; three fourths on or before the 1st day of — next; and the remainder on or before the 1st day of — next; and upon all bills, notes, and certificates issued or reissued, or remaining in circulation as money, over and above the amount as provided in this and the preceding section, the said several bankers, banks, or banking corporations shall pay to the United States a tax of one per cent. per month.

That will reach the point, and compel the reduction. I have not assumed in this second section to state (for that is a matter which ought to be discussed, and upon which gentlemen of experience ought to give their views) the exact amount to which the circulation of these banks should be reduced. It is said by some that if you reduce every bank in its circulation to its actual cash capital paid in, while it will not affect the banks in the great cities like New York, Philadelphia, or Boston, which have large deposits, it will affect the country State banks which issue circulation not only to the amount of their capital but sometimes twice that amount, making their profits on loaning this excess over and above their real capital.

Mr. JOHNSON. As I do not desire to reply to the honorable member, with his permission I should like him to answer now the suggestion I wish to make to him. It seems to me—I was about to say doubtful, but I do not think that is a strong enough word—it seems to me very clear that we have no authority to interfere with the powers conferred upon the State banks. The State banks are acting under State charters, and the only mode in which the United States can interfere with associations of that description is under the power to pass banking laws. If the banks do not redeem their notes in coin, that of itself would be an act of bankruptcy, and they might be brought under the influence of a bankrupt system; but I do not see what authority the United States, or any branch of the Government, have to interfere with the powers conferred by the States upon their own State banks, if it be true, as I assume to be true, that the States have the authority to constitute banking corporations. It is, of course, clear that the United States have authority to tax State issues, State banks; but the tax proposed by the honorable member from Wisconsin is in the nature of a penalty. It says to these banks, "If you issue more than we say you shall issue, then we will tax you one per cent. a month." It is not a tax in the ordinary acceptance of the term; it is virtually a penalty. I submit that question to the honorable member. He can answer it or not as consists with the purpose of his speech.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The question is a pertinent one, worthy of your consideration. I have given to it some consideration, and I see no valid objection to it. Another honorable friend has suggested a difficulty precisely opposite to the one which the honorable Senator has raised. He suggests that it is doubtful whether we have power to say that a State bank shall redeem in gold and silver. My friend from Maryland does not doubt that.

Mr. JOHNSON. By a bankrupt law.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Senator from Wisconsin will permit me to remark that I do not see how his proposition could be carried into effect except by a bankrupt law.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If it is necessary to do so we could exercise that power. We could declare that any bank which does not redeem in gold and silver, or which shall put or keep bills in circulation above a certain amount which it does not redeem in gold and silver on demand, has committed an act of bankruptcy. It is not material to me under which clause of the Constitution we proceed, if we only have the power and will exercise it.

But to return to the subject before us, the question is whether we have a right to tax a certain species of paper circulation. Why not? Where a power exists to tax a given thing there is no limitation upon the power except in the discretion of Congress that it shall be just, equitable, for the public good, and to carry into effect some power expressly or impliedly given by the Constitution. I do not understand that there is any other limitation in the Constitution of the United States except that. It cannot be said that this taxation is not uniform. It does not tax the property of particular individuals; it shows no favoritism; it assumes generally to tax a whole class of persons, bankers or corporations in this country who are exercising the privilege of loaning their credit without interest for the well-secured notes of other people with interest; the extraordinary privilege of getting interest, not on what they lend, but on what they owe to other people. We assume to tax this most profitable of all manufactures, the manufacture of paper money, when we say that we tax them one per cent. per month for issuing and putting in circulation a certain species of paper money beyond a certain amount over and above their capital. I do not see that there is any limitation upon our power to tax. The Senator says it is prohibitory. It might be that some banks would venture to pay this tax of one per cent. a month, twelve per cent. a year. There are banks in some sections of the country which have made more than twelve per cent. annually in their banking operations in buying and selling exchange and in loaning their notes. It would not perhaps be absolutely prohibitory, although I say frankly it tends in that direction. But what if it does? Under the power of taxation and levying duties, excise, and imposts, when the power exists may it not be exercised even to the point of prohibition?

This is the old question of a prohibitory tariff and home protection.

But, Mr. President, beyond all that, I assume that to the Federal Government was given the power not only of coining money but of regulating the value thereof; whatever may be necessary and proper to be done by this Government to regulate the value of money, to regulate the value of what circulates as money, to regulate, if you please, the price of gold, is implied of necessity in that power. If it were an original proposition, if there had been no action of the Government for sixty or seventy years to the contrary, no decisions of the courts and no action of the State Legislatures, acquiesced in during all that time by the people of the United States, with the Constitution in my hands, and the history of the times when it was made, and with the debates of the men who made it before me, I would say that the men who made the Constitution of the United States intended to prohibit and employed the strongest words to prohibit any State from making any kind of paper money in any manner or form, direct or indirect. But, sir, I must acquiesce in the fact that the decisions of all the courts, State and Federal, the action of State Legislatures, Congress, and the long acquiescence of the people of this country have been all the other way, and it is too late for me to undertake to stand upon that position; to assume what otherwise I would confidently assume, that all these State banks are unconstitutional, void, and illegal from the beginning. I am compelled to accept these institutions as existing facts. They are powerful facts—facts which cannot be ignored or disregarded. But, sir, I believe that we have notwithstanding a controlling power over the question of money, the whole question of currency, for by that the value of money is affected and regulated throughout the whole country. I do not see anything in the decisions of the courts which would say that we have not that controlling power; at all events that we may not by the power of taxation limit and restrain the volume of paper money, the greater part of which is of our own creation. My honorable friend from Maryland concedes that we have the power under the bankrupt laws to put banks that do not pay their debts in gold and silver into bankruptcy. If necessary we can resort to that which he concedes is within our reach. I agree to that while I maintain the other. We can make it an act of bankruptcy if they do not redeem in gold and silver at their counters. The form in which we arrive at it is not so material to me; whether it is by declaring certain acts of these banks, for instance the issue of more than their capital in currency, not redeemed in gold and silver, acts of bankruptcy, appoint receivers for them, and wind them up under that power in the Constitution, or whether we restrain them by any other legitimate power. The purpose I have is to put down the brakes, to stop the train on this down grade of depreciation which we are traveling with a velocity and momentum that make every reflecting man tremble for the results to come in the financial world. I assume that we can only do that by exercising the power of putting a stop to the making of any more paper to be put in circulation as money. In spite of all theories and all delusive hopes gold and silver are the only real money of the Constitution, the money of the commercial world.

Mr. President, there are three conflicting opinions on this subject of currency: one desires the entire destruction of all State banks, the withdrawal of greenbacks, and the substitution of this national currency; another is opposed to the national currency altogether; a third is opposed to all banks of issue, and would compel all to bank upon greenbacks alone. These opinions are in conflict here; in conflict throughout the country. These extremes of opinion must meet and discuss this question, and agree upon some common ground upon which all can stand, upon which the financial men of the country can stand, and upon which the country can stand. As I have already said, it is my deliberate conviction that our first duty is to stop increasing the volume of paper money; the second is to allow the State banks now existing to come in under this national system; the third is to compel the State banks that have expanded their circulation beyond their capital, and do not redeem in gold and silver, to reduce their circulation down to or near their actual cash capital, or to the amount of their circulation already issued and which is fully secured by the stocks of the United States or of the States where they are located.

I desire to say a single word in relation to the State of Wisconsin. Our State banking system is this: the constitution of that State allows banking corporations to be formed which, by depositing with the comptroller stocks of the United States, or of the State of Wisconsin, are authorized to issue circulating notes to the amount of ninety per cent. of the par value of the stocks thus deposited. The circulation must all be secured in that way. It cannot be increased and expanded beyond that amount. It is regarded by our people as a perfectly well secured circulation. The people of our State have full confidence in it. Let me say to my honorable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] it is in one sense a national circulation. The debt which was created by the State of Wisconsin, upon which its banking system is now secured, is for the money which Wisconsin has borrowed for the purpose of putting her soldiers into the field to aid the General Government in putting down this rebellion. What is not secured by Wisconsin State stocks issued for that purpose, is secured by the stocks of the United States. By her constitution she was not permitted to have any State debt beyond $100,000 unless that debt was created to repel invasion, to suppress insurrection, or to sustain the State in time of war. Wisconsin, when this war came upon us, was without any debt beyond $100,000. When this war commenced, it was her bankers that stepped forward and enabled her to raise the money to place her soldiers in the field. It was for that purpose that she created the stock which to-day stands, together with the United States stocks, pledged as the security of her whole bank circulation. It was, if I may so express it, born of the Union, for it was to preserve the Union that Wisconsin put up her credit upon which her banking institutions are now based; and in this sense I insist her currency is national, and not local or sectional.

Our true course and our true duty is to manage this currency question without making war upon State banks or upon the national currency system, but by restricting and regulating, so far at least as to restrain all from greater expansion. Let all the banks, State and national, have precisely the same privileges and stand upon the same footing so far as taxation is concerned. By allowing to the national banks the additional advantages which are contained in this bill, we shall induce a majority of the State banks gradually to change their system and come in under the national system. Gentlemen seem to say these are no sufficient inducements unless we make open, relentless war upon them. This is a great mistake. There are very great privileges given by this bill to these national associations. I understand that their bills are to be received in payment of dues to the Government. All our taxes can be collected in the issues of these banks. All debts and dues to the Government, with the single exception of duties on imports, are to be paid in this national currency. These national bank associations may be the depositories, as I understand it, of the Government of the United States. The Government of the United States, now the greatest of all financial operators, will necessarily favor these institutions to a very great extent. All these inducements will lead the men engaged in the business of banking under State institutions to change their system without making direct and open war upon them. If we undertake to make open and direct war upon them, if we undertake to crush them, we shall bring on a financial crisis at once in which we have as much interest—ay, sir, far more than they; the value of our bonds in the market will be affected; and if a panic and crash should come, who can predict the result?

Sir, I would avoid the financial controversy which would grow out of what would be regarded as a declaration of open hostility against the State banks. They are too old, too strong, too much interwoven everywhere with the business and habits and customs of all communities, cities, towns, and States, of the business men and leading men of the whole country, for us to make open and direct war upon them intending to destroy them. I understand there is not a better managed institution in the country than the State Bank of Indiana or the State Bank of Iowa. Is it desirable for this Government to declare open war against these banks, against all their friends, and all interested in them? I say to gentlemen it seems very unwise to me. I greatly fear that of itself it would tend to bring on a financial crisis, to bring down the bonds of the Government of the United States in the market instead of carrying them up; to carry up the price of gold instead of bringing it down. We should at this time, in my opinion, combine all our strength, without destroying either one class of the community or the other. We want the support of all. State banks and national associations all put together are not too strong for the great work in which we are engaged. I would gather all their strength, I would bring all their power to work in support of the Government.

In my judgment, in dealing with the financial questions of this hour—and I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that the currency question stands next to the great military question which General Grant, I trust in God, with the brave armies under him is now about to resolve—it is unwise to declare war upon the State banks with the determination to abolish and destroy all the State institutions of the country: I am willing to favor the building up of the national institutions, but at the same time I believe it is wisest and best for us to acknowledge the existence of these State institutions and to deal fairly by them. If I am correctly informed, this Government owes something of a debt of gratitude to the State banks of this country for their course toward the Government in the beginning of this struggle. Did not these banks loan to the Government of the United States all their gold and silver? Have not these banks actually taken of the bonds of the United States more than the whole of their capital, and do they not hold those bonds now? I ask, gentlemen, if you undertake to force them suddenly to wind up by open hostility to them, will you not force all the securities which they hold upon the market; and if the Secretary of the Treasury must go into the market to sell our bonds, and there meets either our own bonds or other good securities in competition with him, will it not of necessity reduce the price of our securities? And we seem to be in this strange state of things, that the holders of our bonds are interested in their depreciation, because the more they are depreciated the more they can buy with the interest they receive upon them in gold.

Let us look at this question as it is. I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that a good national currency is the most of all to be desired. We have in theory such a national currency—gold and silver. That is the money of the Constitution; but practically, in the existing state of things, the currency which we use is paper; the paper of State banks, the paper of these national banks, and the paper of the General Government. If the policy to be adopted by Congress is immediately to destroy or drive out of existence all State banks and all State bank circulation, I have a much better plan than the one contained in this national bank bill; and that is to substitute in its place directly the notes or greenbacks of the Government. They cost us nothing. We pay no interest upon them. If you desire to destroy the State bank circulation, to allow another class of men to occupy its place, what do we gain? If we were to drive out of circulation the notes of the State banks, amounting to $170,000,000, we could issue $170,000,000 of greenbacks in their place that would not cost us anything. It would be a loan to the Government of the United States of $170,000,000 without interest, and the people would prefer that altogether. But I assume that no such destructive policy is to be attempted, or if attempted that it cannot succeed without most tremendous financial convulsions.

There are so many men engaged in the business of banking, so many who have interests involved in or connected with it, that some system of paper money banking is regarded essential to the business of the country. While I would not destroy the State banks, and I am willing to give to these national associations many advantages, making them our depositories, receiving their bills in the payment of demands due to the Government, which will encourage State banks to change their system and withdraw their circulation in order to organize under this bill; while I agree perfectly in that, and sustain this bill with all my heart so far as that goes, I will not sustain it to the point of making open war upon the State banks as such, with the declared purpose to destroy them and all the State institutions of the country founded upon State rights.

There is one other point upon which I will say a word, and that is the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER,] compelling these banks to redeem their paper in the cities of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, at one fourth of one per cent. discount. My opinion is that that will very much strengthen and nationalize these institutions. It will make their notes desirable to the people; as circulation they will be sought for. It will give a very great advantage, in my opinion, to these institutions. It will encourage the people to take their notes and circulate them, and to prefer doing business with them rather than with the State institutions, because they redeem at so small a discount in the city of New York, that substantially their notes will be at par all over the country and constitute a national currency. Being receivable in taxes of any kind, they will be sought as the greenbacks now are. I think that amendment a wise one.

But, sir, I understand the Senator from Ohio has suggested a motion that this whole subject-matter be referred back to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not submit any motion to refer it to the Committee on Finance. I said it should go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COLLAMER. Why should it be referred to the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will give my reasons presently.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is not in order for me now to move the amendment on which I have addressed the Senate. It bears on the point involved in the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, and therefore it was in order for me to speak upon it now. But his amendment does not cover the whole ground. His amendment would have the effect of limiting all the national currency to be issued under this bill to $29,000,000. I would not do that. I would allow the State banks in existence to withdraw their circulation and take the national currency, and substitute it for that.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand the Senator to argue that the United States notes are good enough currency if we want a national currency. He has also argued that we have enough greenbacks out to make a circulating medium in this country. Then of course, according to his own argument, we ought to stop this circulation. When the tax bill comes up, if we desire to tax the State banks out of existence we can do it very easily; but we have nothing to do with the State banks in this bill. This is a bill to organize a system of national banks. I do not desire to interfere with State banks in this bill at all.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, this subject of currency cannot be considered independent of the currency issued by State banks. It seems to me gentlemen are mistaken if they suppose they can consider the question of currency in this country and in this crisis without taking into consideration the existing state of things and survey the whole field. That necessarily embraces the whole circulation. We must act upon and in reference to the $170,000,000 of State bank currency as well as upon the national currency, greenbacks, gold, and all. We must consider the two together. We cannot consider them separately. They are part and parcel of the same mixed currency, the same volume, constituting together an essential part of the existing state of things. I think, of necessity, when we act on this question as to the amount of national currency which we are to permit to go into circulation under this bill, we must have reference to the State banks and their circulation.

I cannot sustain the amendment of the Senator from Missouri without some such provisos as I have proposed, because it makes no provision for the existing State banks to change their circulation and organize under this bill. They would not be allowed to do so under his amendment. The whole effect would be to limit this national currency to the amount of $29,000,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. If my amendment be adopted it will not interfere with the organization of all the capital of this country under this bill. The Senator is sadly mistaken in that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It would interfere with their organizing and receiving the currency provided for by this act.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly; but I understand the Senator to argue that we have already too much circulation. How much better will this circulation be than United States Treasury notes? By issuing them we save the interest. The Senator himself has argued that by putting out United States notes in preference to adopting this system we save the interest.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I agree with the Senator that if Congress was to adopt now a measure to destroy the State banks and wipe out all their circulation it would be better to substitute for that circulation the greenbacks of the Government on which we pay no interest than it would be to substitute for it this national bank circulation, and the State banks themselves would be better satisfied with that than the building up of associations on the ruins of the State banks, resulting from open and declared hostility against them. They can understand the logic and consistency of having their circulation destroyed to give place to the notes of the Government itself. But, Mr. President, I do not understand that such is the determination of Congress at this time. I do not understand it to be the judgment of either House that the State banks are to be taxed out of existence.

They are still to be permitted to exist; and if so we must deal with them as existing institutions, as they are. We should induce them to organize under this law. But you could get no one to do business under this law if they have not the privilege of issuing circulation. They could not compete with State banks at all if they have no such privilege, and the State banks would not change their system to organize under this act without the privilege of issuing circulation.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, if the amendment that I have offered be adopted it will stop this system where it now is, and I offer it with that view. I offer it to prevent the further inflation of the currency. In presenting a proposition of this sort I do not desire to be understood as placing myself in opposition to the best interests of the country, as was argued by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] yesterday. I believe he said in his speech that everything that was done in this Senate calculated to hamper the bill under consideration is as bad as an attempt to hamper our soldiers in the field. I believe he also said that a defeat of the Treasury is a defeat of our arms.

Mr. SUMNER. I said no such thing.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am repeating the language as I understood it, in order—

Mr. SUMNER. I said every attempt to hamper the national finances.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not see any cause for the Senator's excitement. I certainly am not in the habit of misrepresenting any gentleman on the floor, and there is no use of any excitement about it. I repeated the language as I understood it, and as he is present, it is easy to correct it. I would not intentionally misrepresent him or anybody else; but I certainly understood the whole drift of the argument he made yesterday in his very able elucidation of this subject to be that any person who interfered with the great system as indicated in this bill was putting himself in the way of the success of the country. In other words, the clear inference was that unless this bill were passed the Secretary of the Treasury could not get along with the finances; that a defeat of the Treasury (and if this bill were not passed it would be a defeat of the Treasury) was just as bad as a defeat of our arms.

Although the Senator may not have used those precise words, yet he will find, when his speech appears in the public prints, I have not improperly stated what was the clear implication of his remarks. But, sir, I do not wish him or any other gentleman to understand that in opposing a system of banking such as is about to be organized under this bill I am putting myself against the success of the country. If I do so, it is an error of the head and not of the heart. I do not desire to interfere with the success of our arms. If there is anything on earth that I do cordially desire it is the early suppression of this rebellion. Like the Senator from Massachusetts, I am perfectly willing, if the sacrifice of all the State banks would accomplish that end, to sacrifice them now. I am willing to do more than that: I am willing to sacrifice other and greater interests to accomplish that object.

But, sir, how will the sacrifice of the State banks accomplish anything? I appealed to the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] a few days since, when the proposition in regard to the Bank of Commerce was under consideration, to tell me if he could how this bill was to benefit the Secretary of the Treasury. The Senator from Maine turned me over for explanation to the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] and I must say that since that time I have not heard a reason assigned by the Senator from Ohio; [Mr. SHERMAN,] or anybody else, for the passage of this bill. I know that the Secretary of the Treasury last fall in his report to Congress gave what he regards as reasons for it. But I am perhaps too dull to appreciate those reasons. I am perfectly willing to do everything that a man can do within the narrow limits of my own judgment to sustain the finances of the Government and to aid and assist its military operations to a successful conclusion. This statement for me is unnecessary, however, for I have never failed to vote men and money to carry on the war, and I expect to continue to do it, unless I find its further prosecution is hopeless. As I have said, I cannot understand the reasons—and I have examined them carefully—that are intimated in this report for the passage of the measure under consideration. The Secretary says:

"Impelled, therefore, by a profound sense of the present necessity of a national currency to the successful prosecution of the war against rebellion, and of its utility at all times in protecting labor, cheapening exchanges, facilitating travel, and increasing the safety of all business transactions; and at the same time unwilling to urge even salutary and necessary reforms in such a way as needlessly to disturb existing investments of capital, the Secretary recommended, in two successive reports, the authorization of national banking associations, to which the capital of the corporations now issuing notes for circulation might be transferred with advantage to the parties interested as well as to the general public."

Again he says:

"If the policy thus indicated shall be fairly and judiciously pursued, and proper measures adopted to induce the conversion, at the earliest practicable period, of the bank corporations of the States into national banking associations, and of the corporate circulation into national currency, the Secretary believes, and, as he thinks, not without good grounds, that all the money needed for prompt payment of troops, and for the most vigorous prosecution of the war, can be obtained by loans on reasonable terms; while all interest on debt, and all ordinary expenditures, and a considerable part, also, of the extraordinary expenditures caused by this war, will be met by the ordinary resources."

It would gratify me very much to have these sentences explained. In financial questions the mind wants something more than a rounded period. It demands cold logic. It should not be satisfied with anything less. I am willing to take back all of my preconceived opinions against this system of banking if some member of the Finance Committee will tell me how this measure will enable the Government to make loans on better terms than it can now make them. Why will capital organized under this law be more prompt to aid the Government than as organized at present? Capital generally looks to its own interests. It seeks the safety of the Republic, because it is in danger when the Government is lost. Capital wants a stable Government, under whatever law it may be incorporated. But conceding this amount of patriotism to it, we all know that capital is constantly seeking to accumulate. If the Secretary can satisfy the local banks of the security of his loans he can negotiate loans with them at any moment. After they have surrendered State charters and accepted this law will they demand less security? If they do, it will simply be because their issues are less valuable than their present issues. To inflate the currency would bring about that result, but the Secretary seeks to avoid inflation as a great evil. But is it intended to procure the favor of these institutions by granting them Government favors? If so they will soon have entire control of the Government. Does the mere organization of capital under a loosely drawn bill enable the Secretary of the Treasury to lay his hand on the surplus capital of the country? I do not say "loosely drawn bill" to reflect on the Finance Committee, for the very necessity of having any such measure as this makes it necessary to have what I call a loosely prepared system of banking. The work of the committee is perhaps well enough so far as concerns mere execution. The defect is in the system. The system is false in its very inception. Falsehood and blunders will follow it all the days of its life. Its history will be one of corruption. Its death will come when the country has been ruined by it. How does it enable the Secretary of the Treasury to lay his hands upon surplus capital which would not otherwise be obtained? How does it enable him to get it, merely by having it incorporated under this bill? To me the idea is preposterous.

It cannot and will not be argued now that it will enable the Secretary of the Treasury to sell bonds, as an inducement to individuals to commence banking by depositing them with the Treasurer. No such argument as that can well be urged, because the banks of this country already hold bonds enough to procure all the circulation authorized by the bill. They need to purchase no more. They have enough to deposit the $300,000,000. If they purchase any more it will be because they think the purchase profitable. But the other reason is that it will give a sound currency. Mr. President, I do not pretend to understand the subject of banking. I am no financier, but when I examine a bill of this character and look at the condition of the country I think I know that no circulating medium issued in the manner provided in it can ever be of any service to the people. That is my candid impression. I cannot see wherein it will aid the Secretary of the Treasury either in making loans or improving the currency. Why, sir, as I have said, the banks have enough bonds now to commence banking under this system. Without purchasing any more bonds they can draw all the currency they may desire. How in the world does it enable him to borrow money that he could not otherwise borrow? Until reasons, substantial reasons, founded upon something like common sense, be given, I will not believe that this measure gives any facilities for making loans. It would be strange indeed if a mere act of incorporation would change the nature of capital. If legislative favors are designed to be given to induce the loan of their worthless trash to the Government, I for one will set my face against granting those favors. Such conduct will ultimately subject the Government to the most heartless power on earth. It will first enslave and then bankrupt the Government, while it destroys the independence of the people. Three hundred millions of paper issue controlled by selfish capitalists, and combining from political or avaricious motives, would be dangerous to the liberties and property of the people.

But the Secretary of the Treasury gives another reason to which I must allude. He complains of the State banks that they inflate the currency and prevent his properly carrying on the finances of the Government. He says he cannot properly get along under the load of difficulties thrown upon him by State bank expansion. If that be true, of course it is a serious objection to local bank circulation. But I cannot see that it constitutes any reason at all for the establishment of this system, for the real evil is inflation. The Secretary says:

"Much the greater part of the rise of prices not accounted for by the causes just stated, as well as much the greater part of the difference between notes and gold, is attributable to the large amount of bank notes yet in circulation."

Now, Mr. President, let us examine this for a moment. When the Secretary of the Treasury sent this report to Congress on the 7th of last December, what was the price of gold in New York? One hundred and fifty-one. What is the price of gold to-day? I have not seen the quotations this morning, but it is not less anyhow than 180. Will the Secretary of the Treasury or any gentleman on this floor tell me how it is that gold has risen in value between the 7th of December and this time? If this statement of the Secretary of the Treasury be correct, that it is in consequence of the inflation of the currency by the State banks, how is it that gold has risen since that time? Every gentleman here knows that the banks throughout the country have been reducing their circulation since the 7th of December last, with the exception, I believe, of the State of Pennsylvania. The only State I now remember that has inflated its currency in the least is the State of Pennsylvania. It is a little singular, therefore, that gentlemen will urge the adoption of this measure upon any such ground. I tell Senators my honest impression is, if this bill passes and the circulation contemplated by it is thrown upon the country, that gold will continue to go up in the market, and will go up very largely. This measure will not check the rise in the price of gold. It must increase the price.

Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate, and I have not taken its time upon this measure, nor generally upon other measures; but I do desire while upon this subject of the State banks to go back and look at a little statistical information on the subject to ascertain whether the charges made against them and the reasons assigned for the organization of a system of banking of this character be true or not. If the desire be to establish a system of banking for this country, and ultimately to get rid of the circulation of the State banks, then I make this pertinent inquiry: does this system of banking give the country a circulation more secure than the State bank system?

If banks of issue be in themselves wrong it will be enough to destroy those now in existence without establishing others. If constant evil attends bank circulation let us cut up the whole thing and commence aright. But this is not proposed. It would indeed be ludicrously inconsistent for an advocate of this measure to express any doubts about the general utility of bank circulation, for if that proposed now to be issued be serviceable it would be difficult to conceive of any that would be injurious.

Let us look for a moment at the State bank system of this country as it has existed for the last several years. I do not desire to be understood as advocating or upholding in any measure whatever the State or local banks. If I had my way I would abolish every bank of issue in this country. They are a convenience when established upon specie and have no power to expand their issues beyond actual capital. I do not say that as a Senator I would vote for any proposition to destroy State banks, because I do not believe I have constitutional power to do any such thing. This war, that the Senator from Massachusetts speaks of as necessary to be organized against the State banks, is a war, in my humble judgment, against the Constitution of the country, and therefore I cannot make any such war. I cannot make this war with the mere purpose of destroying those institutions. I can subject the capital of those banks to the same taxation that I subject other property to, but I will not go beyond that. If capital is invested in State banks, I am willing to tax it just as I do capital in the national banks; and gentlemen will find that however far they may stray from that doctrine they will have to come back to it in the end. No injustice of the character indicated here during the discussion of this bill in regard to taxation will be tolerated by the people. If equal taxation upon the State banks shall destroy them let them go. In that case revenue is the object, and the overthrow of the banks the incident. I will do nothing that looks to their destruction as the object of legislation. We have no power to do so, and if we had, it is against all propriety and expediency to exercise it.

In 1850, by an examination of the statistics, I find that there were in the United States 872 banks with an aggregate capital of $227,469,077, with a circulation of $155,012,881. Their deposit account amounted to $127,567,655. To meet these liabilities they had of specie in their vaults $48,671,138, nearly thirty-three per cent. of their circulation. In addition to this they had a local and exchange line of $412,607,653. Besides, they had perhaps the larger part of their whole deposit account on hand in the paper of good solvent banks in different parts of the country.

In 1860 the banks had increased in number to 1,642, with a capital of $421,890,095. The circulation at that period was $207,102,477. Their deposit account was $253,802,129. Their coin on hand amounted to $83,564,528, nearly one half of their entire circulation; while their loans amounted to $691,495,580.

The Senator from Ohio, a year ago, on the introduction of the bill of which this is an amendment, urged its adoption upon the ground of the multiplicity of banks organized under State laws. That I admit was an objection to the State banks. Now, how many banks are we getting under this law? I believe that from three hundred and fifty to three hundred and ninety national banks have already been organized under the law of last year, and they have now issued $29,000,000 of paper. If we go on at that rate, the Senator from Ohio will find that we shall have many more banks established in this country under this system, furnishing the same amount of circulation, than under the State bank system.

The fact is, if a circulation of $29,000,000 requires even three hundred and fifty banks, the proposed circulation of $300,000,000 will require about thirty-six hundred banks. The old law required that they should all be known as national banks and their currency should all be alike. This bill permits them to assume any name they choose. Hence that beauty of similarity, that preventive of counterfeiting, that virtue of uniformity, is all to be sacrificed to a very natural desire on the part of the banks to retain the old names under which they have acquired a deserved reputation for solvency and correct dealing. The Bank of Commerce would not be the ninety-eighth national bank of New York, but it wishes no doubt to continue as the Bank of Commerce. It would require many years to give that bank the character it now enjoys under the old name. Banks to be beneficial need age. The community wants solidity, capital, good management, punctuality, honest directors, and legitimate banking in all institutions of this character. I do not blame the old, long-established banks, possessing a character for solvency and fair dealing, that they should be unwilling to give up their names. In this case there is something in a name. The only thing that astonishes me is that they should be willing to surrender charters which gave them renown for vigor, health, and security, and accept a rotten charter that throws suspicion upon them in the infancy of life under it. I am more astonished that they should be willing to enter upon a reckless and unworthy system of banking, which will sooner or later tarnish their good names, ruin themselves, and bring distress upon all within their influence.

But, Mr. President, what was the fact in regard to the State banks? I undertake to say that in a large majority of cases those banks are subjected to a most rigid examination under State laws. The registers, commissioners, or bank superintendents of some sort were required to go perhaps twice a year and examine them personally. Their circulation was furnished generally by bank commissioners or registers, whose business it was to confine them to the limits fixed by the State law. In nearly all cases they are required to keep on hand a large reserve of coin. In the large cities they are required to make daily reports of their condition, and the most obscure country bank is compelled to make quarterly exhibits. What is the case under this bill? What sort of reports do you have under the bank system now presented to us as a national system of banking, which is to furnish a uniform currency throughout the United States? The only uniformity there can be in it, in my honest judgment, is that it will be uniformly bad. Will the mercantile community of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, and St. Louis be satisfied with a quarterly report from the institutions having their fortunes perhaps in their vaults? Such a thing cannot be. Will the bank commissioner be able ever to go and examine these three or four thousand shipplaster shops? I say not, and we all know it cannot be done.

But to proceed with the State banks. Usury generally subjected them to the forfeiture of charter; at the least to heavy penalties. The refusal to pay in coin was followed by large interest on the paper protested, in the shape of penalty; and continued suspension for a certain period, generally short, forfeited the charter and forced the institution into liquidation. Contracts made in violation of their charters are declared void, and any person in interest can avoid them.

I am now speaking of the provisions generally found in State bank charters, in order presently to draw a comparison between them and the provisions of the bill under consideration, which it is said is to furnish to us this greatly needed currency that is to be uniform in value throughout the country. I am aware that the State banks have heretofore very ingeniously managed to avoid many, if not all, of these wise and wholesome restraints imposed by the States. As capital has done in the past it will do in the future, and you will not get rid of these difficulties under the proposed banking system; indeed they will be much greater than under any State bank law of which I have any knowledge. As I said before, I do not desire to be understood as defending the State banks or as attempting to urge upon the Senate any right upon their part to issue currency; I am aware of their shortcomings; but it seems to me illogical to complain of evils existing under a good system, even if it be a State system—evils, indeed, inseparable from all bank issues—and then to urge the adoption of a measure, wholly without safeguards, without a dollar of coin, propped up on public credit, issuing unlimited quantities of irredeemable paper, convulsing the country with its contractions and expansions, producing at one time the corruptions of extravagance, at another the distress that follows money panics, corrupting the rich and degrading the poor.

Mr. President, John Law's system of banking in Paris when first organized was infinitely a better system than this. If I recollect aright, he required in his banking system that twenty-five per cent. of the capital subscribed should be paid in coin. It is true that coin had been debased and depreciated to the extent of one fifth in value by the action of Louis XIV a short time previous; but the twenty-five per cent. at least would have been worth twenty per cent. in coin, even after its depreciation. He required then that at least twenty per cent. of the capital stock subscribed should be paid in in coin, and he required that the balance of stock should be paid in in French securities—the bonds of the French Government—which at that time were no further depreciated below gold than the bonds and greenbacks of the United States to-day. What was his system organized for? It was under the pretense on the part of the Duke of Orleans that he could pay the public debt; that he could get rid in this way entirely of the public debt, fund it, merge it into the bank, make it a part of the capital stock of the institution, and thus relieve the Government of it. It was to get the people to sustain the bank with all their wealth, and then the bank could carry the Government through its embarrassments. Why are we organizing this system now? It is to facilitate loans, to enable us to contract additional debt, and, just as John Law proposed, to make this public debt a basis for a circulating medium. If we make these banks carry the public debt all will be ruined. Such was the case then. Such will it be now. I undertake to say that this experiment of banking on nothing has been tried often enough to show its fallacy. You can no more establish a bank upon public credit and make that bank live than you can do any other impossible thing—no more than you can make money out of paper and lampblack. Whenever we arrive at that degree of proficiency in money-making that we can take a piece of paper, stamp upon it the amount that it shall be worth, and make it worth that amount, we shall have arrived at the point of making this a good banking system.

Mr. President, unless we are to-day prepared to say in our judgment that paper with pictures on it, the landing of Columbus and other designs connected with the history of America, is money, then ought we to know that this thing will fail. It was tried in England and failed; it was tried in France and failed; we tried it during the revolutionary war, and called every man a Tory who would not declare it was money, even while he was paying $1,000 for a breakfast; we tried it in 1836, and a most inglorious failure followed. The confederate States have tried it and failed. We laugh at their failure day after day, and follow them as though we admired Mr. Memminger's financial sagacity.

What was the cause of the failure of the free banking system of the western States a few years ago? We of the West have had sufficient experience on that subject. The free banking system of the western States which brought ruin and distress upon that section in 1857 and 1858 was far superior to the proposed system. That system required redemption in coin, and compelled a reserve fund to meet immediate liabilities far greater than this system does.

Now, permit me to look for a moment—and I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to it—at the security presented in the measure now before us for the redemption of the notes. What does it propose? I believe the word "coin" is not used in the bill, any more than the word "slavery" is used in the Constitution of the United States. No circulating medium ever was good, or ever will be made good, that is not convertible into coin. It may be tried a thousand times, and it will fail every time. Each attempt will but further attest the truth that it is beyond the power of man to make something out of nothing.

In specified cities, the redemption points under the proposed measure, (and those redemption points are now reduced to only three by an amendment which has been adopted,) the banks must keep on hand twenty-five per cent. in lawful money of their circulation and deposits. What does that twenty-five per cent. now amount to? It is equal to thirteen and eighty-eight hundredths per cent. in coin, paper being worth but fifty-five cents and a half on the dollar. At all other points—and you will find that the banks of circulation will be generally at these other points—they are required to keep but fifteen per cent. in lawful money, and that is equal to eight and one third per cent. in coin.

Now suppose a country bank is established under this bill with a capital of $500,000, what will be its issues? Four hundred and fifty thousand dollars. It will purchase $500,000 of United States bonds as its capital, and issue $450,000 of notes. I have shown that the average amount of the deposit account in the banks of this country is over half the capital stock. Then suppose the bank receives deposits to the amount of $250,000, the immediate demands against the institution will be $700,000. These are demands that may come against the bank any day, and any good system of banking must look to the funds on hand for the redemption of the immediate liabilities. Now what is required to be kept on hand for the redemption of this $700,000 of immediate liabilities in the bank? It loans its money, I mean the currency it draws on deposit of bonds. I cannot of course tell what will be the amount or the value of its loans, but I will suppose that it uses the whole amount which it can loan. In prosperous times it will loan all. Then it will have loans on hand amounting to $450,000. If this system of inflation continues much longer, gentlemen will find that the liabilities due to banking associations under this law in the course of a few years will be worth very little, for the whole country will be in a state of bankruptcy and insolvency, and it cannot be expected that in such a condition of things the liabilities due to the banks will be of much value. Banks, of course, in order to make double interest—interest on the bonds of the United States deposited here and interest on the currency drawn—will attempt to put into circulation all of their notes. It will be their interest to do so, and they will endeavor to force their notes upon the community. This is but natural; all banks without the fear of specie redemption before their eyes do it; and there is no reason why these banks should not do so, and especially under a law which puts no curb whatever upon them.

I know that to say anything against a measure which the general feeling of a body of which a man is a member insists is right only renders him who says anything against it ridiculous at the time; but I am satisfied, in the course of the next five or six years what I am now saying will be sufficiently vindicated by the history of the country. The history that has been will be again. The South Sea bubble will explode again, and the results of John Law's banking system will inevitably follow this. It cannot be otherwise. The experience of the western banking system based upon public stocks will be repeated again, because of the simple fact that you do not make money out of public credit; it is debt; it is not capital. It is a false idea that anything of that character is money; and whenever we build upon it we build upon a sandy foundation, and the house that is built thereon will fall.

It will not do to tell me that the wants of the Treasury demand that we shall adopt this scheme. I say that anything which destroys the credit of the country destroys the credit of the Treasury, and anything that destroys the credit of the Treasury will, as the Senator from Massachusetts says, hamper our soldiers in the field.

But suppose the bank which I am creating has an amount of loans equal to the circulation, $450,000. When a run, in the usual language, is made upon the bank, how much of that can be reasonably expected to be realized? I undertake to say that under this system, if ten per cent. can be realized in order to meet immediate demands, it will be doing very well. Then it will get $45,000 out of its loan account. A country bank will not be expected to have a very large exchange account. Its loans will be on its local line, loans for three, six, and nine months, and if it can get ten per cent. on those loans it will be as much as it can do. In the western States in 1857, after the insurance company at Cincinnati failed, it is notorious that many of the banks could not realize five per cent. at any given date upon the amount of their loans. But gentlemen say this banking system is founded upon United States stocks, and therefore it is infinitely better than that western system which was founded on State stocks. Let me say that the very State bonds that were filed with the register in Wisconsin and Illinois and other States in the West, to furnish a basis of circulation in those States in 1857 and 1858, never sunk so low below gold as United States sixes to-day, although the people suffered so much by the depreciation of those bonds.

It will not do to say that it is disloyal to make this assertion. We might as well come up and meet this question as men. We know very well that the bonds of the United States are below par. We know very well that they will not sell for coin at par. Why do we not attempt to do that which is necessary in order to appreciate the credit of the Government? Why do we go on building upon credit? Is that going to save the credit of this Government? It destroyed the credit of the English Government; it destroyed the credit of the French Government; it brought universal misery on the people of both those nations; and yet we are repeating it. The old Continental money system is upon a par with what we are now establishing. Look at the bloated system of affairs they now have in the southern States. Where is the credit of the confederate government? How have they destroyed that credit? They destroyed it by building upon credit, the very thing we are doing now. We abandon gold and build one credit upon another. We issue a Treasury note and call it money. We know that gold is worth almost double as much. Why? Because the one is credit, the other is capital, money. But we do not stop here. We issue another security debt in another shape, a Government bond, and in order to induce the sale of it we agree to take for it the previously issued debt, and agree to pay gold at some future day. We go further; we say to the purchaser, purchase the bond and you may commence banking on it. You may issue notes equal to ninety per cent. of its par value, those notes redeemable in legal tenders worth to-day fifty-five and a half cents on the dollar. As a further inducement you may become a splendid banker without a dollar of coin in your vaults, and you shall only be required to keep fifteen per cent. of circulation and deposits to redeem the one and pay the other. If you fail, as you will, we will redeem your circulation.

Gentlemen talk about reducing the circulation, and yet what is now proposed? The State banks have a circulation of about $168,000,000. The chairman of the Committee on Finance says $170,000,000. I think it is about $168,000,000. It is proposed to retire that circulation and to substitute instead of it $300,000,000 of what? Anything better than the issues of the State banks? If to-day you repeal your legal-tender law there will stand the State laws compelling the banks to redeem in coin, and they have got the coin on hand to do it. What right have we to stand here and complain of the State banks because they do not redeem in coin? Do we not compel them to take United States legal-tender notes in payment of all debts due to them, and shall we not say that they may pay them out? In fact we have so said. Capital acts just as we would act. If any gentleman on this floor to-day had gold in his pocket and United States Treasury notes, what would he use in payment of a debt? He would use the greenbacks. So with the banks; and the reason that State bank paper to-day is below par is simply in consequence of your bill making United States Treasury notes a legal tender.

But, Mr. President, I digressed. What sort of a banking system is this? I return to my illustration of a country bank with $500,000 capital, having immediate liabilities to the amount of $700,000, and you can make them no less; figures will not lie. How much is required to be kept by that country bank as a fund for the immediate redemption of its liabilities? Fifteen per cent. of its circulation and deposits. How much is that? Its circulation and deposits, according to my estimate, are $700,000. What is fifteen per cent. on that? $105,000; which, being added to the $45,000 it may realize from its loans at any period, it has then $150,000 in greenbacks to redeem $700,000 of immediate liabilities. I am gravely told that this is a banking system which will make the paper secure and uniform in value throughout the country. It may be uniform; I do not object to it on account of its want of uniformity; but I say if it has any uniformity its uniformity is bad. It will be uniformly worthless.

But that is not all, Mr. President. This bill allows three fifths of that whole fund to be kept three thousand miles away from the bank of issue. Do we not know very well how the banks will act in regard to this matter? Do we not know that a bank in St. Louis will merely exchange its credit with a bank in New York? They will find out how much three fifths of the amount required to be kept on hand is, and the cashier of the bank in St. Louis will write to the cashier of the Bank of Commerce in New York, saying, "Please place this amount to our credit, subject to our draft at any moment, and in return for your kindness we will place a similar amount to your credit;" and in that way no money will pass, nothing will be used but credit. We are going on credit without a dollar of money anywhere, and the banks will take you at your word. This is all credit; a banking bill established by a law of Congress in which the word "gold" or "specie" does not appear! The St. Louis bank will pass to the credit of the Bank of Commerce the amount of three fifths required to be kept on hand, and then what does the bill mean? It requires two fifths of the fifteen per cent., equal to only six per cent., to be kept by the country bank for the redemption of the $700,000, and what does that amount to? Two fifths of $105,000 would be $42,000 in paper, which is demanded by this law to be kept for the redemption of $700,000 of immediate liabilities; and that at the present depreciation of paper, which is worth to-day but fifty-five and a half cents on the dollar, is $23,300 in coin, which I am told is a sufficient fund for the redemption of $700,000 of liabilities that may be brought against that bank any day. This, added to the $45,000 immediately available from loans, would make the entire fund $68,300 in paper, or $43,275 in coin.

It is astounding to me that this is called a safe, sound banking system. Gentlemen may consider it so; but I tell them that the John Law scheme in Paris, after it had exploded in 1720, was more tolerable in the eyes of the French than this will be in the eyes of Americans in ten years from to-day, if it be adopted.

But lest objection be made to my illustration of a country bank, let me take the Bank of Commerce in New York, that huge concern which has been urged to come in and embrace this bill. I find by looking at the report of that bank made on the 23d of April that it had a loan account of $18,807,089, and it had of specie on hand $1,763,449. Its deposits were $9,120,000, and its circulation $1,705. You have amended this bill so as to enable that bank to come into this system without individual liability. What sort of a bank will you have? It has now a circulation of $1,705, and you want to get rid of that, to destroy it; and why? Because it is the circulation of a State bank, and the Senator from Massachusetts says it stands in the way of the prosperity of this country and must be abolished, must be destroyed; it should not be permitted longer to interfere with the affairs of the Treasury. Remember the proposition is to contract the inflation of the currency, to reduce the quantity of the circulating medium. The Secretary of the Treasury says he is injured in all his financial operations because he cannot stop the banks from inflating the currency, when the fact is that the banks are contracting their currency every day, and we know it; and yet gold goes up as the State banks contract their currency. Then somebody else is expanding the currency, and not the State banks. That is evidently the truth of the matter. You tell me in one breath that you want to contract the currency. Here is the Bank of Commerce, which has now but $1,705 of circulation out, with nearly two million dollars of coin in its vaults. The city banks of the city of New York have to-day $25,000,000 of coin in their vaults with a circulation of $5,500,000, and you propose to enable them to issue within ten per cent. of the amount of their whole capital, amounting now to $70,000,000, thereby increasing their circulation $58,000,000, to let them get rid of their coin, to sell it for greenbacks, that it may be shipped abroad for goods, and to suffer them to go to banking on credit, inflating the volume of currency, and disturbing all laws of value and all honesty and fidelity in business. You want to reduce the volume of currency. The city banks have a little more than five millions of circulation out; they cannot generally keep out more. When peace comes or the legal-tender law is repealed, they must redeem in coin under the State law. Hence, being at the center of trade, they cannot keep afloat a large circulation; but when they accept this new system they can issue the whole amount of their capital, less ten per cent.—$63,000,000—and become the depositaries of the Government to the amount of many millions, without any coin or other adequate fund to secure the note-holder or the Government.

You propose now to issue to the Bank of Commerce $9,000,000 of circulation, its capital being say $10,000,000. You propose to compel it to withdraw its present circulation of $1,705, and in lieu thereof to let it issue $9,000,000. Adding to this circulation its deposit account, $9,120,000, and what are the immediate demands upon the institution? Eighteen million one hundred and twenty thousand dollars. What security would the note-holders and the depositors in this bank have for immediate payment? Of course, under your system the bank will continue to issue circulation as long as it can, for it has only to redeem in greenbacks, and it is to the interest of this whole system that you are establishing to reduce the value of the greenbacks so that the banks can redeem with that which is of less value than it was at the time of the issue of their paper. Let gentlemen consider that it is to the interest of all these banks, the very moment they have issued this "national currency," to depreciate the value of greenbacks. Why? They have simply to pay a debt; and it is to the interest of the debtor to inflate the currency, while it is to the interest of the creditor to contract it. Is not that true? A debt is contracted at par for gold to-day, for example. Is it not the interest of the debtor to make more paper to be put into circulation, and, if you please, to have it declared a legal tender, in order that to-morrow he may buy the paper for fifty-five cents and pay his debt at that rate? We close our eyes to this important fact, and we go blundering on, and declaring that no man except a traitor will refuse to acknowledge the credit of the Government. I have as high an opinion of the credit of the Government and the resources of the people as any gentleman; I do not want to depreciate the one nor underrate the other; but he who gets up and says that that credit is depreciated is the patriot, not he who declares that every man who says aught to the contrary is after "beef" or some other personal interest. Government bonds are now below par, and they may be much lower. English consols, under the influence of a bread panic in 1857, fell from 98 to 78½.

Sir, when suddenly we find ourselves in the condition of the southern confederacy, those men will not be regarded as the true friends of the Government who stood up against light and suffered this state of affairs to come upon us. The true friend of the Government is he who watches its interests and speaks of its faults with a view to correct them.

I have asked what security the note-holder and the depositor of the Bank of Commerce will have under this system. Recollect that any day the Bank of Commerce may be called upon for over $18,000,000 of immediate liabilities; not contingent or future liabilities, but liabilities that rest on the bank from day to day; and I take its present report because I understand it will be organized under this system with all its capital just as it stands. It is required that it shall keep on hand twenty-five per cent., because it is in one of the cities named in the thirty-first section. Twenty-five per cent. of its deposits and circulation will be $4,530,000 in greenbacks, which to-day at the present depreciation would be equal to $2,506,600 in gold. Here is a bank with immediate liabilities upon it amounting to nearly eight times the amount of assets immediately available for payment, and I am told that this is a safe, sound, solid institution. It may be tried; but the future will demonstrate that the whole thing will explode and bring ruin and misery on this country.

Since this debate commenced, I have heard it given as one reason why this bill should be passed that the State banks have suspended specie payments, and that we need to have a currency which is better than the currency of the State banks—currency that need not be in a state of suspension. I suppose indeed that this is one of the chief reasons why this bill is urged upon us. The next movement will be to destroy the State banks. If the State banks had suspended specie payments without any action on our part making it necessary for them to do so, would that be any reason why we should pass here a system of banking which is already suspended in its inception? If bank suspension be a bad thing it is bad only because the notes of the banks are not convertible into coin. What other objection can Senators urge against bank paper that is sus-pendent? That bank paper, although suspended, is certainly more solvent than that to be issued under this system, because, as I have just shown, there are many millions of dollars now in coin held by the local banks against $168,000,000 of circulation. I call attention to the important fact that there is but a circulation of $168,000,000 of State bank paper in this country now, and the banks having that paper in circulation to-day have nearly $100,000,000 of coin with which to redeem it. They have coin enough in their vaults to buy greenbacks in sufficient quantity to redeem every dollar of it to-day, and have all their loans, all their exchange, all their other assets on hand besides. Yet we are told that because the State banks have suspended specie payments therefore they must be destroyed and this system must be substituted in its stead!

As I have said, if bank suspension is a bad thing, it is only because the notes of the banks are not convertible into coin. I have already suggested that the banks would now be able to resume specie payments but for the legal-tender law. That law has had the effect to force on the public an amount of circulation not needed, and the result, of course, has been depreciation, a result superinduced by our own legislation. We now charge the local banks with muddying the waters about us. What have they done? They are certainly decreasing their circulation all over the country, except, perhaps, in the one State of Pennsylvania. It is said they have inflated the currency. In the first place, I say that is not true; but the charge implies that inflation is an evil, and to remedy this evil you propose to double the amount of the circulation! In the second place, it is said the banks are not able to redeem their circulation. If that is true, it is made so by your legislation; but I have shown that in addition to their other vast resources, they now have on hand gold enough to purchase sufficient United States notes with which to redeem in greenbacks. They have on hand already Federal securities enough to commence banking under the new system. They have a large local and exchange line, and in a majority of the States we have a double liability of the stockholders. But because the banks cannot at this moment redeem in coin, we propose to destroy them, and establish a system of twenty years' duration without any redemption at all. We say that because the State banks have suspended specie payments, they ought to be driven from existence, and immediately we turn round and establish a system for twenty years without any redemption at all. This may be all right; but I cannot so see it.

If we want specie resumption, we can get it immediately. How? By repealing the legal-tender law. This is the short way to arrive at the end assumed to be desirable. The plan now proposed will, unless strangled by the future legislation of Congress, postpone for twenty years at least all hopes of a convertible currency. We are here insisting that the safeguards around State banking are insufficient, and for remedy we propose a system possessing fewer safeguards for note-holders and depositors than is possessed by the most loose and rickety system of stock banking ever adopted in any State of the Union. No stock banking system ever was adopted by a State government which did not require the redemption of the notes in specie, and yet they fail.

We insist that the local circulation is not uniform, that some of it is good and some of it is bad; and to remedy this evil we propose to issue a circulation all of which is bad. That is the sort of legislation we are now called upon to adopt. We find a circulation in the States based upon surplus capital, upon wealth, upon gold and silver in a majority of cases. We desire to monopolize the currency business. We must therefore destroy this. We propose to issue paper based not upon coin but upon public debt, which never yet in the history of banking failed to ruin the community in which it circulated, and I defy any gentleman to point me to a single exception. I undertake to say that no banking system ever yet was established upon public stocks, upon debt, that did not end in failure. There may be some that have not yet had a sufficient trial, but the trial will bring them to bankruptcy. It is so in the very nature of things. But we are bound to contract debt during this war, and we think this false scheme necessary to sell our bonds. If we regarded a Government bond as debt, the only injury would be the existence of the debt. We insist, however, that the debt is money, that it is the same as gold; that instead of its being a curse it is a blessing. To prove it the same as gold we let the purchaser use it as gold—to use it as a basis for bank issues, where nothing else than gold should ever be used.

What is the use of a paper circulation at all? I thought it was for convenience. I did not suppose that anybody dreamed that a paper circulation was money, unless instantaneously convertible into coin. I did not suppose that anybody, not infatuated, ever seriously argued that it was worth one cent of itself, that it had any intrinsic value in it. But we seem to argue here as if paper itself would give to the country wealth, power, greatness, ability to negotiate loans, and supply all the business of the country with that which is so much needed. The circulating medium of this country now is far too great, and that is the difficulty with us.

As I stated, we want the business of circulation reorganized, vainly supposing that the scheme will float a large public debt. To succeed in this work the thumb-screw of power is to be applied to the State banks, and a dangerous system of favoritism extended to the new corporations. I do not object to your depriving the State banks of the power of issuing paper if thought desirable. It might, perhaps, be a good thing to do so if it can be legally done. But when you have done that, does it necessarily follow that the Government should provide for issuing $300,000,000 more by these new banks? That is the meaning of this bill, and a meaning to which I object most strenuously.

I desire now to call attention to another question. If the $300,000,000 of notes to be issued by the new banks be intended as the permanent currency of the country for the next twenty years, displacing all other paper, (a thing neither practicable nor desirable,) I still think the amount should be limited to a smaller sum. The year 1860 in this country was exceedingly prosperous. Recovery from the prostration of 1857 was almost complete in that year. Business was healthy, both North and South. The currency was not so abundant as to excite speculative operations of a dangerous character. The money in circulation, however, was amply sufficient to answer the requirements of an active and prosperous trade. Healthy commerce demands a convertible currency, and such a currency never fails to give prosperity and security in business, with a reasonable amount of labor on the part of the people. The business of that period was becoming prosperous and secure; specie payments were being resumed throughout the country. But for the war, the last three years would have canceled the debt of the former Administration, and given us a degree of public prosperity unparalleled even in the history of the United States.

Now, what was the amount of paper circulation in the United States in 1860? I have already shown that it was $207,102,477. Did anybody complain that there was not sufficient circulating paper in 1860? Business was as active as it ever was, and we had a population of thirty-one million of industrious and enterprising people. Nobody complained of the lack of circulation. Remember, too, that this amount of $207,000,000 was the entire circulation of all the States, both North and South. The seceded States had about $45,000,000, and the loyal States about $162,000,000 of this circulation. The circulation issued by local corporations and now outstanding in the loyal States is about what it was in 1860, not varying more than five or six million dollars. It is now perhaps $168,000,000; it was then say $162,000,000. This circulation, I have shown, has the best possible guarantee for its conversion. It has loans three times as great as the amount of the circulation, and coin on hand equal to nearly one half of it, and fully sufficient to purchase greenbacks to redeem it all to-day. Yet grave Senators tell us that this circulation is worthless, and must be displaced by that which is uniform and convertible. To make it uniform, they will allow a New England bank to redeem in Louisville, Kentucky, or in San Francisco. That was the bill as it was reported, and as it will be again, perhaps, before we get through with it. To make that currency convertible they ignore specie as the standard of value, and require redemption only in that which is as worthless as the authorized circulation. If greenbacks are convertible so is this circulation. If this circulation is convertible so are greenbacks. But the whole ruinous system of credit is established without one dollar of coin. It is to be national currency or greenbacks, or greenbacks or national currency. You can take which you please, provided you call at the right place. If greenbacks by any misfortune should not be paid, you can protest and sell United States bonds. Large quantities of these bonds being forced on the market to meet that general insolvency which never yet failed to follow banking on a public debt, the depreciation of the stock is inevitable. We went through that history in the western States a few years ago, and we know all about it. What are these stocks now worth? Some gentlemen say it will not do for us to intimate that the bonds of the United States are depreciated; that it is not patriotic. I disregard this folly. Let us look at the facts. The sooner we look at the facts, and understand them and appreciate them and act upon them, the sooner we shall get out of all our financial troubles. What are the bonds of the United States worth now in coin? If a gold dollar is worth $1.80 of greenbacks, then greenbacks are worth fifty-five and a half cents to the dollar. Five-twenties with May coupons off are worth say $1.06 in greenbacks. Then a dollar of five-twenties is worth fifty-eight and eighty-eight hundredths cents in coin. This is to be the basis of the circulating medium in this country; and worse than all, this circulation, not based on real wealth, but on credit, is to be the exclusive system. There is to be no other paper circulation, indeed no other currency. Gold is nowhere mentioned in the bill; and gold never appears in business when a depreciated currency is recognized as a medium of exchange. Gold keeps no such company. No gold has been seen in circulation since the day when greenbacks, being a legal tender, fell below par. The people will never again see any gold until they force redemption, or reduce by taxation or otherwise the amount of outstanding United States notes, checks, and certificates, to that reasonable limit demanded by the legitimate business of the country.

It is useless to drive out a certain class of circulation and fill its place with that which is no better. Is it not criminal to fill its place with that which is infinitely worse? It is criminal when the public interests demand a reduction of the circulation, that we should remove $168,000,000 with one hand while with the other we scatter $300,000,000 among the people. That amount of depreciated currency will prove to be an unmeasured curse to this country in times of peace. In 1860 we needed but $207,000,000 for the whole Union, and now it seems, with the southern States away from us, we need $300,000,000. I say that this paper, if inconvertible, is a curse to the country. If convertible, what will be the result? It will loose from its hiding place at least $100,000,000 of gold, and that would swell the currency in peace times to $400,000,000. This was the case in 1860. The $207,000,000 of bank paper was not the only currency or medium of exchange. A large amount of gold was in circulation, because the banks having resumed specie payments gold and paper were indifferently used. A man who owed a debt would as lief pay it in gold as in paper, and thus perhaps from fifty to eighty millions of gold went into actual circulation. There is now no gold in circulation at all. If resumption should ever come under this bill, it would loose say $100,000,000 of gold, and this would give us a circulating medium of $400,000,000. Suppose that the Treasury notes, postal currency, certificates of deposit, and other devices now in circulation as money, amounting to perhaps $650,000,000, were out of the way, I yet believe that $400,000,000 of circulation would be too much for a period of peace. Great Britain with all her wealth and power does not issue over $200,000,000 of bank paper. I append a table showing the bank circulation of Great Britain for each year from 1854 to 1860.

I give the aggregate figures without giving the different banks. The circulation of the Bank of England, the country banks of England, the banks of Scotland, the Bank of Ireland, and the private and joint stock banks of Ireland, all added together amounted in 1854—the largest amount for the year being taken—to £41,028,283, or a little more than $200,000,000. In 1855 the circulation was £37,896,956; in 1856, £39,894,516; in 1857,

The paper circulation of the United Kingdom is $100,000,000 less than we propose by this bill, while we already have out six or eight hundred millions.

The total circulation of the Bank of France from 1850 to 1856 averaged about 612,000,000 francs, or $122,000,000.

Let us see what was the bank circulation of the United States at different periods. In 1830 it was in round numbers $60,000,000; in 1836 it was $151,000,000; and what followed 1836? We all know the ruin that followed; and why? Because the system of banking upon credit was adopted all over the country, and especially in the south-western States. The banks had issued twelve and fifteen and sometimes twenty dollars in paper for one dollar in coin, and many banks issued paper without one dollar of coin to begin with. Every one of the stock banks of that period failed, and brought distress on the country. In 1838 the bank circulation had fallen to $115,000,000, a contraction of $36,000,000 in two years. Why was this? It was an effort of the country to save itself, an effort to drive off a superabundance of the circulating medium, and to correct the evils of the day. It was like the effort of nature to shake off disease. In 1840, the bank circulation fell to $112,000,000, and in 1843 it had decreased to $57,000,000. The delirium of eight years was over, and common sense had returned. In 1845 it ran up to $88,000,000. Increasing population and business demanded additional facilities. In 1850 it was $139,000,000; in 1855, $186,000,000; in 1857, $218,000,000; and in 1860 it was $207,000,000.

But, Mr. President, I wish to examine this question in one other aspect. I am not a sectional man, and I do not want to make a sectional argument; but the bill suggests a thought that cannot be well disregarded by western men. Because I undertake to protect the best interests of the people whom I represent on this floor, I am not therefore a sectional man. I now wish to present a reason, an all-sufficient reason to my mind, why no western man should vote for this bill. Some western Senators seem to be very much in favor of the measure, because they say we suffered a few years ago from the individual stock bank system, and they want a currency that is national and uniform; and without stopping to inquire into the other questions connected with the measure, they rush at once to the consummation, as they suppose, of getting such a currency. I ask the question, how can a western man vote for this proposition? And when I ask it I say nothing against the eastern and the northern States. I believe I think as kindly of Massachusetts, of Rhode Island, of New Hampshire, New York, Pennsylvania, or any of the eastern States as I do of my own State. I desire to legislate in my place here for the good of all; and while I am legislating for the West I think I am legislating for the good of all, because, although this measure may be attended with temporary benefits to the northern people, it will redound to their injury in the end. What is to be its result?

It will inflate the currency; and what is the result of an inflated currency? It stimulates speculation. Having intercourse with foreign nations, money necessarily seeks its level. The tendency of money is to an equilibrium. For instance, if we have more gold in this country than is demanded by our business, more than is needed for the exchange of property, it necessarily goes to other countries with which we have commercial intercourse, until an equilibrium is produced. If we use paper instead of gold in such abundance as to fill the requirements of business here, forcing the paper on the community or the community using it voluntarily, without requiring gold to remain in this country as a basis of circulation, the gold goes abroad, for foreign merchants will not take this paper. The greater the inflation the more rapid the exportation of gold. As the volume of currency increases so do speculation, reckless dealing, and extravagance increase. There is fancied wealth, and while the delusion lasts our conduct is as reckless as if real wealth existed.

In such times importations always exceed exportations, and the balance has to be adjusted with gold. This continues, as it did in 1835, 1836, and 1837, until the country is drained of its precious metals. When this occurs the bloated system falls and the reality of bankruptcy is upon us. Whether in process of time the entire coin of the country will be exported depends entirely upon the amount of paper circulation that the country has. If it be greatly in excess of the demands of business, producing extravagant speculation, the coin will ultimately go. It matters not what the amount of import duties at a given time, if we continue to increase the paper circulation the prices of goods and wares will continue to go up and importations will continue.

Since I came here to the Senate we have raised the tariff, I believe, three times. Does anybody suppose that is going to check importations into this country? I say no, it will never do it, as long as you continue to inflate the currency. It is idle to talk about tariffs stopping importations as long as you inflate the currency and make it to the profit or fancied profit of an individual to import goods. The result is to increase the price of coin and also of goods, and the holders sell their goods on a rising market, and they will continue to export coin and import luxuries. The result will be that before we cease importations we ruin the country by shipping all the substratum of credit out of it. I was looking the other day at the importations into the port of New York, and I noticed that for the quarter ending the last of March, including the months of January, February, and March, we imported into this country some thirteen or fourteen million dollars' worth more than we exported; and notwithstanding the increase of the tariff a few days ago, we shall find that those importations will continue to increase if we pass the bill now under consideration.

Gentlemen will remember what I say, if they think it of any importance. I now predict that the importations will not decrease in amount until we stop this inflated system of banking. We have to come back to the reality of wealth; we have to come back to that which is money; and the sooner we do it the better it will be for the credit of the country and the success of the Treasury. We shall then understand our own condition. Everything now is seen in a false light. Common sense teaches that war impoverishes a country, and yet we fancy that we are growing rich. It is a delirium—the influence of a stimulant preceding dangerous prostration.

How will we undertake to prevent future importations? Just as heretofore, by continuing to raise the tariff from year to year. This I have shown is vain unless we cease to inflate the currency. Now, what is the effect of this continual increase of the tariff upon western interests? I refer to this not to get up any local or sectional feeling. I would scorn to do any such thing. The interests of one section of the country are as dear to me as the interests of another; but I see the inevitable effect of this system on that section of the country which I in part represent, and it is my duty to call attention to it. I am astonished at some western Senators taking the position they do. They seem to be influenced by the one single object of securing what they term a national currency. They will not reason with you if you tell them the circulation of small stock banks, although organized under a law of Congress, will be no better than the currency they now have. Carried away by this one idea, they are willing to act wholly without examination of other questions connected with it. They say the road they are traveling leads to a point which they desire to reach. It may be so; but I doubt the policy of rushing along heedlessly over swollen streams and bogs and precipices without any effort to avoid them. Suppose we get a national currency, uniformly worthless, and it penetrates all the avenues of business, driving out our real wealth, and itself ultimately "turning to bitter ashes upon our lips," what shall we have gained? Suppose it has the effect to impoverish us of the West and give our riches to others, then we do not want it, however good it may be.

The manufacturers of those articles which are not produced in sufficient quantity to supply the whole demand in the United States are enabled to add the entire duty to the price of their manufactured articles. They can add that duty in coin or its equivalent, because the duty is paid in coin. If fifty-five cents duty be added on such an article, the duty being paid in coin, the additional price to the consumer is one dollar in currency; or else our whole taxing system is a humbug, a delusion, and a cheat. If this be not so, it is folly to be increasing the tariff. It is idle to tell me that you put a tariff on foreign articles imported into this country to protect the manufacturer of those articles at home, upon which you have imposed an internal revenue duty, unless it has that effect. The Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] in his able argument the other day, made this perfectly clear. Hence the enormous prices of cottons, flannels, iron manufactures, and other articles made in the northern and eastern States. But how is it with pork, wheat, corn, rye, and other articles of the western States? Flour is scarcely higher now in the West than it was in 1860, when our circulating medium was $207,000,000, although we now have eight or nine hundred millions in circulation. It was then worth perhaps $6 50 a barrel, and now it is worth only $8. Pork, bacon, lard, barley, &c., are scarcely twenty-five per cent. higher now than they were before the inflation. It is plain to see that this is a constant drain on the West. These articles are produced in excess of the demand, and tariff laws will not affect their value. You cannot impose a tariff on these articles of western growth which will add seriously to their value; and why? Because we grow them in excess of the demands of this country, and we want a market for them abroad.

If this inflation goes on, provoking speculation and immorality and reckless trading, increasing the prices of manufactured goods to the extent not only of the inflation but also to the amount of the tariff, while we of the West receive for our productions only the increased price produced by the inflation itself, our wealth will be gradually transferred to the East; we shall become poor, and utterly unable to meet the reality of specie resumption in the future. It is the duty of the West to demand a return at once to a more healthy condition of things.

Give us a sound currency and we must prosper. Our productions command coin abroad. They constitute real wealth. Upon these productions in the future we must build our foreign exchanges. An exorbitant tariff is ruinous to our interests. It forces us to pay more for what we buy and receive less in specie for what we sell. If we expand the currency it constitutes another excuse for raising the tariff. Importations will come, and to check them we add to the impost duties. To check the expansion we increase the internal duties, so as to absorb the currency; one wrong making another necessary. So the West pays its taxes, while it receives no benefit from tariff duties or paper inflations. If this system goes into operation all these evils follow. An inflated currency is the result of the system; an inflated currency makes it necessary to impose internal duties; internal duties render it necessary to increase the duties on importations. The increase of the tariff from year to year will finally transfer all the real substantial wealth of the West and leave us where we were in 1838—our substance gone, and we holding millions of rags, calling them money.

Now, Mr. President, what will the Government itself gain by this measure? What will be the benefit to the Government of the United States arising from the adoption of this banking law? The result of it will be inflation, of course; it cannot be otherwise. What are the consequences of that inflation on the public debt? Our annual expenditures will now reach say $1,000,000,000 in currency. What is that currency worth in gold? Gold is now worth $1 80 to the dollar; therefore a dollar of paper is worth fifty-five and a half cents in coin, as I have already said. Hence, when we have borrowed $1,000,000,000 in paper to carry on a year's war we know its intrinsic value is only $555,000,000. But for the inflation of the prices produced by an over-issue of paper the Government could buy nearly as much with the $555,000,000 as with the $1,000,000,000.

Would it not then be better for the Government in the end to borrow and disburse the $555,000,000 in coin, or in paper that is its equivalent, than to borrow the $1,000,000,000 in depreciated paper? I waive the risk and additional expense of handling the larger amount, and it is very great in these times of immorality.

It will be remembered that when we give our notes, I mean the bonds of the Government, we promise to pay them in coin. If we only agreed to pay the equivalent of what is received the case would be different, but we take a depreciated currency worth fifty-five cents to the dollar and agree to pay coin for it at a hundred cents to the dollar. We use this money for the purchase of Army supplies, paying for them the inflated prices. We could pay for the most of these articles at fifty-five cents to the dollar in gold, or its equivalent. As gold goes up so do many of the articles needed by the Army and Navy, and labor follows. The Government is paying two prices for almost everything, just as individuals are doing. The misfortune of this thing is that the Government is contracting a debt in a period of inflation to be paid hereafter in coin; contracted in rags, lamp-black, and paper, to be paid in metal.

The Government, then, will execute its notes for $445,000,000 in one year more than it receives; in other words, it submits to a discount, a shave of $445,000,000 in negotiating a loan of $1,000,000,000. Suppose this to be a twenty-year loan at six per cent.; the annual interest would be $60,000,000, payable in coin, making, in the twenty years, $1,200,000,000 paid in the shape of interest alone. The whole amount, therefore, required to liquidate the debt would be $2,200,000,000. If the loan were negotiated in coin, or its equivalent, which would be equally beneficial to the Government, even if the exorbitant rate of ten per cent. per annum were paid for the money, the annual interest would be $55,000,000, amounting in the twenty years to $1,100,000,000 in interest. The interest and principal to be paid by the Government in that case would be $1,655,000,000, saving to the Government in the twenty years $545,000,000 in coin, an amount almost equal to the sum now borrowed.

The interest on our public debt as now contracted, if it must be paid in coin, is beyond what any nation or individual can pay and prosper. If we pay six cents per annum on the loan of fifty-five cents, the rate of course is near eleven per cent.; and if we could borrow coin at eleven per cent. for twenty years we should still save the present discount of $445,000,000. If we could negotiate our loans at eleven per cent. in coin we should save in the twenty years $445,000,000 upon one year's expenditure. I take it that he who wishes to pay a debt should desire inflation. He who contracts large debt in times of inflation must keep up the unnatural state of things to the day of payment or fail in the end. That, at present, is the condition of the Government.

There are other facts to which I might allude; but the Senate is no doubt wearied, and I myself am tired. I apologize to Senators for having consumed so much time in an extemporaneous and therefore disjointed speech on so important a measure. I am arguing against an infatuation, and therefore rendering myself ridiculous. I do not suppose that what I have said will have any effect upon gentlemen in this body. I have looked somewhat into this measure, and it is my candid impression that if we undertake to bank under it the whole system will be a failure; that the currency which will be put in circulation under the provisions of the law will ultimately prove to be a worthless currency. It is almost worthless at the date of its issue. It is idle to talk about the Government itself being responsible for it in the end; and yet that is the only thing that will make it worth a cent.

If the Government is to be responsible let the Government continue to issue the greenbacks. We can control the greenbacks and save interest. Let us escape the evils that will come upon us for the next twenty years under a system of this character. If I could wipe out the whole system I would do so. I have not examined the subject to see whether we can get rid of the banks already established under the law of last year; I hardly think we can; but the amendment I have offered I think ought to be adopted. If we cannot get rid of the evils we have already inflicted under the system, for God's sake let us stop at the point where we are, let us quit it, let us get out of it. It will neither enable the Secretary of the Treasury to negotiate a loan nor will it make a uniform currency in this country unless it be a currency uniform in its worthlessness and corrupting influences.

Mr. JOLINSON. I voted in the affirmative on the motion of the Senator from Michigan to strike out all the names of the places at which the notes are to be redeemable, except Philadelphia, Boston, and New York. I move to reconsider that vote, and let it lie over.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Several SENATORS. Oh no; it is too late.

Mr. COLLAMER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 6, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MISSOURI CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. The Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the memorial and accompanying documents of Samuel Knox, contesting the right of Hon. F. P. Blair, jr., to a seat in this House, have instructed me to make a report, accompanied by two resolutions.

I am requested to state that the committee are not entirely unanimous in this report; but that the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GANSON,] and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. SMITH,] and the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BROWN,] do not concur in the report. I desire that the resolutions may be read; and that the report be laid upon the table, and printed.

The resolutions reported by the committee were read, as follows:

Resolved, That F. P. Blair, jr., is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the first congressional district of Missouri.

Resolved, That Samuel Knox is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in this Congress from the first congressional district of Missouri.

The report was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. PRICE. I raise the point of order that while the country is in its present condition it is not in order to adjourn over.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire only to say that I have a large accumulation of business on my hands, as I doubt not other members have, which I have been prevented from attending to at the Departments by the continuous sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the House by unanimous consent has set apart Saturdays for public business. The Chair has doubted whether, under that order, the House could adjourn over Saturdays, but the Chair will entertain the motion.

Mr. PIKE. I move that there be a call of the House.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WILSON demanded the yeas and nays on Mr. FARNSWORTH's motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 64, nays 58; as follows:

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I withdraw the motion.

VOTE RECORDED.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to record my vote on all the various questions on the bill which was disposed of yesterday in relation to the claims of the State of Pennsylvania.

No objection was made.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I vote in the affirmative on the passage of the bill, and in favor of all motions made by the friends of the bill.

MISSOURI CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. GANSON. I now call up the contested-election case of Bruce vs. Loan, from the seventh congressional district of Missouri, and I call for the reading of the first resolution reported by the committee.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Resolved, That Benjamin F. Loan is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the seventh congressional district of Missouri.

Mr. GANSON. Mr. Speaker, the majority of the Committee of Elections have joined in this report, that the sitting member from the seventh congressional district of Missouri is not entitled to his seat. The election took place on the 4th day of November, 1862. There were three candidates—Mr. Bruce, Mr. Branch, and Mr. Loan. Mr. Bruce contests the right of Mr. Loan to the seat, the latter having received the certificate of election, nominally having a majority over Mr. Bruce of 2,028 votes. The seventh congressional district is composed of fifteen counties. It is conceded by the contestant, and also by the respondent, that in eight of the counties of that district the election was fairly conducted; but the contestant claims that there was neither a free, full, nor fair vote given in the other seven counties; that many persons were prevented from attending the polls by threats of intimidation; and that many who did attend were prevented from voting through violence, and in some cases that the polls were closed and the ballots destroyed by a portion of the enrolled militia of the State of Missouri. He claims that this intimidation, interference, and violence were sufficient, being entirely directed against him by the friends and supporters of the respondent, to change the result in his district; and a majority of the committee came to that conclusion, and have so reported.

It was anticipated by the authorities in that State—this being the first election attempted to be held since the commencement of the rebellion—that there would be some interference with those who desired to attend it; and consequently two orders were issued by the authorities of the State to the military stating what its duty was on the occasion. As appears from these orders and from subsequent events it was anticipated that the trouble would come from the enrolled militia; and whatever interference there was at the polls did come chiefly from the enrolled militia. I will ask the Clerk to read General Order No. 33.

The Clerk read, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS SEVENTH MILITARY DISTRICT, ST. JOSEPH, MISSOURI, November 1, 1862.

The attention of all officers and soldiers of the militia of this district is called to General Order No. 45, dated Headquarters State of Missouri, Adjutant General's Office, St. Louis, October 23, 1862, with reference to the election on Tuesday next. The military should bear in mind that they are not the judges of the qualifications of voters. That duty is devolved by law on the judge of the election. If these officers either admit improper persons to vote, or exclude proper persons from voting, the statutes of this State provide an ample remedy. The militia will carefully abstain from all acts calculated to interfere with the freedom of election. All officers who interfere with the rights of voters will be reported to the Commander-in-Chief, to be dealt with as he may decide. All soldiers guilty of the same offense will be punished as a court-martial shall determine.

By order of Brigadier General Willard P. Hall:
ELWOOD KIRBY,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Mr. GANSON. Mr. Speaker, General Order No. 45, issued prior to that on the 23d of October, 1862, directed by the fifth clause that in case of disturbances arising at the election which could not be arrested by the civil authorities, any commissioned officer present should, at the request of any judge, sheriff, or justice of the peace, use the necessary military force to suppress it. It is due to the superior officers of the State and of the Federal Government to declare that no other intention, so far as the evidence in this case discloses, was manifested on their part than that the election held there should be free from any interference on the part of the military authorities.

But it was anticipated that such an interference would come from a portion of the enrolled militia of the State; and it was by reason of that apprehension that these orders were so explicitly made in this case, directed to the officers and soldiers of the militia, informing them as to what their rights and duties were in the matter; that they were not to interfere in any instance unless called upon by the civil authorities, and that if they did interfere they would be held amenable to martial law.

Notwithstanding these precautions on the part of the authorities, there was interference in some parts of that district from a portion of the armed militia of the State; and as that interference was, in the opinion of the majority of the committee, being all directed against the contestant, they held that the election was a nullity, and came to the conclusion to refer both candidates back to the people, that a fair and full expression of opinion might be given at the polls.

I now propose, in the first place, to have a portion of the evidence taken in this case read by the Clerk to this House, that the members may see from the evidence itself what the character and extent of this interference was. I will first have read, in reference to the interference in Buchanan county, the evidence of Samuel Ensworth, who was the sheriff of the county, who swore that he was a supporter of the sitting member, General Loan, that he attended the polls with the intention of voting for him, but that from the interference on the part of the militia, although he was invested with authority by law to keep the peace, he became entirely disgusted and came to the conclusion that the election in that locality at least was a mockery, and left the place without voting. I mention these facts particularly, because I see in the minority report that the evidence is said to be by the partisans of the contestant. The first evidence that I will ask the Clerk to read is that of a supporter of the respondent himself, the sheriff of the county, whose duty it was to keep the peace at the polls.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Samuel Ensworth, the sheriff of Buchanan county, who swore that he was a friend of the contestant, and had intended to vote for him, testified as follows:

"I was sheriff of the county of Buchanan, Missouri, and was at three different precincts of voting. I was two or three times at the Allen hotel. The votes were taken in a room with two doors, and the members of the militia guarded each door with bayonets crossed; and to get the privilege to go to the polls I had to ask the permission of the judges, although it was my duty to attend at the election and superintend the same. I did not then see any other interference. I was at the polls at the market-house, which was after the disturbance commenced. I started up the stairs. At the head of the stairs was a person in the uniform of the militia. The old man Langston came up the opposite stairs. Langston had a ticket in his hand, and the person in uniform asked him to see his ticket. Langston handed him his ticket; he took the ticket and tore it up, and drove Langston down. There was considerable commotion about the market house. I went into the room where votes were taken, and the place of voting was surrounded by a crowd of excited persons, and some seemed afraid to present their votes, and so stated to me; but persons who favored the election of the nominees had no fears, nor seemed to dread any danger from offering to vote. In the excited crowd, and those that intimidated the persons from voting, were Union clothed soldiers. I was not at the court house until after the voting there was discontinued. But when I was at the court-house the place seemed to be under the control of a set of persons who belonged to the militia, with their arms.

"About nine or ten o'clock in the morning I saw one of these militia have a young man who was reading in my office in custody, marching him off to the guard-house. I wanted to know the reason of his arrest. He said he was ordered to arrest all persons who voted, if they had been enrolled under Order 24. I went to the place where he was put under guard; there I saw the officer of the day. He said he was ordered by Colonel Severance to have all such persons arrested."

Mr. GANSON. This Colonel Severance was a candidate for State Senator in the State, and was associated on the same ticket with the sitting member.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the evidence of Samuel Ensworth, as follows:

"While I was there the orders came and ordered the release of the prisoners, which was done. After dinner, and visiting the precincts at the court-house and market-house, I came to the conclusion that there could not be any full, fair, or free expression of opinion at the polls, and did not look after the election, and did not vote, and advised others that it was useless to vote."

"I think there were at least one thousand votes that were not taken on account of improper influences brought to bear against the voters."

"In the morning, or soon after the polls were opened at the market-house, when but few votes were taken, Hugh Louthen and several others applied there to have their votes enrolled, and offered to take the conventional oath. One of the judges objected, and said Louthen insisted upon his right to vote; and one of the judges told him that if he voted he would be arrested. He still said he would vote, and did vote, and I think he was arrested. I cannot say that I saw any one turned off, nor any other intimidation there."

Question. How did you intend to vote between Bruce and Loan?

Answer. I should have voted for Mr. Loan." (Pages 1, 12, and 13.)

Mr. GANSON. I desire the Clerk to read the affidavit of Cyrus E. Kemp, clerk of election at St. Joseph, Buchanan county.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Cyrus E. Kemp, clerk of election at St. Joseph, in Buchanan county, testifies as follows:

"I was clerk at the election at the court-house precinct on the 4th of November, 1862, at which Benjamin F. Loan and John P. Bruce were candidates for Congress. The election proceeded pretty quietly until about one o'clock. At that time a band of enrolled militiamen entered the court-house, at which time the voters then present dispersed. The judges left the table. I handed my book to Mr. George Merlatt, one of the judges of the election. I saw nothing more of the book until it was returned by Captain Hax, officer of the day, and General Willard P. Hall. The poll-book was returned in about one half hour after it was taken. The polls were then again opened, and new judges appointed by the bystanders, under the direction of the sheriff. The election then proceeded quietly for about one half hour. There was a great crowd around the table at that time of persons who had been sworn before voting. Just at this time another company of the enrolled militia, armed, about twenty in number, came into the room and closed around the table, and forced the voters back and scattered them in all directions. Some of them jumped out of the windows. The judges also immediately left the table, and I could not conceal the poll-book in time to prevent the militiamen from destroying it by tearing it to pieces. The militiamen seized my poll-book while I was yet sitting at the table, and tore it into strips and threw it on the floor. They had muskets in their hands. The election was then broken up for the second time, and the polls were not any more reopened at the court-house."

Question. State if you know about how many votes had been taken at that precinct prior to the destruction of the poll-books.

Answer. I cannot tell exactly, but think there had been about one hundred votes polled.

Question. If you have any knowledge, state how those votes were cast as between John P. Bruce and Benjamin F. Loan, candidates for Congress.

Answer. I think about nine tenths of those votes were cast for John P. Bruce."

On his cross-examination this witness testified:

"There were about twenty who had been sworn and ready to vote. I do not know for certain who they were going to vote for, but my impression was that they were going to vote for John P. Bruce. Just at this time the company of enrolled militia entered the room, and the voters all left the table, being crowded away by the militia, and thus prevented from voting. This was at the time the poll-books were torn up."

Question. Did any of these twenty men say to you or the judges of election who they were going to vote for for Congress.

Answer. They did not.

Question. Then why do you state that it was your impression that these twenty men were going to vote for said John P. Bruce?

Answer. Simply because the votes were all being cast for John P. Bruce at that time, and that is what I based my impression upon; and I think it was a very correct impression.

Question. How do you know that these twenty men you speak of were legally qualified voters?

Answer. I do not know anything about that; but the judges were willing for them to vote, and that they had taken the conventional oath."

Mr. GANSON. I ask the Clerk now to read the affidavit of James A. Matney, one of the judges of election, upon the same point.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"James A. Matney, one of the judges of the election at the court house in St. Joseph, Buchanan county, testified as follows:

"About one o'clock on the day of the election I came up to the court-house precinct for the purpose of voting. When I came there I found no judges of the election. The clerks were present with their poll-books, also quite a number of persons who seemed to be anxious to vote. After some time spent the crowd of voters proceeded to elect judges from the bystanders, selecting James B. O'Toole, Robert Clark, and myself as said judges, and were duly qualified by the clerk of the county court to proceed with the election. After five or six votes were taken and entered on the poll books by the clerks, from fifteen to twenty-five armed men entered, in the dress of the enrolled militia of the State of Missouri, armed with muskets, or such other weapons as the State of Missouri furnished her soldiers, with fixed bayonets. When they entered the room the first word I heard was, 'Get away from here; get out from here.' I took it that language was addressed to the crowd of voters around the polls, and they so understood it by their actions, as they left as quick as they could get away. As soon as the voters left, and as soon as these armed men could reach the table where the poll-books were lying, they seized the poll-books and tore them to pieces. The crowd of voters being dispersed, there was no further effort made to vote at the court-house precinct that evening."

"Without any intimidation or threats prior to or on the day of the election, there would have been between eight hundred and one thousand more votes polled at the November election, 1862, in Buchanan county, in my judgment."

Mr. GANSON. I ask the Clerk next to read the deposition of John Scott:

"John Scott testifies as to interference at the market-house precinct, in St. Joseph, as follows:

"I attended the election aforesaid at St. Joseph, in Buchanan county. I voted at the market-house precinct early after the polls were opened. Some hours afterwards I was told that the military were interfering at that precinct. I immediately went there to see for myself. The soldiers, without arms, except side-arms, were there in considerable numbers, and they were preventing any one from approaching the polls except such as they were satisfied would vote the ticket called the unconditional Union ticket, on which was the name of Benjamin F. Loan, for Congress. If men insisted on voting the ticket called the Union ticket, on which the name of John P. Bruce appeared for Congress, he was forcibly ejected from the room by the soldiers, and in some instances I saw them kicked down the stairs, and otherwise abused. In the afternoon I was at the court-house precinct, and while there I saw some fifteen or twenty armed soldiers approach with bayonets fixed. They cleared the ante-room, and marched into the room where the polls were opened, and drove the voters out, and, as I was informed, tore up the poll-books." (Page 39.)

Mr. GANSON. I next desire the deposition of Benjamin Cunningham.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Benjamin C. Cunningham testifies as to arrests, &c., at the market-house precinct, as follows:

"I went down to the market-house with the intention of voting for John P. Bruce for Congress, but was prevented by persons dressed in the garb of soldiers. I was standing at the market-house precinct, and I think about three men, dressed in the garb of soldiers, said that the election should stop, and put all the voters and everybody out of the house. I went back the second time to vote, and was arrested and taken to the guard-house; after a few moments I was released, and I did not attempt to vote any more.

Question. What party seemed to be making this disturbance, the friends of B. F. Loan or John P. Bruce?

Answer. I think they were the friends of Mr. Loan.

Question. What do you think would have been the difference in the election if it had been conducted fairly?

Answer. I think that John P. Bruce would have gotten eight hundred or one thousand more votes if the election had been conducted fairly." (Page 43.)

Mr. GANSON. I desire the Clerk next to read the testimony of John J. Abell, for the purpose, among other things, of showing to the House that persons were furnished with a list of names containing eight hundred or one thousand persons who were to be deprived of the right of voting if possible; that many persons went there, read their names on that list and were deterred from voting by the threat of being disturbed at the polls.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"John J. Abell testified as to disturbances at the market-house as follows:

"I am a resident of St. Joseph, Missouri, and have been for nine years, and am engaged in selling drugs in this city. I attended the election in November, 1862, for Congressmen and other officers. Soon after the polls were opened I started to the market-house to vote. I then heard that persons were being arrested for voting. I went to General Hall, who was in command, and told him that they were arresting persons, which he expressed great surprise. I told him that I wanted to vote, but I did not want to be kept in the guard-house or jail. I then went and offered to vote, and there was considerable hesitation with the judges whether they would receive my vote or not; but they did receive my vote, and as soon as I voted the guard arrested me. I asked him why he arrested me. He then showed me a printed list of between eight and nine hundred names. My name was on that list, and he was ordered to arrest all whose names were on that list. I asked him who gave him such authority. He said by order of Captain Hax, who was officer of the day. I was then taken to the guard-house, where I found eight others; and myself and the others received a great deal of abuse from a parcel of Germans who were on guard there. When I went to General Hall he told me that if I was arrested to let him know. When I was taken by the guard I wrote to General Hall that myself and eight others were confined in the guard house for voting. He sent down and had us released. On leaving the guard-house I picked up one of the lists of those who were to be arrested if they attempted to vote, and have got it yet. It was soon rumored around that I had the list of those who were to be arrested for voting, and persons were calling nearly all day to see if their names were on the list, and if they were they did not attempt to vote, saying that they did not wish to be interrupted. I have no doubt that all those who were on that list were the friends of John P. Bruce, and I think that the most of them would have voted for John P. Bruce if there had been a fair, peaceable election. After I went to General Hall I went and voted. He told me that he wanted to know if they were arresting men for voting, and I wrote to him as I have already stated. I think that those who created the disturbance were the friends of B. F. Loan."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, notifying the House that the Senate had passed a bill (No. 162) amending an act to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the progress of the useful arts," approved March 3, 1863; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

MISSOURI CONTESTED ELECTION—AGAIN.

Mr. GANSON. I ask the Clerk next to read the testimony of Thomas Culligan.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Thomas Culligan testifies as to the extent of the interference at St. Joseph, as follows:
"I am a citizen of St. Joseph, Missouri, and have been for thirteen years, and am forty-one years old, and am a clerk in a banking house; have been a member of the enrolled militia, and served four months. I was present at the election held in November, 1863, for Congressman and other officers in Buchanan county, Missouri; and as I was going to the court-house to vote I met the judges of the election coming from the court-house, and understood from them that the election at that precinct was broken up by the soldiers. I was in the enrolled militia at that time. I had my ticket filled, and intended to vote for John P. Bruce for Congress, and did not attempt to vote at any other precinct on account of the interference of the militia and others. Those who were the friends of B. F. Loan created the disturbance, and prevented myself and others from voting by intimidation. The intimidation kept a great many from voting, who, I believe, would have voted for John P. Bruce. In the opinion of many persons, John P. Bruce's election would have been effected by eight hundred or a thousand voters who did not come to the polls on account of the intimidation. I saw a good many persons arrested, and understood that they were arrested for attempting to vote."

Mr. GANSON. I will next ask the Clerk to read the testimony of Edward J. Knapp.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Edward J. Knapp testifies as follows:

"At the Allen House, in the first ward, I saw an old man, John Cowie, seventy-five years of age, a lawful voter for forty years, and a peaceable, quiet man, went up to the polls, presented his vote to the judges; the judges commenced calling off his vote, and a member of the enrolled militia, a German, with his uniform on, stepped up and took Mr. Cowie by the back of the neck or coat and jerked him over on to the floor, and the first place struck was his head and shoulders, and the blood gushed from his nose from the fall. Mr. Cowie was then voting what was then called here the Democratic ticket."

Mr. GANSON. It is impossible, of course, for the committee to determine accurately the precise number of persons who were prevented from voting at St. Joseph by reason of these disturbances. The House will bear in mind that there had been a high state of excitement in Missouri, and certainly in that portion of the State, in consequence of which no election had been held since the rebellion commenced until then. During the intervening time they had been living under a provisional government, and the condition of the public mind was such that whenever any threats of violence were used it would be communicated from one person to another more rapidly than in ordinary times of peace and tranquillity; and the effect would be greater. Persons there during these disturbances had been subjected improperly to arrests; property had been improperly destroyed, and the people were in a condition of being easily and readily intimidated. And we can all see that transactions of this character would have a greater effect in the way of intimidating the people than they would have done in ordinary times.

The committee, however, for the purpose of throwing some light on this subject, have appended a statement showing what the comparative vote was in 1860, which was the last election prior to this election in 1862, in order to show that there was a great falling off in St. Joseph where these disturbances took place in comparison with the falling off in the other portions of the county where disturbances did not occur. The vote for President in this county in 1860 was 3,979. The vote for Congressman in 1862 was 2,268. The falling off of vote in 1862 was 1,711. That was in the entire county. Now, I propose next to show what portion of that falling off was in St. Joseph. The vote at St. Joseph for President in 1860 was 2,420. The vote at St. Joseph for Congressman in 1862 was 910. The falling off of the vote in the township in 1862 was 1,510. Now, the vote outside of Washington township, embracing the remainder of Buchanan county, where there was comparatively slight interference, was, for President in 1860, outside of Washington township, 1,559; for Congressman in 1862 in the same territory, 1,366; falling off in that place only, in 1862, 193.

Now, then, I will next make a comparison between the vote in 1860, when the contestant ran for the Legislature, and his vote in 1862, when he ran for Congress. John P. Bruce received in 1860, 1,585. John P. Bruce, for Congress in 1862, received 635. The falling off in his vote in 1862 was 950. Gentlemen will see that this tends to show where the decrease in the vote as against the contestant was, and that it was produced by this improper interference. Washington township, which embraces all the precincts in the city of St. Joseph, gave Bruce in 1860 1,074 votes; and the vote for him in 1862 for Congress was 158, showing a falling off in that township alone of 916 votes. By these figures, with slight variation, the committee were compelled to come to the conclusion it has. By these opinions expressed by the sheriff, by the extent of these interferences, and by these comparisons, the committee has been compelled to come to the conclusion that by this intimidation and interference a decrease as against the contestant in that township alone was created to the extent of over 900 votes. I have no doubt that that conclusion is less than the fact was; but we desired to be careful in making our estimate. We predicated it upon these facts in connection with the opinion of persons holding official positions, of judges and the sheriff, which all tend to the same point.

The falling off in the balance of the county outside of Washington township was only 34, between the vote for Mr. Bruce in 1860 when he ran for the Legislature and in 1862 when he ran for Congress. There was no interference against him in 1862 in the balance of the county. The falling off in the balance of the county was only 34, whereas the falling off elsewhere was 916 votes. Mr. Speaker, the committee were of the opinion that the conclusion at which we have arrived in this respect is reliable, and if erroneous in any respect it is in putting the number too low rather than too high.

I will next take up the interference in Andrew county. I ask the Clerk to read the testimony of Hamilton Smith, who voted for the sitting member. And I call the attention of the House to the insinuation that the contestant's case here was supported by partisan witnesses.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Hamilton Smith, who voted for the contestee, testifies in regard to the election at Savannah, as follows: I was at Savannah, the county seat of Andrew county, Missouri, on the day of the election referred to. I was frequently at the voting place during the time that it was there; there was a crowd around the window, keeping up a continual noise and confusion, and saying that they would not allow secessionists to vote. I saw a Mr. Hosford, a qualified voter, go to the window, and while being sworn an individual of said crowd was stamping on his pocket he was crowded back from the window and was not allowed to vote. I saw his ticket; he was going to vote for John P. Bruce for Congress. I saw another individual pushed away from said polls by the crowd aforesaid; this last named individual was by the name of McCrury. I applied to the judges of said election to maintain order, and I also applied to Lieutenant Colonel Commanding Nash, of the enrolled militia, to maintain order; said Nash stated that if called upon by the civil authorities he would do so, if he could, but doubted whether he would be able to maintain law and order on that day.

"Question 2. To whose election to Congress was the crowd who were thus interfering with voters favorable, from what you heard them say?

"Answer 3. So far as I could learn, they were for General Loan.

"Question 4. How often were you at the polls at Savannah, on the day of the election?

"Answer 4. Six or eight times.

"Question 5. Did or did not the crowd alluded to above continue the aforesaid interference with voters at the several times you were at the polls?

"Answer 5. They did.

"Question 6. Did you see any friend of John P. Bruce interfere with any one desiring to vote for B. F. Loan?

"Answer 6. I did not.

"Question 7. Do you know the character of the crowd that was interfering with voters on said day at the polls?

"Answer 7. They were mostly enrolled militia.

"Question 8. Do you know that there were many voters who came to Savannah on that day to vote who did not vote on account of the interference of said crowds?

"Answer 8. I do.

"Question 9. State, from what you know and saw at the polls, whether or not it was not difficult for a man who wanted to vote for John P. Bruce to do so.

"Answer 9. So far as I know, it was.

"Question 10. State, from what you know and saw, whether the enrolled militia around the polls offered any objections to voters voting for Benjamin F. Loan.

"Answer 10. They did not.

"Question 11. Was it not your understanding that the intimidating language, and the remarks by the crowd that they should not vote, applied to persons who would have voted for John P. Bruce if they had not been thus deterred from voting?

"Answer 11. As far as I know, it was.

"Question 12. Do you know of any person who had returned from Price's army, or any other rebel officer's command, offering to vote on the day of said election?

"Answer 12. I do not.

"Question 13. Are not many persons of your acquaintance, of the class alluded to by you as reputed rebel sympathizers, loyal citizens, for the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was?

"Answer 13. My opinion is, that a large mass of those who are reputed as rebel sympathizers are loyal, and for the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was.

"Question 14. Are not Democrats and conservative men in this section very often denominated as rebel sympathizers?

"Answer 14. They are.

"Question 15. Are you personally acquainted with John P. Bruce, the contestant, and have you had an opportunity of learning his politics; and if so, do you regard him as having been, during these troubles, and being now, a loyal Union man?

"Answer 15. I am acquainted with him, and have always considered him loyal."

Mr. GANSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to have any more of the testimony read on this county. What has been read from Mr. Smith, it will be seen comes from one of the supporters of the sitting member. He gives his opinion of the loyal character of the men who supported the contestant; and when the Clerk read that part where he states that they are reputed to be rebel sympathizers, when they are really for the Union, I noticed it provoked a smile in a portion of the House. It is not the first time, sir, that I have seen that smile whenever any reference was made to the Constitution, and therefore I am not surprised at it. It is true that many of the sons of Missouri may still adhere to "the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was," and they are regarded for so doing as rebel sympathizers. But that is no reason why the armed militia should deprive them of the elective franchise. If it is a good reason why they should not vote, it ought to be embodied in the law and made the duty of the judges of the election to test the standing of the voter by putting to him the oath. It ought to be done in a legal way and not by force and by violence.

Now, the only testimony taken in Andrew county in reference to interference was that which took place in Savannah precinct. There was a slight allusion to Fillmore precinct. The vote for President in 1860 in Savannah precinct, Andrew county, was 866, and the vote for Congressman in 1862 at the same place was 330, making the falling off at this precinct alone in 1862, 536. In Fillmore precinct the vote for President in 1860 was 306, and the vote for Congressman at the same place in 1862 was 142, making a falling off at this precinct in 1862, 164 votes. The entire vote of Andrew county for President in 1860 was 1,912, and the vote for Congressman in 1862 was 1,112, showing that the falling off in the entire county was 800. I call the attention of the House particularly to the fact that while the falling off in the entire county was 800, it was in the precinct of Savannah alone 536 votes. Upon that, together with other testimony in the case, the opinion is predicated that the falling off was occasioned by this violence, which is proved to have taken place in that precinct. I have had only a portion of the testimony read on that point.

I next come to Livingston county, and I ask the Clerk to read the testimony of Jacob L. Myers, to be found on page 19 of the report.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Jacob L. Myers, who was the clerk of the election at the Chillicothe precinct, testifies as follows:

"I was chosen by the county judges as clerk of that election at Chillicothe precinct, and acted as such on the morning of the election; early in the day I saw Doctor Hughes putting up posters, on which was, 'That no disloyal person should vote.' Fearing that a difficulty would likely originate from this thing, I did not want to act as clerk; the judges insisted I should, and I did; we opened the polls, and some votes were taken, when Dr. Hughes interfered, challenging votes; the judges got into a controversy with said Hughes, and wanted to know on what grounds he objected; they told him they had the ordinance of the convention to go by, and the oath therein prescribed to administer to voters, and they had no right to reject any man that would take this oath; Hughes then gave the judges to understand that there would be a squad of men here to see that none but loyal men, such as he claimed to be, should vote; in a few minutes the squad of men were right in our midst; Lieutenant Colonel Jacobson, of the twenty-seventh Missouri regiment, at the head of some twelve or fourteen men, armed and equipped with United States muskets, gave the judges to understand that no man, or no set of men, should vote that was disloyal to their Government; at that time we were recording James Hutchinson's vote; said Hughes challenged his vote, and Lieutenant Colonel Jacobson ordered Hutchinson to get out of the house, that he should not vote; said Hutchinson called on said Hughes to bring up any charge where he was disloyal; Hughes replied that he (Hutchinson) sympathized with or aided bushwhackers, or was aiding the party opposed to the Government; Lieutenant Colonel Jacobson then ordered his squad to put Hutchinson out of the house, which they did; that being the case, the judges notified Lieutenant Colonel Jacobson that they were the judges, and acting under oath, and protested against his actions, and demanded of him and his squad to retire, or they would adjourn the election; he would not do it, and the judges postponed the election for the time being; Colonel Shanklin, of the enrolled militia, requested the judges to hold on, that he would telegraph to the Governor; we waited a space of time; the squad of soldiers remained in the house in a threatening attitude toward the judges and clerks, and talking of making them take votes; after a while I folded up my poll-book and put it in my pocket; a dispatch came from the Governor, after a while, requesting Lieutenant Colonel Jacobson and his squad to withdraw; after the said Lieutenant Colonel read it they retired; Doctor Hughes became insulted and left with them, at least I thought he was insulted. After that we opened the polls, and voting commenced.

"Question. What effect had the aforesaid interference on the voters, from what you saw and knew?"

"Answer. It created a great excitement, and prevented a great many from voting, through fear."

Mr. LOAN. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York what part of the testimony of Samuel sets forth the facts he has read here? As I have no recollection of having seen it, I would be glad to have him point it out.

Mr. GANSON. The contestant will hunt it up, and point it out to the gentleman.

There is other testimony of the judges here, to the same point as that just read, but it will consume too much time to have it all read. But the House will see that this Dr. Hughes, who I believe was an editor there, the publisher of a newspaper, had posted up there a notice that no disloyal person should vote or appear at the polls; and he gave the judges to understand that there would be a squad of men there to see that none but loyal men, such as he claimed to be, should vote. He was having the law administered according to his own notions.

Now, the interference there was of such a character that the judges for a time discontinued the voting, and closed the polls until they could telegraph the Governor of the State to get an order from him that the military under the superintendence of this editor, Dr. Hughes, should be taken away from the polls. Now, any one can see what the effect of this state of things would be. It would disgust all sensible and patriotic men, and they would not attend any polls conducted in that manner. We consequently see that at this precinct alone, in 1860, the vote for President was 619, while the vote for Congressman in 1862 was 265; showing a falling off in 1862 of 354 votes. In the next year, 1863, an election was held there for supreme court judges. We all know that a judicial election is not as fully attended as a political one. At that election there were cast at that precinct 512 votes, while the vote for Congressman the year before was 265; showing an increase in the year 1863 of 247 votes. Now, the vote of the whole county, in 1863, for supreme court judges, was only 963, while the vote of the whole county for Congressman, in 1862, was 683; the difference in favor of 1863 being 280 votes. Of that increased vote of 280 for the entire county, 247 came from this precinct where this interference is proven to have taken place. It shows, as a majority of the committee thought, that the interference at this precinct was of a serious character, and they would regret exceedingly to see the conduct which there took place approved by the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

I take up Atchison county next, and ask the Clerk to read a portion of the testimony of Silas Puryear, to be found on page 21 of the report.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Question. State the reasons why you did not take the depositions."

"Answer. The reasons are partially given in the letters above referred to. I heard, on several occasions, that said Bruce would not be allowed to take depositions in said case; that if he came for that purpose he would be mobbed. These threats, I understood, were by A. B. Durfee, Esq. I also heard threats of mobbing any one who would act as his counsel. Notwithstanding, I spoke to Jacob Hughes and William Sparks, the two justices of the peace, who promised to attend and take the depositions, but the day before the day for taking said depositions Sparks informed me he would not act; that the militia would not permit the taking; that when witnesses came they would be spattered with rotten eggs. I then went to see Judge Needles, who promised to attend if well enough. On my return to Rockport I was informed there was a notice posted up requiring me to leave the county on pain of being hung if found in the county next day. After reflecting on all the circumstances and threats, I was convinced that the depositions could not be taken, and that to attempt to do so would result in the witnesses being abused, and perhaps endanger their lives. The witnesses were mostly old men and the best men in the county, and I thought it was best not to endanger nor expose them to insult when nothing could be accomplished by so doing.

"Question. Did you, at any time on the day of said November election in 1862, or after the same, converse with the witnesses whose depositions John P. Bruce desired you to take in regard to the election aforesaid?"

"Answer. I conversed with some of said witnesses on the day of election, and with some of them afterwards."

"Question. State, from what they told you, what you would have been able to prove by those you conversed with."

"Answer. I expected to prove, by several of them, that they were rudely thrust away from the polls, both at Rockport and at other voting places in the county; that they saw the polls guarded by bands of military, both at Rockport and at other voting places in said county; and that a great many legal voters were prevented and deterred from voting by the improper conduct of said militia; and that, in their opinion, John P. Bruce lost, by such interference, about three hundred votes in said county. This is what I expected to prove from the conversation I had with the witnesses."

"Question. State, from conversing with the witness and others, if the interference of the militia was not carried on at all the voting places in the county pretty much in the same way it was at Rockport."

"Answer. I understood that the same kind of interference was carried on at all of the voting places in said Atchison county, except at Irish Grove precinct and at Linden. At Linden I understood the attempt was made, but prevented by Thomas Shrack."

"ROCKPORT, March 5, 1863."

"DEAR SIR: I have just returned from Judge Needles'. I found him not well, but he promised to come up to-morrow if well enough. I am more than ever convinced that we cannot take the testimony. On returning this evening, I was informed that a notice was posted up requiring me to leave the county before to-morrow, threatening me with death if found in the county after that time. Under all the circumstances I shall not attempt to take depositions, as to do so would only result in having myself and the witnesses abused."

"Yours truly,

"JOHN P. BRUCE, Esq."

Mr. GANSON. This portion of the testimony is not regarded as evidence to bear upon the direct issue, but it is simply put in for the purpose of showing that the contestant could not, from certain portions of his district, get testimony to establish his case without danger to himself or his agents.

In Atchison county the vote in Clay township, which is in Rockport precinct, for President in 1860 was 366, and for Congressman in 1862, when the interference took place, 134, showing a falling off in this precinct of 232. Now, the vote in Clark township, which adjoins, for President in 1860 was 59, and the vote in the same township for Congressman in 1862, there being no interference there, was 59. This shows that the falling off of 232 votes in the Clay township at the Rockport precinct was attributed and could be ascribed to nothing else than the military and improper interference at the polls.

Take another precinct: the vote in Benton township for President in 1860 was 40, and for Congressman in 1862 was 36, showing a falling off of only four.

I would call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. Loan,] in answer to the interrogatory he put to me a few moments ago, to page 82 of the published papers in the case, where he will find the answer to his question in the seventh reply of Mr. Samuel.

Mr. LOAN. Will the gentleman read answer four of that same witness?

Mr. GANSON. I will when it comes in the order of my remarks.

I next take up the vote of De Kalb county, and ask the Clerk to read the evidence of John C. Brooks, to be found on page 23 of the report.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"John C. Brooks, who was constable of Washington township, and superintended the election, testifies as follows:

"I attended at Stewartsville, the voting place for Washington township, in De Kalb county, Missouri, at the said election, and was constable, as the law made it my duty to superintend the same. During the time of the election I saw two men driven from the polls by the enrolled militia, to wit, Harrison Boaz and George W. Rose. The soldiers told Harrison Boaz and Rose that they could not vote, and had to get away from the polls. It being my duty as a civil officer to keep the peace, I made efforts throughout the day to see that every qualified voter had access to the polls. During the whole time I met with opposition from the captain of the company of the enrolled militia, whose efforts were all made in favor of Loan, and to prevent all persons from voting the Bruce ticket. I am satisfied that the captain ordered his men to take one vote from me while William Moore was writing his ticket, and afterwards they brought up the same man with a Loan ticket and coerced him to vote different. The man told me to make out his ticket for Bruce, as he wanted to vote for him. This statement was made to me before the soldiers took him away."

"Question. State your opinion from all the facts that came to your knowledge, how many voters were prevented from voting by intimidation or interference by the enrolled militia or others with the polls, and with voters from voting on the 4th day of November, 1862, at the election in De Kalb county, Missouri."

"Answer. I cannot say exactly how many voters were thus prevented, but I am satisfied that if there had been no interference with the election in 1862, John P. Bruce would have carried De Kalb county by a majority of over one hundred votes for Congress."

Mr. GANSON. I desire to say a few more words in this case. I want to dispose of it to-day, as I have to leave to-morrow morning. I ask unanimous consent to have my time extended for ten minutes.

No objection was made.

Mr. GANSON. I now ask the Clerk to read from page 24 the testimony of Harrison Boaz.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"M. Harrison Boaz testifies as follows:

"I did attend the election at Stewartsville on said day, and had been engaged all day in bedding the cars for cattle to be shipped off on the Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad, and in the evening came in to vote with a ticket with the name of John P. Bruce for Congress on it; and when I presented myself at the polls John Crowley, a member of Captain McDonald's enrolled militia, said to me, 'What are you coming here for?' I replied, 'To vote.' He said, 'God damn you, leave, or I will knock you out,' and he drew his fist back to hit me. There were by at the time about ten or twelve men of the enrolled militia; some of them with side arms. I got away from them as quick as I could, and did not come down into town that evening any more. This was the first time I was ever prevented from voting before, and I said I believed that I never would try to vote any more. I should have voted for John P. Bruce for Congress if the enrolled militia had not thus interfered."

"Question. Did you know or hear of any interference on the part of the friends of John P. Bruce to prevent persons from voting for Loan or Branch for Congress?"

"Answer. I did not."

"Question. Do you know of any particular reason why you were prevented from voting?"

"Answer. None, unless that I was going to vote for John P. Bruce. I had always been as loyal to the Union as any man in the State."

Mr. GANSON. I now ask the Clerk to read from page 25 the testimony of George W. Rose, in answer to the third question put to him.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Answer. I was at Stewartsville at the said election, and in the evening went toward the voting place with the intention, and a ticket, to vote for John P. Bruce; before the door of the house where the election was held two members of the enrolled militia were posted, with sabers and pistols, apparently guarding the door; they were acquaintances of mine, to wit, Samuel Chenoweth and Robert Ellis. So soon as they saw me coming to the door they remarked, there comes one of the 'Bruce men,' and said to me that I could not vote there at these polls for John P. Bruce for Congress. I commenced reasoning with them; and insisting upon my right to vote, I told them they were acting out of their sphere of duty; they replied that it was no use to talk about it—I could not vote; not that they had any objection to me; that they knew how I was going to vote, and that was enough. I found it was useless to persist, as I was unwilling to force a passage through a guard who had sabers and pistols. I should have voted for John P. Bruce for Congress if I had been allowed to get to the polls."

Mr. GANSON. I will not take up the time of the House by having any more of the testimony read.

As has been stated to the House, this is the first election that occurred in Missouri since the commencement of the rebellion. The State affairs had been administered by a provisional governor since the fore part of August, 1861. In the spring or summer of 1862 a State convention was in session, which, among other things, prescribed an additional qualification for office-holders and voters in that State by requiring them to take an oath that they had not been engaged in the rebellion since December, 1861, or had given aid and comfort to the enemy. Provision was also made for electing judges of election. The ordinance of the convention, the constitution of the State, and the laws of the State prescribe what the duty of these judges was. They were a legally constituted body to preside at the election, to determine who were qualified voters and who were not. They were officers of the law. They were amenable to the law for a proper discharge of their duty, and a violation of it would entail upon them heavy penalties and severe punishment. It was their duty under the ordinance of the convention to administer to any person who came to the polls this new oath prescribed as a condition precedent to the right of any person to exercise the elective franchise, and if any person took that oath the law did not vest in any individual the right to deprive him of his privilege as a citizen to cast his ballot. The law did not vest that power in any "enrolled militia" of the State, or in any Dr. Hughes, or any other individual in Missouri. The law had provided a proper legal tribunal, amenable to the law for the proper discharge of their duty. If that duty was not properly discharged, if people who ought not to have voted were permitted by them to vote, or if persons entitled to vote were deprived of that right, they violated the law, and could be punished.

Now I desire to say to the House that these scandalous interferences with elections, in these times, ought not to be countenanced, but ought to be discountenanced. If the action of the enrolled militia of Missouri upon this occasion is countenanced by this House, blood will be shed at every poll in that State at the next election, because the House will thus declare to that people that an election carried by force and intimidation is legal and will meet with the approval of Congress. If this House is to commit any error upon this subject, that error should be in nullifying rather than sustaining an election which comes here covered, as this does, with evidence of improper interference and of direct violence and force.

Mr. UPSON. Mr. Speaker, in the present situation of our country the principles involved in this contested election assume an interest and importance far exceeding that of ordinary election contests. It is of the highest concern to loyal citizens in the border States to know whether in these times of civil commotion and rebellion, while civil war is raging in our country and treason is lurking in their midst, they can be allowed to provide for the safe and secure exercise of the elective franchise; whether they can be permitted under the authority of either the national or State government to protect themselves at the polls from rebel attack, intrusion, interference, or miscegenation, or whether they are to be compelled to place themselves wholly at the mercy or forbearance of disloyal men, and to allow rebels and rebel sympathizers who have hitherto failed to overcome them by a resort to the cartridge-box to take possession and control of the ballot-box, and either by violence prevent the holding of an election or by an unlawful and arbitrary or fraudulent exercise of the elective franchise make the elections subservient to the purposes of the rebellion.

A further interest attaches to this case from the fact that similar principles are more or less involved in the decision of several other contested-election cases, not only in Missouri, but in other of the border States, modified in each instance by the peculiar facts in evidence, and hence the decision arrived at in the case under consideration becomes as a precedent a matter of still greater practical importance.

A rebel or a rebel sympathizer at the polls may be more dangerous than in the ranks of the enemy, and the existence of the Government should not be permitted to be imperiled by allowing him either by violence or by fraud to defeat an election or to participate during the continuance of this rebellion in the exercise of the elective franchise, nor should his vehement outcries against the presence of a loyal military guard at the polls entitle him to be considered either as a suffering martyr or as a sincere advocate for the freedom and purity of the ballot-box.

In this contested case of Bruce vs. Loan, from the seventh district of Missouri, five members of the Committee of Elections, being a majority thereof, have in their report come to the conclusion that neither the contestant nor the sitting member is entitled to a seat in this House, and consequently that it must be referred back again to the people to hold a new election. The minority of the committee, however, consisting of four members, insist that a valid choice has been made, and that the sitting member is entitled to retain his seat. In this connection it may be proper to refer to the rule heretofore laid down in 1826 by the Committee of Elections in the case of Biddle and Richard vs. Wing, (Cl. and Hall, 506,) which report was subsequently acquiesced in by the House. It is as follows:

"In all cases of contested elections where the question depends upon matters of fact which are controverted by the parties much difficulty is to be expected in coming to a decision; and, where there is room for doubts, a disposition is often felt to return it to the people.

"This, however, ought not to be done when it is possible to ascertain what the true result has been. The elective privilege is a very important one, and ought to be held in the highest estimation.

"When a people, in the exercise of their constitutional rights, have gone through with the process of an election according to the prescribed rules, they ought not to be deprived of the advantages accruing therefrom but for the most substantial reasons. No doubts which are capable of being solved ought to be permitted to operate against them. Indeed, nothing short of the impossibility of ascertaining for whom the majority of votes has been given ought to vacate an election; more especially if, by such decision, the people must on account of their distant and dispersed situation necessarily be unrepresented for a long period of time."

This reasoning is as cogent and forcible now as it was then, and I have found in investigating the evidence in this case no good or sufficient reason for vacating the election, and am satisfied that a valid choice has been made.

The condition of Missouri and the events transpiring there since the breaking out of the rebellion form a part of the history of the country and of the war, and this House will take notice thereof without further reference to the particulars. We merely mention in passing that the Missouri State convention in providing for the holding of the election in question, conscious of the presence of disloyal men in the State, prescribed by ordinance, June 10, 1862, an oath to be taken by all voters before they should be allowed to vote, and among other things required the voter to swear therein that since the 17th day of December, 1861, he had not willfully taken up arms or levied war against the United States or against the provisional government of the State of Missouri. By General Order No. 24, issued by General Schofield August 4, 1862, which the report of the majority of the committee fails to notice, all the loyal men of Missouri subject to military duty were required to be organized into companies, regiments, and brigades, and all disloyal men and those who had at any time been rebel sympathizers were ordered to report themselves and be enrolled as such and to surrender their arms, and were to be permitted to remain at home so long as they should quietly attend to their ordinary and legitimate business and not in any way give aid or comfort to the enemy, and were not to be organized into companies nor required or permitted to do duty in the Missouri militia.

This Order No. 24 should be carefully borne in mind, as it is frequently alluded to in the testimony. The burden of the allegation in contestant's notice in this case is the alleged violent interference with and intimidation of voters at the polls by the Missouri State militia, preventing voters, as contestant claims, from voting for him who would have voted for him but for such interference or intimidation, and some eight counties are specified in which such interference and intimidation are charged to have taken place, but no names are given of persons so interfering or interfering with or intimidated, and no election precincts are named where such interference is claimed to have taken place.

It is not claimed by the contestant that he received a majority or a plurality of the votes actually cast at said election, but he avers or insists that he would have received a majority or plurality of the said votes had not his friends been thus interfered with, intimidated, and prevented from voting.

A like allegation or claim was set up in the case of Biddle and Richard vs. Wing, heretofore referred to, and it was met and answered by the committee in their report, as follows:

"The committee are of opinion that the duty assigned to them does not impose on them an examination of the causes which may have prevented any candidate from getting a sufficient number of votes to entitle him to the seat. They consider that it is only required of them to ascertain who had the greatest number of legal votes actually given at the election. An election is the act of selecting, on the part of the electors, a person for an office of trust. The inspectors of election are constituted judges of the qualifications of the electors, and exercise from necessity a discretionary power. If they err and reject a legal vote, or an elector from any cause should fail in presenting his vote for their reception, the nature of the case precludes it from entering into the consideration of the general result of the election, unless indeed corruption should appear sufficient to destroy all confidence in the purity and fairness of the whole proceeding. It is properly a question between these officers and the injured party; and the laws of the Territory in this case make ample provision for guarding the purity of the election, and for the punishment of offenses against the rights of the citizen in that respect. In case of the application of the contrary doctrine the greatest uncertainty must necessarily prevail; and should it be established, it would be placing in the hands of a few riotous individuals the power of defeating any election whatever.

"The law appoints a particular time and place for the expression of the public voice; when that time is past it is too late to inquire who did not vote, or the reason why.

"The only question now to be determined is for whom the greatest number of the legal votes have been given."

In the investigation of contested-election cases in England, before a parliamentary committee, when riotous interference or violence is alleged as a ground for setting aside or invalidating the election, the practice requires rigorous proof that the result of the election has been affected by riotous interruption or obstruction; and also when restraint or intimidation is set up, proof is required that an organized system of unlawful restraint or intimidation existed or was acted upon at the polls to prevent the freedom of election and to secure the defeat of the contestant.

Such a state of facts will hardly be claimed to be shown by the testimony taken in this case, nor is there any such rigorous proof of riotous or violent interference affecting the result of the election.

It has also been determined in the following contested-election cases, namely, Van Rensselaer vs. Van Allen, Lyman vs. Smith, Randolph vs. Jennings, and Bassett vs. Bayley, (Cl. and Hall, 73, 101, 240, and 254,) that where irregularities or illegalities were shown in the election in parts of a district affecting the votes cast, if it did not appear that a sufficient number were affected so as to change the result, the election would not be set aside, but the candidate who was shown to have received the majority or the greatest number of the legal votes would be held to have been elected.

Keeping in view these principles as applied to the investigation of contested elections, and also bearing in mind the allegations in contestant's notice in this case, let us proceed to the consideration of the facts which appear therein.

It is shown by the official returns that at the election in this seventh congressional district of Missouri, held on the 4th day of November, 1862, the whole number of votes cast was 13,803, of which Benjamin F. Loan, the sitting member, received 6,582; John P. Bruce, the contestant, received 4,554; and H. B. Branch received 2,665; one vote being given for S. A. Richardson, and one for R. M. Stewart. It thus appears that the majority or plurality of Loan the sitting member over Bruce the contestant is 2,028.

The seventh congressional district of Missouri is composed of the counties of Buchanan, Andrew, Holt, Atchison, Nodaway, Worth, Gentry, Harrison, Mercer, Grundy, Putnam, Sullivan, Livingston, Daviess, and De Kalb, being in all fifteen counties, and the contestant while alleging in his notice interference and intimidation in only eight of these fifteen counties does not claim to have offered any evidence as to the election in but five of them, namely, Atchison, Livingston, Andrew, De Kalb, and Buchanan, and in most of these counties evidence only as to one election precinct.

As to ten of the counties in the district, therefore, no attempt is made to impeach the election, while as to the other five counties, with one slight exception, only one township in each is in reality referred to or in the least affected by the so-called testimony offered by the contestant.

This fact of itself is sufficient to show the weakness and insufficiency of contestant's testimony, and to authorize us at the outset to insist that the evidence is too restricted in its scope, in the ground it professes or attempts to cover, to enable the contestant to support his allegations, and that, even if he should succeed in showing interference or intimidation in all of those townships, it could not by possibility have changed the result. But it remains to be seen whether he has sustained his allegations in any one or more of these townships.

But one witness testifies as to the election in Atchison county, and this one only as to the Rockport precinct. He saw a guard of militia at the court-house, but did not go in or attempt to go in and vote, and consequently knew nothing of the manner in which the election was actually conducted; yet he goes on to relate what various individuals with whom he conversed said to him, and what remarks he heard persons make, and from what he heard said he ventures an opinion as to the number of voters he thinks were prevented in that entire county from voting for contestant. And this is claimed as evidence for the contestant! There are eight election precincts in this county, and this veracious witness is the attorney or counsel employed by the contestant to procure evidence for him in this county, but failing to get any swears himself. Can such evidence be entitled to any serious consideration?

The aggregate vote for Congress in this county at this election was 675. The vote for judges in 1863 was only 633, being 42 less than in 1862, as is shown by the exhibits, while the aggregate vote of the county for President in 1860 was but 940, giving comparatively a very small margin of votes for the secession element which then existed there. It certainly cannot be insisted that there is any evidence to impeach the election in the county of Atchison.

As to the election in Livingston county, four witnesses testify in regard to one precinct in Chillicothe, and one as to Utica precinct, in Green township. From their testimony it would seem that a squad of Missouri soldiers commanded by a Lieutenant Colonel Jacobson, at Chillicothe, had some little difficulty on the morning of the election with a man named Hutchinson, at the polls, as to his voting, and also with the judges of election as to whether disloyal men should be allowed to vote, it being claimed that Hutchinson was disloyal; and the judges for a time, in consequence of Jacobson's conduct in this matter, refused to proceed with the election; and Jacobson caused Hutchinson to be taken out of the house. It further appears, however, that on telegraphing to Governor Gamble on the subject, he at once sent an order to Jacobson, and thereupon Jacobson and his men left; and the voting was resumed and went on without any other interruption, Hutchinson himself voting with the rest; and the whole delay did not exceed one hour. No person is shown to have been prevented from voting at this precinct.

As to the Utica precinct, it may be inferred from the testimony of the only witness produced that some soldiers from the twenty-seventh Missouri regiment, from Chillicothe, under Major Howe, came there in the morning as he said to guard the polls and see that no disloyal persons voted, and that the judges of election, on his so notifying them, consulted together and determined not to open the polls until they heard from Chillicothe. A reply was soon received from Chillicothe, and an order for Howe and his men to return, which they did, and the voting went on without interruption, the polls having been opened before the soldiers left. This was about noon.

But the witnesses called to show these facts are several of them far from being above suspicion. One of them, named John W. Garr, thus illustrates on cross-examination the nature of his loyalty:

"Question. Have you ever been a member of the militia of this county, and if not, for what reason?"

"Answer. I have not. I got a certificate of exemption as a sympathizer with the rebellion."

The contestant still insisting on the soundness of the loyalty of his witness, thereupon re-examines him as follows:

"Question. Have you not always been for the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was, and a friend of the Government?"

"Answer. I have always been a constitutional Union man, in favor of the old Constitution."

A sympathizer with the rebellion in Missouri is a "constitutional Union man!" I congratulate the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] who prides himself on this floor as being a "constitutional Union man," that we have here in Missouri found a member of his party, and a local exposition of its principles and its loyalty.

The most that can be claimed, from the testimony as to Utica and one precinct in Chillicothe, in Livingston county, is that at each poll for an hour or so the judges of election, on account of some disagreement with the military officer temporarily there, refused or declined to go on with the election. Nothing of interference with or intimidation of voters is shown; but it is fairly to be inferred that the judges were unwilling that there should be any military guard at the polls, and therefore waited to telegraph to the Governor and have the soldiers ordered away before they would proceed with the election; and the Governor seems to have humored these punctilious gentlemen in this respect, and the soldiers, as good and loyal citizens, promptly obeyed.

But it is the height of absurdity to claim or insist that there was military interference with or intimidation of voters in this county at this election to the prejudice of contestant. The testimony shows that there were seven election precincts in this county, and the witnesses only testify as to what occurred at two of these precincts, and at one of these—the Chillicothe precinct—the contestant received over three times as many votes as the sitting member, and in Greene, called also Utica, the other precinct, he received over six times as many votes as the sitting member did, and the official canvass shows that in this county of Livingston the contestant received more than twice the number of votes that were cast for General Loan, his opponent.

That this was originally a strong secession county, or has been much affected by the rebellion, is apparent from a comparison of the aggregate vote of different years. For President in 1860 it was 1,469; for Congress in 1862 it was 683; and for judges in 1863, 963. Of this vote for President in 1860 20 votes were cast for Lincoln, 401 for Douglas, 578 for Bell, and 470 for Breckinridge. Is it strange, then, that since the war this secession element in this county has withdrawn some voters from the polls? Is the contestant anxious for their votes? If not, why this parade in the evidence and in the report of the majority of the committee of the vote of 1860 as a basis of comparison? In Andrew county all of contestant's testimony is taken before the clerk of the circuit court, without notice and without authority, and the written objection of the sitting member to the taking of the testimony before such person precedes the depositions. The said clerk also styles himself recorder of the county, but he is only recorder of deeds, and not a judicial officer, and is not authorized to take depositions in such cases, and the whole testimony is objected to by the sitting member, and is manifestly illegal and cannot be received in the case. There is therefore no testimony before this House as to this county, the act of 1861 being clear and explicit as to the persons who are authorized to take depositions in such cases, and on this ground alone we might rest the case, so far as the consideration of the election here is concerned.

But while insisting upon this fatal objection to the testimony, we will look at it for a moment to see what it discloses. We notice that it is wholly confined to one precinct, the Savannah precinct, notwithstanding that there are eight election precincts in the county. From the whole depositions it may be inferred that there was quite a crowd of citizens at and around the polls at Savannah and some noise and confusion; that a portion of the crowd was composed of men wearing the militia uniform, but that they were not soldiers on duty, and that there was no military guard at the polls. That a few persons found it difficult to vote by reason of the crowd, or were hindered in attempting to vote, some of them claiming that they were pushed back from the polls, and that, as they think, it was because they were opposed to the unconditional Union ticket. That numbers in the crowd expressed themselves as opposed to secessionists and to allowing them to vote, but that the judges of election allowed every man to vote who offered to who was otherwise qualified and who would take the oath prescribed by the convention ordinance. It also appears that usually at almost every general election there is quite a crowd at and around the polls at Savannah, rendering it somewhat difficult to get up to the polls to vote. It further appears that at this time all the loyal men in Andrew county between the proper military ages were enrolled as militiamen and that numbers of them were in the habit of wearing every day and when not on duty clothing that had been furnished them as militiamen, and that no military guard was stationed at the polls. It is also stated in the testimony that some persons in the county staid away and would not come to the polls to vote, alleging as a reason that they would not take an oath unknown to the Constitution and laws of the country, or, in other words, that they were disloyal and would not take the oath prescribed by the convention ordinance. Will contestant charge the loyal militia with depriving him of these votes?

The presumption is strong that no serious interruption of voters took place here, as Lieutenant Colonel Nash, the officer in command of the local militia here, does not appear to have been applied to by the judges of election to protect the polls, although he had previously notified them that he would do so if necessary, should they call upon him and desire it. The entire vote of this county in 1862 was 1,112. The aggregate vote for judges in 1863 was only 1,218, a difference of only 106 votes. The vote for President in 1860 was 1,912, of which Mr. Lincoln received 97, Breckinridge 319, Douglas 819, and Bell 677.

These facts and comparisons show the strength of the secession element here at the breaking out of the rebellion, together with the deaths, removals, and other changes in the voting population wrought in such a community by the war. This is strikingly illustrated in the deposition of Joseph B. Nickel, in his answers to questions twenty-one and twenty-two on his cross-examination, found on page 91 of the printed evidence:

"Question 21. Has there not, since the November election, in 1860, been a great many persons left the county of Andrew, who are supposed to have joined the rebel army; and has there not been a large number of men from Andrew county who joined the Federal army; and have not many persons moved away from Andrew county since November, 1860; and were not the men, generally speaking, who went to the said armies absent from Andrew county on the 4th day of November last?"

"Answer 21. Since the November election in 1860, I think perhaps some four or five hundred men have left the county of Andrew, a part of whom are reported to have joined the rebel army, and a part of whom have joined the Federal army, and a part of whom have joined the State forces, and still another part of whom have removed from the county with their families. Of those who are reported to have joined the rebel army, I think a large majority of them have returned to the county; of those who joined the Federal army, I think perhaps half have returned; and of those who joined the State forces, comparatively few have returned. Of those who left the county with their families, their places mostly have been filled by others moving into this county from other counties and States. The most of those who moved into this county, referred to above, came here in the fall of 1861.

"Question 22. Does not the class of men who you think did not vote at said election, and who you think would, on a fair election, have voted for John P. Bruce, consist mainly of men who had returned from the rebel army, or had been arrested by military authority and imprisoned or put under bonds, or enrolled under Order No. 24, or were reputed to be secessionists or secession sympathizers?"

"Answer 22. The men above referred to consist partly of men who uniformly call themselves Democrats, and many of whom have been arrested and imprisoned by the military authorities at some time since 1860; partly of men who had at one time been in the State or Confederate army, and some of whom are now under military bonds; and partly of those who are said to be enrolled under Order No. 24. Of the last, there were but few at Savannah, comparatively. All three of the above classes are, by the Republican party, called rebels and rebel sympathizers."

And is this by the contestant's own testimony the class of guerrilla politicians whom he claims were hindered in the exercise of the elective franchise, or who would not come to the election to vote? I am glad that out in Missouri, where treason has culminated in open rebellion, the Union men have not hesitated to call things by their right names, and that they consider treason as something more of a crime than petit larceny. A man who has been a rebel, participating in this rebellion, or a rebel sympathizer giving it aid and comfort, has great reason to be thankful that his life is spared, and should properly be content, at least pending this war, to take a retired seat and allow his loyal fellow-citizens to do the voting. The treason of this class of men is not immediately effaced by their coming within loyal jurisdiction, and they have not any special claim to our sympathy in the matter of the exercise of the elective franchise, and it is the right and duty of the loyal men of Missouri to see to it that traitors during this war do not pollute the ballot-box with their votes, even if the State authorities, in order to accomplish this, have to place a militia guard around the polls.

I know that certain political gentlemen are anxious to have this class of men voting once more on their side, and are denouncing as Jacobins and radicals those earnest patriots in the border States who question the propriety or wisdom of such a course and who insist that the national safety requires that such men should remain on probation while the war continues.

Until this war is ended these returned rebels, while enjoying the protection of the Government, will do their country the most essential service by quietly remaining at home on the day of election, and even postponing on that day all predatory excursions and guerrilla raids. Clemency and liberality may safely be extended to them when hostilities are over and the rebellion is crushed, but until then let confidence and trust be reposed in the patriot in preference to the traitor, and let a marked distinction be drawn between a state of civil war and a state of peace in regard to the rights and privileges of disloyal citizens.

The contestant has produced no legal testimony as to the election in De Kalb county. The depositions he claims to have taken purport to have been taken before two justices of the peace, but without any notice or legal authority, and they are taken ex parte, no one appearing for the respondent or cross-examining any of the witnesses, and the respondent before the committee objected to the reception of the depositions as evidence in the case for the reasons already stated. The depositions are clearly illegal and inadmissible, being taken contrary to the act of Congress of February 19, 1851. There are eight election precincts in this county. The depositions only relate to one of these, namely, the Stewartsville precinct. The contestant, in asking his questions, and the witnesses, in giving their statements, wholly disregard the rules of evidence. Hearsay testimony is freely given and opinions or guesses of the witnesses are paraded as evidence; but if we were compelled to receive these depositions as in the case for the purposes of this investigation, we should find on examination that they could not be of any essential benefit to the contestant. Eight witnesses are sworn, of whom five did not go to the polls till in the evening, and could not have known how the election was conducted during the day. Only two men claim that they were actually prevented from voting by violence or intimidation, and that was in the evening. Three others of the witnesses claim that they were afraid to vote on this account, and on account of what they heard others say, and of these three, two of them did not go to the election till evening.

The general statements of witnesses that some of the soldiers were preventing men from voting if they wished to vote for contestant, without naming any persons so prevented, or specifying what the soldiers did to prevent them from voting, are of very little weight, especially where the deposition is ex parte and there is no benefit of a cross-examination and the witness is also a partisan. Statements of what third persons or strangers said during the day, either to the witnesses or in their hearing, are of very little consequence, and certainly are not evidence, and the same may be said of the opinions and surmises of witnesses so freely expressed in these depositions. There is no charge, however false and unfounded, but might be supported by such testimony in regard to an election.

The vote at Stewartsville is not given in the depositions, and the testimony which is offered does not show whether, in fact, the contestant or the respondent received a majority of the votes cast at this precinct. With what show of reason, then, can the contestant claim from his evidence that the result of the election was in the least affected to his injury by anything that transpired here?

The entire vote of the county of De Kalb for President in 1860 was only 702, of which Breckinridge received 213. The aggregate vote of the county for Congress in 1862 was 506, which, taking into account the secession vote before the rebellion, is certainly a pretty full vote for an ordinary election since the rebellion. The full vote in this county for judges in 1863, one year later, was only 601, being an increase of only 95 votes, notwithstanding it was an exciting election and a year of comparative peace had intervened.

It is worthy of remark also that by the deposition of Coy, one of the witnesses here produced by contestant, it is made to appear expressly that in 1863 there was no difficulty in voting at this precinct, and that those whom he claims were refused in 1862 voted in 1863 without objection.

We have seen how slight was the difference in the aggregate vote of these two years in this county, less than we should expect would have been the ordinary increase of votes in the county; and it is a fact conclusive that there was not any serious interference with voters here in 1862.

The testimony produced by the contestant in regard to the election in Buchanan county is all confined to Washington township. This township includes the city of St. Joseph, and had in it six voting precincts, known as Allen House, Nunning's brewery, market-house, court-house, Potter House, and Harness House. No evidence is given as to the election at the Harness House or the Potter House precinct, and only one witness testifies about the election at Nunning's brewery. No one is shown to have been prevented there from voting for contestant. Only two witnesses testify concerning the election at the Allen House precinct; and they do not show that any voters there were prevented from voting for contestant by either violence, threats, or intimidation; but one of these witnesses expressly negatives any violence, threats, or intimidation that day at that precinct. One man named Cowie appears to have been assailed after he had voted in the latter part of the day; but it was by an unarmed man, and no reason is given for the affray; and another man named McKesson, alleged to have been interfered with, had not offered to vote, nor does it appear what kind of tickets he had, nor that the interference had any reference to the contestant. This leaves but two precincts to be noticed, namely, the court-house and the market-house.

At the court-house there is no question but that some of the citizens and soldiers, not on guard that day, but wearing the uniform of the militia, interfered and stopped the voting, and tore up the poll-books after about one hundred votes had been polled, a large portion of which, the witnesses think, were for contestant. This is the only instance in the district in which poll-books were destroyed and the election stopped for the day, and we are not disposed in the least to countenance or justify such proceedings. But it is proper to notice, when we consider the legal effect of this conduct as affecting the merits of this contest, that it appears by the testimony that the second board of judges of election acting at that precinct at that time, had been chosen and were acting without authority of law, and that neither the first nor the second board of judges of the election at that precinct, nor the clerks, had taken the oath prescribed or required by the convention ordinance, and therefore they were not legally authorized to preside at the election or to receive or count the votes, and no voting could legally have taken place there up to the time when this interference closed the polls.

It also appears by the evidence and the laws of Missouri that voters in this township of Washington could and did vote for Representative in Congress at any of the election precincts they saw fit, so that if the polls at the court-house had been or were unlawfully closed, the voters were not thereby prevented from casting their votes for contestant at any of the other five election precincts in the township, which, so far as appears, all remained open during the day. Neglect of voters to vote after the closing of the polls at the court-house would be a voluntary act, as it appears by the evidence that the polls of the different precincts were so near together in the city that a number of the witnesses frequently visited them during the day.

At the market-house the evidence tends to show that about eleven o'clock in the morning there was some disturbance and the judges stopped the voting about half an hour and then resumed. Some five persons are named who it is claimed were prevented from voting, and some of the witnesses say in general terms that soldiers were in the crowd preventing voters who wished to vote for contestant from approaching the polls, and a few of the witnesses speak of seeing some persons arrested, but it appears that they were all shortly after and on the same day discharged from custody by order of General Hall. The military guards at the polls in this city were placed there at the request of the contestant made to General Hall, as his own witness testifies, and the same witness says he did not hear contestant's name mentioned in the crowd at the market-house. Loomis, one witness, who claims that violence was here offered him, voted afterwards at Nunning's brewery; but he admits that he got into an altercation with a man at the market-house and called him a liar before he was put out of the room; and Abell, another witness, states that he had been enrolled as disloyal under Order No. 24; and Dr. Lamme, another witness, admits that he in the fall of 1861 proposed and gave three groins for the man who put up the national flag over the post office in the city of St. Joseph. That this class of men to a considerable extent sympathized with and supported the contestant and of course were anxious for his success is also pointedly illustrated by the testimony of Mr. Manney, one of contestant's witnesses at this place, who on his cross-examination was questioned, and answered as follows:

"Question. As between Benjamin F. Loan, returned member, and John P. Bruce, contestant, who did that class of men, so far as you know or heard, who are generally denominated returned rebels, and men who have been arrested, taken the oath, and given bond, and those returned from Price's army, and voluntarily surrendered themselves, and those enrolled under Order No. 24, as rebel sympathizers, vote for?"

"Answer. I heard of a few men about the time of the election, who voted for Loan, of that class, but they were few and far between. My impression is that a majority of that class of men that did vote voted for John P. Bruce."

"Question. Where was General Loan, according to your best understanding, at the time the congressional canvass was going on in this district, and at the time the election was held?"

"Answer. I understand him to be south of the Missouri river, with his headquarters at Jefferson City."

"Question. Do you know how the voters that were dispersed, as you say, would have voted at the court-house precinct, as between John P. Bruce and B. F. Loan? State your own knowledge in this respect."

"Answer. I do not know."

"Question. For whom did you vote at this election for Congress?"

"Answer. I was under the necessity of voting for John P. Bruce, having no Democratic candidate to vote for."

In this connection we notice the fact that the contestant was not the Democratic candidate, and his claim that he had a right to expect the vote of the Democratic party is purely gratuitous on his part. The three individuals running for Congress in this district at this time were all of them independent candidates, old party organizations having been broken up by the rebellion. Mr. Branch claimed to be the ultra radical candidate, while General Loan ran as an independent candidate of the Union men on a war platform. Being at that time actively engaged in the military service the people of his district knew that his advocacy of the Government, his support of the war, and his adherence to the Union was no sham profession, but an earnest, living reality; and as he was not then in the district, and could not well come into it during the canvass, he issued the following card to his constituents, being all the address he made to them while the election was pending, and which was so issued just one month prior to the day of election:

JEFFERSON CITY, October 4, 1862.

EDITOR HERALD: I have received many communications, public and private, from friends in the seventh district, asking permission to use my name as a candidate for Congress in that district. Official duties have deprived me of the pleasure of answering those requests as received, directly to the authors, and as it is not probable now that I shall have the time to do so hereafter, I will, with your permission, send, through the medium of your paper, a brief answer of all of them. I have devoted my life to aid in suppressing this unholy rebellion, and from this work I do not propose, for any cause or consideration, to turn aside or to look back, until the last armed traitor is subjugated. I shall never consent to make any terms of peace or compromise with them, and the war must be continued until the traitors are coerced into making an unconditional submission to the Constitution and the laws. As a consequence of this determination, it will be utterly impossible for me to make a canvass before the people of the district, and I have heretofore been disposed to refuse the requests of my friends to allow my name to be used in the race. But, upon reflection, if it is thought best to use my name as a means of uniting the whole strength of the unconditional Union party in the district, I do not feel at liberty to refuse it. I trust it in their hands.

Respectfully,

BENJAMIN LOAN.

Nothing which he did was calculated in the least to hinder a fair and free election, nor did he have anything to do with any effort or attempt to prevent a free expression or choice of the legal voters at the polls. The contestant received at this market-house precinct some 87 votes, or about one third of the vote cast for respondent, and it is apparent from the testimony that there was no organized or systematic attempt to prevent voters from voting for contestant.

But even admitting for the purposes of this investigation that there was some disturbance and interruption of voters at the polls, caused by persons in the crowd, and that some persons were roughly used, how much was the result of the election affected by it? Several of the witnesses give opinions from hearsay and from what they saw at the election in St. Joseph as to the number of persons they believed were kept from voting in the entire county, in which there are eighteen election precincts, but this is a mere wholesale guess, and is wholly inadmissible. Only two give estimates or guesses for this township. Knapp, on pages 7 and 9, puts the whole number kept from voting at about three hundred, and Matney, on page 24, estimates the whole number at from one hundred and fifty to two hundred voters, but the witnesses would not swear that these would have voted for contestant. Yet the report of the majority of the committee claims a loss for contestant in this township alone of 900 votes by violence and intimidation, although contestant, in his notice, only claimed a loss of 800 in the whole county. The vote returned from this township for 1862 was 910. Add to this the 100 votes polled illegally at the court-house and destroyed, and it makes the entire vote cast 1,010. The whole vote of the township in 1863, one year later, and in an exciting party election, was only 1,156, being an increase of but 546 votes, of which increase the radical candidates for supreme court judges in 1863 gained 186 votes over the vote for the respondent in 1862, his vote in 1862 being but 744, while that of the radical candidates for judges in 1863 was 930; which conclusively shows that the increased vote in 1863 did not come but in part from the conservative side.

The county of Buchanan in 1860 gave 614 votes for Breckinridge for President, of which 226 votes were cast in this same township of Washington. Did contestant expect to find the votes of these men deposited in the ballot-box at the election in 1862? Would he not be more likely to find these voters, and many others who voted there in 1860, in the rebel army?

But there is another fact which shows that no disturbance of a serious character or of long continuance occurred at the polls in this city of St. Joseph. General W. P. Hall, then Lieutenant Governor and also military commander of this district, resided here and attended the election on said day. He is now Governor of the State and a prominent Democrat, and has never been accused or suspected of radicalism. He had control of all the militia there, and discharged forthwith from custody all persons who were arrested that day, so that the voters could have no fears on that account, and could know that he was respected as in supreme command. Had there been any serious violence or disturbance he could have suppressed it at any moment. Will the Democracy endeavor now to impeach their own Governor in this matter, and claim that he connived at or even tolerated or permitted violent interference with voters at the polls either by the military or citizens under his own eyes?

That there was an interruption at the court-house is admitted, but that was sudden and closed the polls where the election had been conducted in open violation of law, and there being five other polls open in the city, it was, it seems, not considered necessary to commence and open the polls there again; but it does not appear that contestant ever insisted before the canvassers or claimed that the vote cast at the court-house was legal and should be counted in his favor.

No doubt at this market-house precinct there were instances of high words, miscellaneous individual quarrels, and those scenes of noise and confusion which frequently attend upon elections where a crowd is in attendance and political feeling is excited; and in the recent experience of this country it would be strange if such manifestations did not appear; but that is far different from organized, systematic violence, and intimidation or interference.

The contestant and the report of the majority of the committee, as well as that of the minority in this case, wholly exonerate the superior officers of both the State and Federal Government throughout the district from any action in the matter prejudicial to the contestant, and also admit that the judges of election conducted the election with fairness; and under such circumstances it is impossible for the contestant to make void the election, and to say that no choice has been made.

We have seen that the contestant's own witnesses only claim a loss of from 150 to 300 votes in Washington township. Suppose, for the sake of the illustration, we call it at the highest number, 300, and even add to this the entire 100 votes destroyed at the court-house, but which were illegally cast, making 400 in all in this county, how is it to avail the contestant, and how is it possible for him with this aid to overcome the remaining surplus vote of the respondent in the district, amounting to over 1,628 majority or plurality? The gentleman who drew the report of the majority of the committee in this case seemed almost instinctively conscious of this insuperable difficulty, as he, while giving tabular statements in almost endless variety of repetition, wholly omits to give a statement drawn from the evidence of contestant's losses in the several counties, with the aggregate footing. In four of the counties where the number of precincts is shown by the testimony, there are forty-one election precincts, and outside of Buchanan county contestant does not claim to have offered any evidence as to the election only as to five precincts. It would, therefore, require proof that the contestant lost by violence or intimidation over 325 votes on an average at each of those five precincts to overcome and do away with the remaining majority of the sitting member. Such a state of things the evidence wholly fails to show, and no political ciphering can enable the contestant to overcome the respondent's vote in the district.

Call the average of election precincts ten to a county, which is less than is shown by the evidence so far as given, and it makes one hundred and fifty precincts in the district, and the contestant having offered some evidence as to the election in only eight of these precincts, desires, on that alone, to set aside and declare the election void in the remaining one hundred and forty-two precincts in the district, concerning which he has offered no evidence, and in which the election is not in the least attacked or impeached. Neither law nor precedent will justify such a course.

As the contestant has sought to base an argument upon a comparison of votes in the district in different years we will notice that aspect of this case. The aggregate vote in this district in 1863 for judges of the supreme court was 16,229, and the majority for the radical candidates was 4,551, a majority lacking only 3 votes of being equal to contestant's entire vote in 1862, and the entire vote for the conservative candidates in 1863 in the district was only 5,839, being an increase in the entire district of only 1,288 votes over the vote for contestant in 1862, while the aggregate radical vote in the district in 1863 was 10,390, being an increase of 1,143 over the entire aggregate vote of Loan and Branch the two unconditional Union candidates in the district in 1862, thus showing that the gain in the radical vote in 1863 was nearly as great in the district as the gain in the conservative vote.

In the five counties of Andrew, Atchison, Buchanan, De Kalb and Livingston, concerning the election in which contestant claims to have offered some evidence, showing interference with and intimidation of voters at the polls in 1862, the majority for the radical candidates in 1863 was 795. Include with these the counties of Holt and Nodaway, in which contestant also insists there was interference (though he has offered no evidence to show any) in 1862, and the radical majority in 1863 was 1,742, showing a vote there about as healthy for radicalism in 1863 as there in 1862, without allowing the contestant the poor excuse of attributing it in 1863 to military interference.

The contestant cannot explain what he calls the falling off in the aggregate vote in 1862, from the vote for President in 1860, by any alleged military or other interference with or against his supporters at the polls, but he will find himself compelled to devise some other and more rational explanation, if any is called for, as both parties are represented in such alleged decrease in 1862 as well as in the increased vote in 1863. But it is absurd to attempt to determine that there was any such actual falling off in the aggregate vote in 1862 by comparing it with the vote of 1860 before the rebellion, as that would be assuming that all the rebels in this district who voted in 1860 were to be reckoned as still voters here in 1862, and besides, the vote at an exciting presidential election is usually larger than at any ordinary State or congressional election. The secession element existing in this district at the breaking out of the rebellion, and the disturbances caused and changes wrought by the civil war, readily furnish the explanation without any necessity for taking the contestant or the military into serious consideration.

From certain portions of the testimony and also from the admissions and statements of the parties on the argument of this case before the committee, it appeared that at this election in 1862, being the first general election since the breaking out of the civil war in the State, owing to the strength of the disloyal element in the State and to the oath prescribed for voters by the convention ordinance, many persons refused or declined to vote, some because they considered it would be acknowledging or recognizing their allegiance to the General Government, others because they were opposed to taking the convention oath; some because they were timid about taking sides with either party, and some because, since the issuing of Order No. 24, August 4, 1862, they had enrolled themselves as disloyal under said order. And during the continuance of the canvass such was the indifference of many citizens to the Federal and State government that candidates in conducting the canvass frequently urged their fellow-citizens to come out and vote and thus manifest their loyalty and take part in choosing county officers and members of the Legislature as well as members of Congress and aid in restoring order and civil government. Some of the disloyal class as we have seen, more crafty, designing, and unscrupulous, boldly presented themselves at the polls, and their notorious disloyalty no doubt excited in the breasts of loyal men some righteous indignation and elicited expressions of disapprobation and epithets which would naturally disturb a guilty conscience, and might cause it to raise the howl of military interference at the polls.

These facts and circumstances, if any explanation were needed, would sufficiently account for any supposed falling off in the vote of this district in 1862 without attributing it to violence or intimidation on the part of the militia. But the vote was a large if not in fact a full vote. The aggregate vote for Congress in this district in 1862 was larger than that of any other congressional district in the State of Missouri at that election, larger than the average aggregate vote for members of the present Congress in all the border States, and larger even than the average vote for Congress in the several districts of the State of Massachusetts at the last congressional election. The point has been made on behalf of contestant that in some of the counties many of the candidates for State offices were militia officers and were running on the same ticket with the respondent.

In reply to this, and also as to the frequent mention in the evidence of the presence of the militia at the polls, we say, in the language of the order of the adjutant general of the State, No. 45, "that the enrolled militia, being citizens of the State and nearly all entitled to vote, will doubtless be generally at places of voting;" and we are not aware that a loyal citizen is disqualified to hold a civil office by reason of being enrolled and serving in the State militia.

But the contestant cannot avail himself of anything to his advantage in this regard, for while making a profert in the committee-room of what he claimed to be the fragments of the poll-books and tickets destroyed at the court-house in St. Joseph he exhibited a specimen of the tickets used at that election, on which his own name appeared for Congress, regularly printed on the same ticket with the same Colonel John Severance and the other military officers who were candidates for civil offices, and were voted for there at that election, showing that he ran on the same ticket with said military candidates in perfect harmony, and he cannot now deny his own acts, nor come before the House and claim that he was running in illegitimate company. In fact the congressional candidates ran on the different county tickets just as suited their pleasure and the locality, and it is but attempting to mislead when it is asserted or intimated that the contestant or respondent uniformly ran on opposing tickets with local candidates in each county.

It was also asserted on the argument and tacitly admitted before the committee, that although at this same election county officers and members of the Legislature were chosen, and had since entered upon and discharged the duties of their respective offices, yet in no instance had their seats been contested or the validity of the election been called in question. The people of Missouri have considered and treated this election as fair and legal. Returned rebels and men disloyal since December 17, 1861, were by the convention ordinance not entitled to vote, as they could not truthfully take the oath; and no man who had voluntarily enrolled himself as disloyal under Order No. 24, which was made August 2, 1862, could be considered a loyal man and entitled to vote at this election. Were it in evidence here that the election had been carried by the votes of such rebels and disloyal men, would not this House indignantly repudiate such votes and set aside such an election? And even were it shown that such returned rebels and disloyal men had been in some instances prevented by the militia from voting at this election, will not this House still hold that the result of the election has not been changed or affected thereby, as such men were neither loyal nor legal voters? Nor indeed should the act of a few riotous or quarrelsome individuals, not officers of election or in charge of the polls, be made effectual to vitiate an election, as it would be most unjust to the electors and a great encouragement to the enemies of law and order, and would be placing in the hands of a few lawless persons the power of defeating at pleasure any election. But in this case neither the quality or quantity of the interference could legally have changed the result; and the officers of the election having, as contestant admits, conducted the election fairly and impartially, and no act of the superior State or military officers being complained of by him, we see nothing to defeat the choice made by the people.

In report No. 37 of the present session of Congress in regard to the Missouri militia, the Committee on Military Affairs, on the 29th day of March, 1864, in recounting the condition of things in that State in the summer of 1862, made the following statement to this House; namely:

"That in the summer of 1862 the rebel General Price threatened an invasion of Missouri from Arkansas with a formidable army; that to cooperate with this, the rebel officers Coffee, Shelby, and Hughes had, with a large force, penetrated to the interior of the State, had defeated our forces at Lone Jack, captured Independence, and threatened Lexington; that the rebel officer Porter, in northeast Missouri, had collected over three thousand men in arms, and Polkexter, near the center of the State, on the north side of the Missouri river, had over fifteen hundred rebels in arms, while a considerable force threatened the southeast; that to meet these bodies of the enemy there was no adequate Federal force in the State.

"Under these circumstances the commanding general in that department, with the consent of the Governor, organized and called into active service a large part of the militia of the State, and placed them under the command of the Federal officers. By their aid this outbreak was suppressed and the rebels driven from the State or captured.

"The militia in different sections of the State took prisoners and turned over to the Federal officers several thousand rebels, who were most of them sent South and exchanged. They were in many of the engagements that occurred in different parts of the State, and are mentioned favorably by the officers in command.

"After the pressing emergency under which they were called into service had passed, the commander of the department would not consent to their being disbanded. He asked of the Governor that a part of them should be retained in service, assuring him that the State should be reimbursed for her expenses in paying them, and the Secretary of War in the mean time ordered that they should be subsisted and clothed by the Federal Government. By thus retaining the militia in service, the commander of the department was enabled to send ten thousand of the Federal troops in Missouri to Vicksburg, and subsequently a considerable force to General Steele, to cooperate in the taking of Little Rock and holding possession of Arkansas."

Such is the class of militia men in Missouri who are attempted to be assailed by the contestant. These loyal citizen soldiers, even after having succeeded in driving out the rebel forces, found themselves still exposed, by the treachery and feigned loyalty of many of their neighbors and returned fellow-citizens, to fresh outbreaks, surprises, and raids, and were compelled to seek means of self-protection and defense. They also found similar precautions necessary in regard to the holding of elections. Men fresh from or ripe for rebellion or guerrilla raids would, if permitted, have little scruple in taking an oath to enable them to deposit a vote in the ballot-box if thereby they could defeat some loyal supporter of the Government and elevate a rebel sympathizer to office in his stead, and if not permitted to do this would not hesitate to make an attack on the polls, and by violence wholly prevent or break up and defeat the election; and a wise and prudent precaution on the part of the loyal authorities would anticipate and provide for such emergencies. Hence the necessity and propriety, in those States thus affected by the rebellion, of the presence in many places of a loyal military guard at the polls, acting either under the authority of the State or of the General Government.

The outcry about military interference at the elections which has of late been raised by political partisans, both in public harangues and through the public press, proclaiming the violation of the elective franchise and the subversion of our liberties, indicates a distrust of our citizen soldiery on the part of the opponents of the Administration which is unwarranted by the facts, which is unworthy an intelligent and patriotic people, and which is cruelly unjust to the great body of our loyal soldiers who are a part of ourselves, and who are not surpassed in intelligence, virtue, patriotism, and love of liberty and free institutions by any portion of our people, or by any class of citizens on the face of the earth. No one prizes higher the freedom of elections or the purity of the ballot-box than they do, and it would be well if these croakers and complainers, these libelers of our soldiers, would manifest as strikingly as these veterans in the field have done their loyalty to their country and their desire to preserve and perpetuate her integrity and her free institutions.

English precedents and laws have frequently been referred to, and statutes of some of the States quoted, in regard to the presence of the military at elections, to show the jealous care with which our English ancestors and the people of the several States in this country have watched over the freedom of the ballot-box, and all this has been done with an evident desire to increase our alarm and to create a prejudice against our own citizens who are battling alike for their own and our protection, for the preservation of their own as well as our country and her institutions. Let these politicians but create in the minds of our citizens who remain at home a distrust of their fellow-citizens who go forth from their midst to fight the battles of their country, let them but make these soldiers the objects of suspicion as a class separate and distinct from the people, as a class ready to become the instruments of tyranny in trampling upon the rights of their fellow-men, instead of being looked upon as a part and parcel of our people, loyal and patriotic, and devoted to the public welfare, and they will then have succeeded to a great degree in accomplishing the ruin of the country. Do gentlemen reflect upon the present state of things in our country? Do they realize who compose our volunteer armies? Do they remember at what class of men British legislation or the legislation of our own States in regard to protecting the ballot-box, so far as the soldiers were concerned, was originally aimed?

We have no standing army of mercenaries against whose presence it is necessary for us to guard at the polls. It was this class of men, a class not strictly citizens, but a class separate and distinct from the great mass of the citizens and not in sympathy with them, of which our ancestors were jealous; a class whose characteristics one of the patriot orators of the Revolution, in an oration on the anniversary of the Boston massacre, has thus graphically described in speaking of standing armies and the presence of the British soldiery then quartered in Boston:

"Standing armies are sometimes (I would by no means say generally, much less universally) composed of persons who have rendered themselves unfit to live in civil society; who have no other motives of conduct than those which a desire of the present gratification of their passions suggests; who have no property in any country; who have lost or given up their own liberties and envy those who enjoy liberty; who are equally indifferent to the glory of a George or a Louis; who for the addition of one penny a day to their wages would desert from the Christian cross and fight under the crescent of the Turkish sultan. From such men as these what has not a State to fear?"

Will gentlemen who are so loud in their complaints about military interference at the polls dare to insinuate any such charge against the brave and patriotic volunteers who now compose our armies? Will they dare to charge that these volunteers are in the least wanting in intelligence, in love of country, in respect for her institutions and laws, in regard for the purity and freedom of elections, and, above all, in an earnest desire to preserve, uphold, maintain, and perpetuate the Union? For my part I can conceive of no man who has demonstrated so unequivocally his patriotism and loyalty, who has shown so conclusively his appreciation of and love for his country and her institutions and his desire to uphold and maintain them, and who has become entitled to so much confidence and trust in the present emergency as the citizen soldier; and I would sooner intrust him with the entire charge of the polls, and with the control of the liberties of my country, than any of his traducers and slanderers who have remained at home, or any class of grumbling politicians who being of the military age and able-bodied have shrunk from their country's service in this her hour of peril.

Of our citizen soldiers we may say, in the words of the patriot just quoted:

"From a well-regulated militia we have nothing to fear; their interest is the same with that of the State. When our country is invaded, the militia are ready to appear in its defense; they march into the field with that fortitude which a consciousness of the justice of their cause inspires; they do not jeopard their lives for a master who considers them only as instruments of his ambition and whom they regard only as the daily dispenser of the scanty pittance of bread and water. No, they fight for their houses, their lands, for their wives, their children, for all who claim the tenderest names and are held dearest in their hearts; they fight pro aris et focis, for their liberty, and for themselves, and for their God."

MR. SMITHERS. Mr. Speaker, the exhaustive argument of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Upson] has rendered it almost unnecessary that I should address the House upon this subject; and were I not a member of the Committee of Elections, concurring wholly in the views which have been presented by the minority, I would not have ventured to trespass upon the time of the House. But a sincere conviction upon my part of the truth of the conclusion at which the minority has arrived, and my desire, if consistent with the evidence which is presented in this case, to secure to the country and to the Government the services of a faithful and loyal legislator, and to the people of the seventh congressional district of Missouri a Representative whom I believe to have been fairly and legitimately chosen, induce me for a few brief moments to examine the testimony in the cause, and in doing so I shall confine myself wholly to the record.

The majority of the committee, in the report submitted to the House, and near the conclusion of that report, uses this language:

"It affords the committee pleasure to be able to say that the evidence in this case nowhere discloses anything tending to show that any superior officer of either the State or Federal Government manifested any other than an earnest desire to secure a full expression of the popular will at this election, and that such expression should be freely given without intimidation or molestation. The judges, so far as appears, with one or two exceptions, conducted the elections with entire fairness, and there was nothing on the part of civilians to warrant or justify the interference of the militia. But the evidence does disclose ample proof that a portion of the militia in certain localities disregarded entirely the injunctions given them in the orders before mentioned, and in many instances, in violation of their duty as good citizens, and of the commands promulgated prior to the election by those orders to them as soldiers, assumed to determine who should and who should not vote, and for whom votes should be cast, and by threats, violence, and by various modes of intimidation, so far interfered with the election as, in the opinion of the committee, to render the election a nullity."

This, then, is the issue made up between the majority and the minority. The majority of the committee admit that so far as the conduct of the Federal Government or of the State government or of any of the officers of election is concerned, there had been entire fairness throughout the whole proceedings. They then place the issue on the ground that in certain localities the militia disregarded the orders given to them, and that the election was, on account of that disregard of orders, the result of force, fraud, and violence, and was, therefore, a nullity.

The true question, therefore, before the House is not whether the contestant on the one part or the sitting member on the other is entitled to the seat—it is not a question to determine whether the seat belongs to General Loan or to Mr. Bruce; because the committee is unanimous in the declaration that Mr. Bruce is not entitled to the seat. The question before the House is whether the people of the seventh congressional district of Missouri are to be represented on this floor—whether there is such evidence of fraud, force, and violence in the district as absolutely nullifies the election in the whole district. That, and that alone, is the question for the House to determine.

In view of that question I propose now to consider very briefly, and, as I hope, very frankly, the evidence submitted to the committee and presented by the committee to this House.

The seventh congressional district of the State of Missouri, as has been already stated to the House, is composed of fifteen counties. These counties are Buchanan, Andrew, Holt, Atchison, Nodaway, Worth, Gentry, Harrison, Mercer, Grundy, Putnam, Sullivan, Livingston, Daviess, and De Kalb. The whole vote cast in those counties at this congressional election was 13,803. The vote cast in the ten counties that are really not contested was 8,760 votes, if my computation be correct; and the vote cast in the five counties in which there is a contest was 5,043, making together 13,803 votes cast in the district, a larger vote than was cast in any other congressional district of the State of Missouri; and, as my friend from Michigan [Mr. Urson] informs me, larger relatively than that cast in the various congressional districts in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Having thus reduced the question to a simple issue, I propose to confine myself almost wholly to a consideration of the report of the majority of the committee, to test its accuracy, and to correct the tables that have been submitted to the House, and to show that by no possible political arithmetic can General Loan be deprived of his seat, or his majority reduced to less than a thousand.

However, before proceeding to that, the House will pardon me for referring to certain testimony which has been alluded to by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GANSON,] who opened the case on the part of the majority of the committee. He referred to the testimony, in reference to Buchanan county, of Samuel Ensworth, who was sheriff of the county, and he relied upon it, to some extent, to prove the facts in reference to the Allen House polls. In relation to the polls at the court-house, about which so many of the witnesses have testified, they are not in these returns. They have been entirely thrown out, and form no part of the aggregate vote by virtue of which General Loan now holds his seat. I shall therefore dismiss the court-house precinct entirely from the consideration of the case.

Now, in relation to the Allen House precinct, and to the interference of soldiers, it becomes a very pertinent question to know how came these soldiers at the polls. It is said they were placed there by general orders from the commanding officer, issued by the adjutant general of the State of Missouri. At whose instigation? By whose instrumentality? Who placed these soldiers at the polls? Let the witness, Samuel Ensworth, a witness for the contestant, answer the question. On his cross-examination this question is asked him:

"Have you ever heard said John P. Bruce say that he requested guards of the militia to be placed at the different voting precincts on said election day?"

"Answer. I heard Mr. Bruce say that he went to General Hall and told the general that he understood that there was to be an interference with voters at the polls; that persons that were enrolled under Order No. 24 were to be excluded from voting, and requested of General Hall to have a guard put at the different precincts to prevent any interference with the voters, and to leave the qualification of the voters with the judges."

It therefore appears by the answer of the witness of the contestant that the contestant himself desired an array of military at the polls; and if there be any complaint as to the military being placed there the contestant himself is the author of the trouble.

Now, then, let us see what Ensworth says in relation to the interference that occurred at this precinct. Just above he testifies as follows:

"Question. Did you hear any of those excited persons in that crowd complain of being prevented from voting for John P. Bruce?"

"Answer. I cannot say that I heard his name mentioned in that crowd."

"Question. Did you see any one prevented from voting for John P. Bruce at the Allen House precinct on that day?"

"Answer. I did not."

"Question. Did you hear any threats used against any person attempting to vote for John P. Bruce at the Allen House precinct on that day?"

"Answer. I did not."

This witness, who is so paraded by the majority of the committee, and relied on by the contestant to prove his case, when asked if he saw any one prevented from voting on that day, replied that he did not, but he had to pass to the polls through files of bayonets. But when the inquiry is made who brought those bayonets there, it appears that they were brought on the request of the contestant himself.

I proceed now, as I desire to be brief, to a comparison of the vote as presented by the majority of the committee in page 27 of their report. The aggregate vote given by the committee of the counties of Daviess, Gentry, Grundy, Harrison, Mercer, Putnam, Sullivan, and Worth is given by their computation as—for Bruce, 2,763; for Loan, 1,913; making a plurality for Bruce of 850. It will be observed that it was not a majority, for in these counties a third party received 2,412 votes.

Now, the House will observe that from that computation seven counties are excluded, five counties in which there is a contest, and also the two counties of Nodaway and Holt, about which from one end of this report to the other there is not a single scintilla of evidence of any irregularity whatever. I state in regard to these counties, so far as I have been able to examine the testimony—and if I am wrong I ask any member of the majority of the committee to correct me, for I do not desire to make any misstatement in regard to the matter—that there is no iota or scintilla of evidence in regard to these counties of Holt and Nodaway. I ask, then, upon what rule, what decent pretext were these counties excluded on the ground that no fair election was held in them? Yet it is a singular fact that such has been the action of the majority of the committee. They seem to have indulged in mere surmises in relation to these two counties and to have acted very much upon the principle of the school-boy in arithmetic, who had some difficulty in working out the answer, and so found the proper answer, put it down and then made the preceding figures correspond to it. I can conceive of no reason by which the committee could have excluded these two counties unless upon some such mode of computation. Then, if we include the vote of the counties of Holt and Nodaway, as in all reasonableness and fairness we must include their vote, it adds to the vote of General Loan 695 votes, leaving, according to the computation of the committee, the plurality for Mr. Bruce 155 votes instead of 850, which by some means they have arrived at and embodied in their report.

The majority of votes actually received and counted for General Loan in the district was 2,028; and in order to oust him from his seat, you must destroy that majority, and to do that they have undertaken to reject the vote of whole counties in consequence of irregularities in a single precinct. If gentlemen will examine the evidence which is reported in this case, they will find in reference to whole counties which the committee have thrown out, no particle of evidence of any irregularity whatever, except in a single precinct; and yet the committee have adopted the rule of disfranchising whole counties in the seventh district of Missouri. It becomes a question whether, if we allow the testimony taken the full force and entire bearing which it can, as legitimate testimony, be entitled to, then upon what principle of justice can you exclude the whole county because a given precinct does not exactly hold its election according to the rules of law? Why should we throw out the balance of the county on that account? They exclude the whole five counties; yet there is not one of those five counties in which there is more than one or two precincts in reference to which any testimony has been taken. My colleagues on the committee and other gentlemen will correct me if I am wrong.

In Buchanan county there are twenty-eight precincts, and there is testimony in regard to only two of them. Now, on what principle of justice can you exclude the remaining twenty-six precincts concerning which there is no testimony?

Now, having reduced the apparent majority of Mr. Bruce to 155 votes, let me examine why Atchison was rejected. I said that the counties of Holt and Nodaway were rejected without any testimony whatever. Atchison county is also ruled out. Now Atchison county gave General Loan 496 votes and Mr. Bruce 102 votes, making General Loan's majority 394, and deducting from that the majority of Mr. Bruce of 155, it leaves General Loan a clear majority of 139.

Now, I ask the House to listen to the testimony on which the county of Atchison was rejected. I refer to the testimony of Silas Puryear. I beg members to remember as they run along that the vast body of this testimony is ex parte in its character, much of it being taken without notice.

Mr. GANSON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. SMITHERS. Certainly.

Mr. GANSON. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that he took the ground that these tables were appended here to show that these counties ought to be excluded.

Mr. SMITHERS. Certainly, sir.

Mr. GANSON. If the gentleman from Delaware had read the report of the Committee of Elections he would have found that there was no such thing. It is there stated that the tables are appended to illustrate the relative vote these gentlemen received in the counties where there is alleged not to have been any interference, as compared with those where interference is proved to have occurred. They were simply for the purpose of showing the character and the extent of the interference. They are not tables to exclude these counties, as the gentleman from Delaware has stated.

Mr. SMITHERS. What was the effect of putting them there?

Mr. GANSON. I desire to say that they were not put there by the Committee of Elections for the purpose of claiming that those counties should be stricken out.

Mr. SMITHERS. But they are stricken out.

Mr. GANSON. I have not stricken them out; I only put them in to show the relative comparison between the counties where there was an interference and where there was not interference. If the gentleman desires to state the case truly he can read the report of the Committee of Elections; if he does not, of course I have nothing to say.

Mr. SMITHERS. I wish to say here, in answer, that these counties were thrown out. I know no other reason why they should be excluded at all except that it was considered there was proof of interference with the elections sufficient to exclude them. Having failed in making that proof there is no reason why they should be excluded.

Proceeding, in relation to that I desire to show, according to the idea of the gentleman from New York, my own position. I say, then, upon no other proofs can those counties be excluded.

If you do not exclude Atchison county you put General Loan in. On what ground can Atchison county be excluded except that of interference with the election in that county? But they have counted out Atchison, because if they did not count out Atchison they could not count out General Loan, and in counting it out they counted it out upon the ground of military interference. I want to show now the whole testimony in relation to interference in that county, and show whether there is any ground for counting it out. The sole testimony in relation to that is the testimony of Silas Puryear to be found on page 115 of the report. Mr. Puryear was the attorney of the contestant, and it is not often that a case is to be decided upon the testimony of a counsel in the case, though it is attempted to be done in this case.

Mr. DAWES. Allow me to remind my friend that the report made this morning in General Blair's case, in which the gentleman concurred, depended entirely upon the deposition of one of the counsel for the contestant in reference to the validity of every one of the muster rolls.

Mr. SMITHERS. My reply to my colleague is brief and simple. I examined the testimony in the Blair case sufficiently to satisfy myself that the vote in the Abbey precinct was illegal which unseated Mr. Blair. Whether Knox should be admitted depended upon the number of legal votes cast by the Osterhaus brigade, which was to be determined by a mere inspection of the muster rolls. In this I trusted to the examination and computation of my colleague, [Mr. DAWES,] who reported to me the result which I accepted and acted on as true.

Mr. DAWES. I presume my friend was just as well aware when he gave his vote in the Blair case, as when he gave his vote here, that the counsel in both cases had been witnesses, and the only difference between the two is this: the Blair case could not be decided without the testimony of the counsel of the contestant, while in this case the counsel of the contestant put in his affidavit to show that he had been in certain counties after testimony and had been driven out, and my friend here undertakes to get off of his vote in the Blair case by charging it upon me. I tell my friend that I do not take his vote in the Blair case any more than I do this, and he is to stand upon his own judgment in that case as much as this.

Mr. SMITHERS. I do not desire to get off of anything that I get on, generally, [laughter,] but I am perfectly willing my friend should get off of me, for his persistence will only lead to recrimination.

Mr. DAWES. I did not intend to mingle in this debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether this debate upon the Blair case is in order.

Mr. SMITHERS. That was the point I was about to make. I do not desire any controversy with my colleague; and I infinitely prefer, if agreeable to him, that he shall submit his remarks after I close.

Mr. DAWES. I will say if the gentleman finds it unpleasant to be reminded of an inconsistency, I will not insist on interrupting him.

Mr. SMITHERS. In reply to that I have to say that I am at all times willing to be reminded of an inconsistency; but I am also at all times willing to place the burden of that inconsistency upon the shoulders of the gentleman who charged me with it. If therefore inconsistent at all, it is because I am misled by the false light the gentleman held out in the Blair case. I am not misled here.

I will now proceed with the deposition of Silas Puryear, to show that under no circumstances or contingency does it contain anything whatsoever which could justify this House in rejecting the vote of the county of Atchison. What does he say?

"Question. State whether there was any interference by any one with said election; and if so, please state what was the character of said interference, and who, if you know, interfered with the same. Please state all the facts that came to your knowledge at said election at Rockport, Atchison county, Missouri, in reference to the election held for Congressman and other officers at that place on the 4th day of November, 1862.

"Answer. I had heard previous to the day of election that there would be interference, and on the morning of election was fully satisfied such would be the case from seeing a number of enrolled militia in town with arms. Soon after the time for opening the polls I heard on the street that William Hunter, who was a justice of the county court, John Smelser, William King, and others had been prevented from voting. I did not myself go to the courthouse, but was near enough to see that the door was guarded by militia with guns, bayonets, &c."

Now, there is the testimony of a witness who says he was not at the polls, that he did not know anything which took place there, that he heard on the streets that A, B, and C had been prevented from voting, and that he knew it to be so because he saw soldiers at the door of the courthouse. Now, I submit to the House that this is the sole and entire testimony, the whole evidence upon which this entire county of Atchison has been disfranchised. It is testimony in regard to a single precinct, a precinct at which the party himself was not personally present, but draws his inferences only from statements of other men who said they had heard that A, B, and C were kept away from the polls.

I submit to the House if that is testimony upon which you will exclude these votes, and upon which you will disfranchise a brave and loyal people; upon which you will prevent the Government, in this trying hour of her exigency, from being supported upon this floor by a gentleman who is in favor of suppressing the rebellion? I say to the House if the evidence rules out General Loan, rule him out, but do not rule him out upon testimony upon which you would not hang a dog.

I assume, therefore, that the county of Atchison is wrongfully ruled out; that it shall be included in the aggregate of votes which General Loan has received. Assuming that, then Atchison county puts him ahead and gives him 139 majority.

But I do not wholly rely upon the failure of proof by Mr. Puryear. I prefer for myself now to institute an investigation, following the order of my friend, and making an analysis of the votes which were cast in Atchison at the gubernatorial election in 1860, and at the election for judges in 1863, and the congressional election in 1862. At the gubernatorial election in 1860 there were cast in the county of Atchison 813 votes; at the congressional election in 1862, 675 votes, but 138 votes less than a full poll of the county anterior to the rebellion.

In 1863, at the judicial election, which took place subsequently to the congressional election of 1862, and which is admitted to have been a fair election, there were in the county of Atchison 633 votes cast, making 42 less than were polled in the congressional election. Is there no inference to be drawn from this fact of comparative analysis? At the election of 1862 the Legislature and in 1863 judges of the supreme court were elected, who are now administering the laws of the State, and the evidence relied on by the majority of the committee in this contest would sweep from the board the whole State organization of Missouri. Is it wonderful that, with rebellion rampant, with men in the Union Army and men in the rebel army, the vote of Atchison county should have been diminished 138 votes since 1860 without fraud?

Why, sir, consider the condition of Missouri at that time. The diminution of 138 votes in Atchison county is nothing more than ought to have been looked for. Do you expect full polls in the border States, where one part have gone into rebellion, and the other part into the Union Army fighting for the preservation of the Union? The county of Atchison polled within 138 votes of its full vote at the congressional election, and 42 votes more than were polled at the judicial election of 1863.

Mr. BRUCE, (contestant.) The difference between the poll in Atchison county, that is, taking the votes of 1860 and 1862, is 266. In the presidential election of 1860 the vote of Atchison was 941. In 1862 it was 675, a difference of 266.

Mr. SMITHERS. If the contestant had paid attention to my remarks he would have observed that I compared the vote of 1862 with the vote at the gubernatorial election of 1860, when Claiborne Jackson was running for Governor, and the vote then was 813. I assume, then, that so far as the county of Atchison is concerned—one of the counties upon alleged irregularities in which the majority of the committee propose to void the whole election—there was almost a full vote, and that there is no evidence whatever that there were irregularities, even in the precinct of Rockport, which should even make void the vote of Rockport, much less the vote of the whole county of Atchison.

I ask the House to decide this question upon the evidence presented, and not upon the vague speculations of gentlemen as to what might or might not have been the poll if rebellion had not been rampant in the land, and thence concluding that an election could not be held. My answer to that is that in this very county the vote cast was 675, showing that there was a full and free election.

Now, I beg the House to remember that the ground which is assumed in this report is that the State government did no wrong, that the Federal Government did no wrong, that the judges conducted the election rightfully, but that the people were prevented and intimidated from voting. Is that true as regards the county of Atchison, when the poll-books shown to the House demonstrate that there was no intimidation in the county of Atchison, but that a full and even a heavy vote under the circumstances was cast, when men had gone to defend their country, and others were in arms against it?

I come now to the vote of the county of Andrew; and I would not detain the House by arguing this question if it were not in the performance of an imperative duty. The vote of the county of Andrew in 1862 was 1,112. In the gubernatorial election of 1860 the vote was 1,659. There was a difference of 547 votes. The vote for General Loan in Andrew county in 1862 was 984. The radical ticket, at the election in 1863, received 992 votes, making a difference in the whole year of 8 in favor of the radical ticket. In 1862, Bruce and Branch together received 128 votes in that county; and in 1863 the vote for what was called the conservative ticket, which means, I suppose, the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was, was 244, making a difference of 116 votes.

Now, let us see how this difference came. I beg to call the attention of the committee to a little piece of evidence on page 91, which will illustrate the fact, and show the reason of the difference between the vote of 1860 and the vote of 1862; and also show how it was that in 1863 the radical vote gained only 8 while the conservative vote gained 116. Here is the testimony of Mr. Joseph B. Nickel, where he is cross-examined in reference to the condition of affairs in Andrew county, which we are now discussing. He has this very pertinent question put to him:

"Question 21. Has there not, since the November election in 1860, been a great many persons left the county of Andrew, who are supposed to have joined the rebel army; and has there not been a large number of men from Andrew county who joined the Federal Army; and have not many persons moved away from Andrew county since November, 1860; and were not the men, generally speaking, who went to the said armies, absent from Andrew county on the 4th day of November last?"

"Answer 21. Since the November election in 1860, I think perhaps some four or five hundred men have left the county of Andrew, a part of whom are reported to have joined the rebel army, and a part of whom have joined the Federal Army, and a part of whom have joined the State forces, and still another part of whom have removed from the county with their families. Of those who are reported to have joined the rebel army, I think a large majority of them have returned to the county; of those who joined the Federal Army, I think perhaps half have returned; and of those who joined the State forces, comparatively few have returned. Of those who left the county with their families, their places mostly have been filled by others moving into this county from other counties and States. The most of those who moved into this county, referred to above, came here in the fall of 1861."

Now, let us take that computation, that there were four or five hundred men away from the county of Andrew. Add 500 to the actual vote cast in that county in 1862, 1,112, and you have 1,612, the whole number of voters there in 1860. The solution of where these men were is that some were in the rebel army, some in the Federal Army, and some in the State militia. But there was in 1863 a gain of 8 for the radical ticket and of 116 for the conservative ticket. How was that? Why, Mr. Nickel says that comparatively few of the State troops came back; that only half of the Federal troops came back; and that a majority of the rebel troops came back. The latter would, of course, throw their votes for the "Constitution as it is" men, as they now call themselves, although when the Clark resolution was submitted, declaring that the Constitution was sufficient for the preservation of the Union, the same party was rampant for its alteration.

Now, by way of testing this question absolutely, I lay down this position: General Loan's majority in 1862 was over 2,000. It is admitted that, in the main at least, the judicial election of 1863 was a fair one. Now the difference of votes in the five contested counties of the seventh congressional district of Missouri, if I am right in my computation, is 1,332. These, if any, must be the men who were kept away from the polls. There was only a difference of 1,332 votes between the congressional vote of 1862 and the judicial vote of 1863. If, therefore, you should give to Mr. Bruce all of these 1,332 votes that were not polled in the election of 1862 and were polled in the election of 1863, General Loan would still be left with a majority of about 700.

Mr. BRUCE, (contestant.) The difference between the vote of 1862 and the vote of 1863 is 3,437, not 1,332.

Mr. SMITHERS. I speak only of the difference in the counties about which there is any dispute here. The difference in the counties where there is no dispute can have nothing to do with this case. There is no testimony in relation to them, and the inference is that the vote there was a fair one. The difference in the contested counties between the vote of 1862 and the vote of 1863 was 1,332. Admitting that every one of these votes would have been cast for Mr. Bruce, still the majority of General Loan would have been from seven to eight hundred.

Mr. Speaker, I must ask pardon of the House for thus trespassing on its indulgence. As I said before, nothing but a sincere desire to secure to a loyal man the seat to which I believe he is rightfully entitled, and to the loyal people of Missouri a true Representative on this floor, has induced me to submit any observations whatever to the House.

Mr. BRUCE, (contestant.) I claim the indulgence of the House for a moment upon a single point. I find that four years ago in the contest between Blair and Barrett the honorable gentleman who is now at the head of the Committee of Elections submitted a resolution, which was adopted by the House, that the contestant had leave to speak for an hour, that the sitting member have two hours in which to reply, and that the contestant be then permitted to close the debate. It has been my rule in regard to quoting precedents to adduce such as may present themselves in my favor, and then to act upon them as may seem best; and I have endeavored with the sitting member in this case to arrange the order of debate between us without troubling the House with it, but he was unwilling to enter into any arrangement, preferring that the House should settle the matter.

What I now desire to ask the House is, that the privilege which has been extended to others situated like myself may be extended to me, and I trust the House will not require me to submit to anything less. I will ask the House, therefore, under the circumstances, without desiring to interfere with the public business—for the transaction of which I have as much solicitude as any member—that the sitting member go on and make his speech, giving to me the right of reply, and of only making one speech, although under the rule usually in force, having the affirmative, I should be entitled to two. I think that is as much as any one will ask of me. I do not desire to proceed, therefore, at this time until the sitting member shall have submitted his remarks.

Mr. LOAN. Under the usual practice of the House, I believe I am entitled to have the close of the debate. I do not know anything about the case he presents to the House, but I speak of the general practice. It is of course impossible to anticipate what the contestant will urge in support of his claim, or of the resolution reported by a majority of the committee. He holds the affirmative of this case, and I desire to hear what he has to allege in regard to the matter. It will then be my province to reply to that allegation, and I am not willing, unless by order of the House, to waive that privilege.

Mr. BRUCE. The gentleman can have that opportunity if he is willing to conform to the precedents in the Blair and Barrett case, and in the Vallandigham and Campbell case, in which the contestant first presented his case, which was replied to by the sitting member, and the debate then closed by the contestant.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that as the two gentlemen interested in this case have not been able to settle the order of debate between themselves, the Chair has been requested to suggest an arrangement of the matter. The Chair is anxious that they should agree between themselves, but he will state in reference to the precedents referred to by the contestant that one of them was not quite correctly stated. As the Chair recollects in the Vallandigham case, the sitting member did not speak at all.

Mr. BRUCE. Will the Chair allow me to say that in that case Mr. Campbell waived the right of reply, and the contestant continued his speech.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the proper way would be for the contestant to open, the sitting member to follow, and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GANSON,] representing the majority of the committee, to close the debate. The Chair finds in the case of Barrett against Blair, Mr. Phelps, of Missouri, at that time the father of the House, made this remark:

"During my service in this body in the various cases of contested elections that have arisen, whenever the contestant has been permitted to address the House he has presented his argument and the sitting member has replied; and so far as those two persons were concerned there was an end of that argument."

Mr. COX. Whose remark was that?

The SPEAKER. Mr. Phelps, of Missouri.

Mr. COX. Upon what case?

The SPEAKER. Upon the Blair and Barrett case. Mr. Phelps, then the oldest member of the House, proposed that the contestant should open with a speech of one hour, that the sitting member should then follow with a speech of two hours, and that the contestant should then have one hour for reply, which was adopted by unanimous consent, changing the practice as it had before existed. The Chair has merely stated these facts hoping that the sitting member and the contestant will agree as to the order of debate.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. I will make this motion: that the contestant have the privilege of addressing the House for an hour, that the sitting member have an hour and a half in which to respond, and that the contestant then have half an hour in which to close the debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that in the case referred to in 1860 the then Speaker decided that such a resolution would require unanimous consent, it being a change of the rules of the House.

Mr. COX. Is there any rule on this subject?

The SPEAKER. The hour rule.

Mr. COX. Let the gentleman modify his motion as to time and bring it properly before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that the contestant shall speak an hour, the sitting member an hour, and then the contestant half an hour. Is there objection to it?

Mr. SPALDING and Mr. SLOAN objected.

Mr. DAWES. The Chair has read correctly the remarks of Mr. Phelps in that case. I recollect that this side of the House took the opposite side of that view and insisted on it that the man who had the affirmative of the case, as every other plaintiff in court, had the right to close. They insisted upon it and enforced that ruling upon the sitting member in that case. Mr. Blair, the contestant in that case, was permitted to close on the sitting member, and the right was then given to the committee which it was entitled to under the rule to close the whole debate. It was a matter of considerable discussion in the House, this whole side of the House taking the position, and I think correctly—I certainly urged it myself, and all of this side stood by me in it—that when a man has the affirmative of the proposition in the report he has the right to close the argument. It was then stated that the committee had the right to close, and that in that way there would be two closings, but it was still insisted upon as the right of the contestant, he having the affirmative, as stated by the gentleman from Missouri, that he should have the right of closing. I did object then and I do object now to dividing up speeches.

But I do not care myself, and I never could understand what advantage there could be before an assemblage like this of speaking first or afterwards. It is entirely immaterial to me, and I only rise now to state what was the position of this side of the House in the Blair case. It is a matter of record, and does not rest upon the statement of any gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The paragraph which was read was one which fell from Mr. Phelps, who had served longer than any other member, and he stated what was the usage of the House. Whether it was or not the Chair is not advised, as he has not been able to trace the precedents. The gentleman is correct that he insisted then as he insists now.

Mr. DAWES. I am aware that Mr. Phelps urged the case of Mr. Barrett, but the Globe will bear me out in saying that at that time he was corrected by previous precedents. I do not rise for the purpose of asking that the contestant shall have the right to close. But I desire to call the attention of the House to the merits of this case some time to-day. I shall not be able to be here on Monday. After the contestant and sitting member have presented their views it may be the wish of the gentleman from Vermont or myself or some other member of the committee to present our view of the case.

The SPEAKER. As no gentleman is now claiming the floor the Chair will put the resolution to the House.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state my view in a word. It seems to me that it does not make any difference who has the closing speech, whether the contestant or the majority of the committee, but it would be unjust that there should be two closing speeches on one side. Arrange it in any other way and I am satisfied. I cannot think myself that it would be right to allow two speeches on one side to close.

Mr. COX. I understand that the gentleman from New York [Mr. GANSON] proposes to yield his place to the contestant to close the debate. If so, then the matter may be amicably arranged. There will then be only one speech for the contestant in closing.

Mr. GANSON. I do not want any arrangement made which will cut off the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] from making the remarks which I understand he desires to make.

The SPEAKER. It will not cut off the gentleman from Massachusetts. The Chair hears no objection to the proposition that the contestant shall take the place of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GANSON] to close the debate.

Mr. ASHLEY made a remark inaudible to the reporter.

Mr. BRUCE. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio, in order to remove all difficulty, that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] will go on with his speech.

Mr. HIGBY. I object to any arrangement which does not provide that the contestant shall open the case. It is just and fair that he should. It is according to the course of all judicial proceedings.

The SPEAKER. The previous proposition of the gentleman from Ohio has been adopted by unanimous consent. It was agreed that the contestant should have the closing speech, which belongs to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GANSON.]

Mr. ASHLEY. Gentlemen upon this side of the House did not understand the matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated it distinctly to the House, and asked whether there was any objection. The Chair heard none.

Mr. SMITHERS. I appealed to the Chair at the time to know what the proposition was.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman states that he objected, the Chair will put the question again.

Mr. BRUCE. I want to know what the understanding is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio made a suggestion, and the Chair put it to the House and asked if there was unanimous consent that the sitting member should speak first and the contestant occupy the time assigned by the rules to the gentleman from New York, and the Chair heard no objection. Gentlemen upon the left of the Chair now state that they did not understand the matter.

Mr. BRUCE. I ask to have the question put over again.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks again, is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GRINNELL. I object.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. I now renew my proposition, and hope that there will be no objection, that the contestant may speak one hour, the sitting member an hour and a half, and the contestant to close with half an hour, that is the closing arrangement of the debate. In the mean time the gentleman from Massachusetts and others may occupy the floor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the proposition is agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I did not intend to participate in the debate upon the pending proposition. But this is not a common case, and is not to be governed by the precedents of any cases which have gone before it. It has its origin in circumstances that have no parallel in history. This rebellion, under which the nation now staggers, as it progresses, every day develops new difficulties, which are to be overcome by the patriotic heart of the nation, and are not to be governed by any of the precedents of the past. They are to be met and to be overcome by the best judgment and conclusion we can arrive at under the new system in which we live, under a Government which took for itself no pattern when it sprang into existence, and which is to be preserved, if it be preserved, by following none of the rules that have governed others in suppressing rebellion or in defeating conspiracies to overthrow the Government.

It is under circumstances like these that I find in this examination that this enemy has discovered a new avenue by which he hopes to approach to the very citadel of the Government, and aim a blow at the vital part of it. In the beginning it commenced by convincing the then Chief Magistrate of the Government that there was no power existing to coerce a State into obedience to law. Further on, as this rebellion progressed, he discovered, or thought he discovered, other methods by which to overcome the power of the nation in putting it down. He resorted to the writ of habeas corpus, and attacked the constitutionality of the law which exacted of the citizens, who owed fealty to the Government, their services in sustaining it. He has approached it in every way; but the most subtle and the most dangerous of all his approaches, and that which in my judgment requires the watchful and constant care and eagle eye of those who have the administration of the laws, and are bound in conformity to their oaths to preserve the Government, is his attempt to overthrow it at the ballot-box. The dangerous and insidious character of this arises from the peculiarity of our Constitution.

In this way treason itself can reach the vitals of this Government, while it could not in any other Government, because this is the only Government founded upon the ballot-box for its support. This is the only Government whose vitality is fed from the ballot-box, and if he who hates and attempts to destroy it can reach the ballot-box, he strikes it where no other Government can be struck, and he strikes it a blow which is more fatal because more insidious, because, in the name of the very law he seeks to destroy through the instrumentality of the machinery of the very Government he is plotting to overthrow, does he seek to accomplish his purposes.

Therefore, sir, it is, in my belief, incumbent upon him whose duty it is to maintain the Government and the laws to guard that most faithfully, more faithfully here than at any other point. If it is his duty to set a picket to guard the Army, if it is his duty to set a sentry to guard any post, it is his duty to set a double sentry here whenever he has occasion to believe that the enemy of the Government is about to take possession of the polls, and through the polls to reach the Government. It is his duty to be there with just so much force, with just such energy, with just such solicitude as is sufficient to accomplish that great end which should govern him in the administration of the Government at this time, to wit, to sustain the Republic. And therefore, sir, it is that I have no word of complaint or censure upon the Administration for its action in placing soldiers at the ballot-box on election day. I do not complain that it has occupied election districts or whole States if the result is the introduction upon this floor of such distinguished Representatives as my friend from Delaware, [Mr. SMITHERS,] or my friend who now represents in this House the seventh congressional district of Missouri, [Mr. LOAN.] I do not complain that such men are here.

I am unfortunate in having forgotten, in the view I have been compelled to take in this case, what a distinguished member of this House declared to me in chiding me for my conclusion this morning, that possibly I might deprive a gentleman of his seat in this House who would vote with me. Sir, I forgot all this or I might possibly have been led to a different conclusion. Permit me to say to my friend from Delaware [Mr. SMITHERS] that I can easily see how he may take the view of this case that he does. He looks upon it from a different stand-point. He has unfortunately lived in a different atmosphere from what I have; and he has felt the necessity of the presence, to some extent, of United States troops in his district, and if he has profited by it, of course we must make allowance for the frailty of human nature. I doubt not that under similar circumstances I should have given a different coloring to the evidence in this case.

I uphold the Government in what it has done. I hold it to be its bounden duty to keep every traitor from the ballot-box. Such is the framework and system and theory of our Government that in this crisis, without that care of the ballot-box, the Government cannot be sustained.

This, sir, is the duty of the Executive, who is furnished with means by both Houses of Congress. Clothed with power to call upon the Army and Navy of the nation, he was bound to take care that it received no detriment. But there is a duty incumbent upon this House, imposed upon it by the Constitution, and without which this House can no more stand as the representative of the free people of this nation than republican government can stand without an Executive who will defend it from treason in whatever approach it may make to it.

What is that duty of this House? It is its duty to see to it that the election of its members is free. Unless the men who hold their seats in this House hold them by the choice of a free people, I care not how they come here, whence they come, or who they be, it is fatal to the existence of this House as the Representatives of a free people.

It is no justification that the men who are put into seats here without the free choice of those they assume to represent are with us and concur with us in the measures we hold most dear, and in the efforts we are making on this floor to protect and to save the nation. It makes no difference, if the nation can be saved without it.

Sir, there is no sacrifice that I am not willing to make to uphold this Government. But the question for the House to determine is whether it is possible for the Executive to see to it by the presence of armed men in every election district where rebellion and treason have existed that no traitor approaches the polls, and at the same time for this House to assert the freedom of elections. It seems, at first sight, to be an impossibility. There seems to be an unfortunate incongruity and conflict of duties in this Government, growing out of the anomalous condition of things in this rebellion.

I think, Mr. Speaker, speaking only for myself and not for other members of the committee, that I can see clearly the path of duty here in this House, whereby this result will be obtained; that the President in the discharge of his duty shall take care that treason keeps away from the ballot-box, and that we in the discharge of our duty shall take care that the election of our members shall be free, as the Constitution enjoins that it shall be. And how, sir? Send your troops into these districts. It is a most delicate trust and duty to be discharged by the Executive. He alone is to judge of the necessity of it in these times. I will not hold him to a rigid rule, or pass an unkind or uncandid judgment on his acts or on the acts of those who act under him in the administering of the law. I know it is a duty which is more than all others liable to abuse. It so connects itself with the passions of men, it so joins itself with the conflicting interests of partisans, that he would be a wonderful man in the execution of those orders who could walk perfectly upright and on a straight line, leaning neither to the one side nor to the other. So I am prepared to find abuses. I am prepared to look upon them as necessities, almost, growing out of the delicate nature of the trust imposed upon the President.

But, sir, when the presence of the military in a district, made necessary by the strength of the rebellion and the purpose of the rebellion to approach the polls and through them reach the life of the Government itself, has gone to the extent not only of keeping treason away from the polls, but also of giving direction to the election, of dictating, of directing, of controlling, more or less, the results of an election; where anybody has been so indiscreet as to permit the very men, with straps on their shoulders, charged with the commission of regulating the polls, to be themselves the candidates for the offices, I submit that the House owes it to itself to accept that condition of things and to say that under such circumstances there can be no election. That is the ground I occupy here to-day in relation to this case. Upholding the Government in all that it did, upholding the officials in all their intention at the outset as to the presence of the rebels in that district, it is perfectly clear to my mind that there came on the loyal men of that district, and on men in it who were authorized by the very laws of Missouri to vote, whether sympathizing with this rebellion or not; there came upon them such a terror, that to call this and baptize it an election is blasphemy in the presence of the Republic.

Sir, if this testimony left my mind in doubt I should have felt it incumbent upon me to take precisely the same position that I have taken; for I should have leaned toward the freedom of election. If I had any doubt upon the testimony as to whether or not there was freedom in this election I should certainly have taken the same position. And, sir, I would have been quite as willing to do it, lest it might appear to the world that I undertook to secure strength to myself by putting in a seat here a man who would vote for me; rather than follow the injunction of the gentleman who undertook to school me in this House to vote for retaining certain men here because we want their votes, that argument was quite a reason for me why I would not do so. For, sir, I would count it a good time, I would embrace it as an opportunity afforded us to testify to the world and to the enemies of this Administration—I would bear a testimony which would be unequivocal and have no uncertain sound—that the purpose of the Administration in all this interference with elections was, not to secure men upon this floor to vote as we wanted them, but that it was solely and simply to keep treason from reaching the Government through the ballot-box. I wanted to show that whenever the Administration was obliged to do that to such an extent as that the men entitled to vote could not go up freely and undisturbedly and exercise the elective franchise, it was not to carry an election, but to secure freedom of election. I would testify to the gentlemen on the other side that the Administration does not care to carry an election by any such means as those. I would bear testimony here and make it a precedent for all time, so that the gentlemen on the other side could not charge that the purpose of the Government in interfering with elections through the military was to secure power, while it only was to put down treason. That is my position.

I have only to say that I submit to my friends upon this side of the House that they throw away, by the determination which I see they have entered into, an opportunity they will never have again for spiking that gun aimed at them during the last year and a half, by bearing testimony in acts incontrovertible that the sole purpose of this Administration in putting a military power into Delaware, into the seventh congressional district of Missouri, into Maryland, and wherever else they have felt it their duty to put a military power at the ballot-box, was not to secure the election of particular men, but that it was for the purpose of keeping treason away from the life and vitals of the Republic.

And, sir, whenever that occasion shall come, as it has come in the district now under consideration, I hold it to be our bounden duty to bear testimony to the purity of purpose on the part of the Administration by saying to these gentlemen that neither of them have come into this House clothed with the free voice of the people of that district.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to permit me to say that it seems to me a false issue has been tendered to the House in regard to the political standing of the sitting member and contestant, but inasmuch as it has been brought into this discussion, and not by me, I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether the evidence before the committee does not disclose the fact that Major Bruce, the contestant, has on every occasion manifested very great zeal and earnestness in every effort to put down this rebellion, and in supporting the war policy in Missouri; as much active zeal for that purpose as he was capable of doing?

Mr. DAWES. To those who have waged this war of political opinions I leave to answer the question of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. VOORHEES. I would certainly not have introduced this question into the House but for the fact that I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to allude to the issue having been made by another colleague on the Committee of Elections.

Mr. SMITHERS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana to which of his colleagues on the committee he refers in that connection?

Mr. VOORHEES. I refer to that colleague of whom the gentleman from Massachusetts spoke when he alluded to the argument that a vote was desired upon the other side of the House, and that the matter was to be determined upon that ground rather than the merits of the case.

Mr. SMITHERS. I did not understand the gentleman from Massachusetts as attributing that position to any member of the committee.

Mr. VOORHEES. I did.

Mr. DAWES. I acquit any member of the committee of expressing that opinion.

Mr. VOORHEES. I may have misunderstood the gentleman. I certainly should not have introduced this issue into the consideration of the question before the House.

Mr. DAWES. I take great pleasure in saying that the members of the committee have read the evidence, and, so far as I am aware, arrived at their conclusions without knowing whether the sitting member or the contestant had any politics or not.

Mr. VOORHEES. The gentleman will then allow me to say that I was led into an error by inferring from a remark of the gentleman from Massachusetts that this position was assumed by a member of the committee. Nevertheless, the fact has been brought before the committee, and I desire therefore to ask the gentleman the question whether the evidence does not disclose the fact that the contestant did support the war policy in Missouri.

Mr. DAWES. I know of no testimony before the committee that would lead me to make any distinction between these gentlemen in their efforts to suppress the rebellion, nor do I know of any testimony showing that any man offered to vote and was driven away from the polls because he was not, under the laws of Missouri, entitled to vote. It was not claimed before the committee that any man who desired to deposit his vote and failed to do so, failed because he was not entitled by law to vote.

But that is not what I am discussing. Mr. Speaker, the case, to my mind, was decided upon these considerations which I have attempted to submit to the House. It was decided, sir, upon considerations growing out of the nature of the provision here, and of the conflict which appeared to the minds of some members of the committee as to the duty of the Executive relative to the election and our own duty. It seemed to be assumed that the people were to yield here the right of freedom of election touching this House when the necessities of the Government require the presence of military to keep the rebels away.

But, sir, the minority of this committee have made up figures and cast up majorities to show that the contestant could not under any circumstances have received a majority of these votes, as if they could apply the rules of arithmetic to measure the extent of the conflict between duty and safety in the minds of the voters! Can arithmetic apply to the rumors that were set afloat by which the minds of the electors in the different counties were filled with a vague and undefined apprehension in reference to the presence of the military there? It was given out by men who had charge of the polls and who were at the same time running for office that a certain course would be pursued in reference to a certain class of men. Just as if the gentlemen of the minority of the committee could tell, when it was known to a whole city that the entrance to the polls was guarded by crossed bayonets, and that no man could approach them unless the ballot he carried bore the right name! As if you could measure such a state of things by the rules of addition and subtraction and tell how many men were kept away from the polls by that knowledge! And then to apply to it the rules of hearsay testimony; to apply to it the rule which would govern the trial of a twenty shilling case in a justice's court at cross-roads!

Sir, it is to be governed by no such narrow and belittling rules as that. The presence of this terror created by glittering bayonets and official orders and arrests cannot be denied any more than our presence here can be denied. It existed in the atmosphere. It pervaded every branch of business. Men in their houses and when they were out of their houses knew and talked about it. And yet it cannot be proved as a fact here, because in a justice's court it would be called hearsay evidence. It is asked after we have done these things that we shall sit here and take the benefit of them ourselves. That is the point of it—taking the benefit of what you yourselves have done, and giving the enemies of the Administration the assurance that you did it not for the purpose of keeping treason from the ballot-box but for the purpose of securing power. As I have said, I can understand why my distinguished friend from Delaware [Mr. SMITHERS] can look on this thing differently from what I do, or from what my friend from Vermont does. But I cannot understand how a Massachusetts man can take up this book and read it and go home to Massachusetts and say by his vote here or by his action he omitted to condemn these proceedings.

Mr. ELIOT. As a Massachusetts man I have been guided by one rule in determining upon evidence that has been submitted, and that was to take the testimony as applicable to the facts. I have read this testimony with great care, and I undertake to say it would be an utter impossibility to demonstrate before any tribunal that the result of the election in the seventh district of Missouri was affected in anywise whatever by anything that took place in that district which is there proved. I find seventeen witnesses were examined—

Mr. DAWES. That will do.

Mr. ELIOT. No, it will not do.

Mr. DAWES. I did not yield the floor that the gentleman might argue the case in my time.

Mr. ELIOT. Why was I called on?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield further.

Mr. ELIOT. Then I beg the gentleman will not call on me if he will not give me leave to say why I am prepared to go home to Massachusetts and sustain the vote I intend to give in this case.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman need not have taken that entirely to himself. I know my colleague has studied this case thoroughly and weighed it carefully; because I know my colleague would not undertake to express a judgment upon it until he had. And that led me, most respectfully I trust—and I shall venture, perhaps, to repeat it—to express my surprise that my colleague could come to the conclusion which I knew he had come to, and which he has expressed here, that there was nothing in this case which called for his censure. I have looked with some anxiety through all these pages of views submitted by the minority to find some word of condemnation, some expression of disapprobation, of the conduct which took place at these elections, that would lead me to the comforting conclusion that they had reluctantly made up their minds to sustain this gentleman in his seat upon the proof of the result of this election.

While I admit that my colleague from Massachusetts, as well as my colleagues upon the committee, are as honest, as sincere, and as candid as I am, and their judgment entitled to just as much weight, I have this to say, that there is matter in this testimony that I would rather have my right hand cut off than by any vote of mine here to sanction and approve of either as to the form or substance of the election. Others may think differently, and they of course will discharge their duty with the same sincerity I claim for myself. When I go home to Massachusetts I shall have the satisfaction of saying that I presented to my friends in this House a path of duty which seemed to me so plain that I could not see why all would not walk in it—a course whereby the Administration would be vindicated in all it has done in reference to all the elections in the rebellious States, and at the same time the House of Representatives have asserted the highest prerogative guaranteed to it by the Constitution, the freedom of the election of its members. I do not doubt the result. I see very plainly from suggestions thrown out here this morning that our friends do not care to vindicate the Administration in this regard.

I have done my duty and have endeavored to arrive at my conclusions without considering whether the result would be to fix or unfix any man in his seat here, and I have tried to reconcile the testimony here with my convictions of duty to the Administration. And, sir, this talk about hearsay testimony as a means of escaping from testimony that stands out as clear as the noonday sun, proven as it must be proved, and as it is only in the power of man to prove it, this means of frittering away all its force pains me because I think it reaches beyond the value of any member's right to a seat here. It reaches beyond and casts a stain upon the escutcheon of this Administration, and it proclaims to the world what there is no necessity of proclaiming, and it puts a volunteer load upon our shoulders. And all this when there seems to me another path which will secure glorious ends, a path in which I have found myself treading more firmly every day since the report was made, and more so than ever since I have heard the discussion of gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he considers it a proper consideration in an election case, what effect the judgment of the House will have upon the prospects of the Administration before the people? And then I want him to answer me what it has to do with an election case here what the people of Massachusetts may think of our action?

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman will put his questions separately I will endeavor to answer him.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The first question is, whether it is a proper consideration in concluding an election case, the effect our votes may have upon the prospects of the Administration before the country?

Mr. DAWES. I did not think it was until I was told so this morning by one who said he must therefore vote the minority report for the purpose of the strength it will give us. [Laughter.] I have tried in my whole speech to enter my protest against it.

Mr. DAVIS. The other question is what the opinion of Massachusetts upon an election case has to do with the judgment of this House?

Mr. DAWES. I will tell the gentleman that a Massachusetts man and a Delaware man, weighing the testimony here, came to different conclusions about it, and it occurred to my mind that they might both be honest, and that the reason they came to different conclusions was that one or the other of them might have had some of the bacon.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The gentleman has not answered the question I put to him. Now let him answer it. What has it to do with the judgment this House shall render upon this case, what the people of Massachusetts may think about it, or what gentlemen may have to answer when they go home to their constituents? Are we to render a certain judgment here for fear that Massachusetts may not approve of what we do?

Mr. DAWES. No man has uttered any such sentiment here since I have commenced the discussion of this subject.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I heard the gentleman from Massachusetts himself say, "How will gentlemen from Massachusetts answer when they get home?"

Mr. DAWES. I said, Mr. Speaker, that I could not understand how any Massachusetts man, educated as a Massachusetts man, where they open the town meetings with prayer and go up to the ballot-box as they go up to discharge their duties in conference meetings, could come to the conclusion that, in a case where a ballot was put in only at the point of the bayonet, it can be denominated an election. I could not understand that, but I could understand why gentlemen who occupy another stand-point, gentlemen who come from regions where the rebellion has been rampant, and where the Government of the United States has had to declare whole States under martial law, where they have had to people the country with soldiers with bristling bayonets; when men have come out of an election held under such circumstances into seats here, I can understand how they can honestly think that such a proceeding is an election. That is what I said.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Where was there such an election? I have not heard of one. [Laughter from the Democratic side of the House.]

Mr. SMITHERS. The gentleman from Massachusetts, with whom I have served on the Committee of Elections, and for whom I have the highest regard, has allowed himself from some cause this afternoon to become unwontedly excited, and just now he dropped a remark which I am sure in his calmer moments he will feel sorry for, and which I cannot believe that he means. If I understood his expression correctly, it was an allusion to "the gentleman from Delaware," to whom he has seen fit to allude, and he said that the judgment of the gentleman from Delaware was affected because—and here he used a slang phrase—he had a party to beat. Am I right in saying that the gentleman from Massachusetts used that expression?

Mr. DAWES. I used the expression generally. The gentleman from Delaware was in haste to take it to himself.

Mr. SMITHERS. Do I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to imply by that remark that in his judgment I have come to the conclusion I have in this case because my seat or any interest of mine might by possibility have been affected by a contrary decision?

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman seems to think that I have got greatly excited. I can only say that he has got greatly cooled off since he was on the floor, and probably the excitement he let off has got into me.

As to the other matter I will say that it is pretty difficult for me to say how he understands my remarks. He asks me if he understands me so and so. How can I answer such a question? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITHERS. I ask the gentleman did he mean that?

Mr. DAWES. The relations between the gentleman from Delaware and myself have always been, and, so far as I am concerned, will continue to be such that the gentleman from Delaware has no right to take any remarks I have made in any offensive sense.

Mr. SMITHERS. Very well; with that understanding I am perfectly satisfied.

Mr. DAWES. I said of myself, however, conscious of my own infirmities, that the testimony would be colored in my judgment if I occupied the stand-point of the gentleman from Delaware. I only said it of myself, and I said it with a feeling that I am infirm and a consciousness that I am not always able to weigh testimony without some sort of influence from my feelings, locality, and education. I illustrated my idea by comparing the mode of voting in Massachusetts with that in this case, which started up my amiable colleague from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT,] and my pleasant friend from Delaware. I did it without meaning any offense. And then came my friend from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] whose elections for the last three or four years have been conducted with such peace and quiet as to set an example to the whole country, and where order has always reigned supreme. [Laughter.] My friend from Maryland, educated in such a school and defending such elections, cannot be expected to look upon this case in the same way that a Massachusetts man does who goes to the election under such troublesome and turbid circumstances. Certainly not. [Laughter.] How could the gentleman from Maryland and the gentleman from the seventh congressional district of Missouri do it? I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that we take our lives in our hands in Massachusetts when we go to the polls. [Laughter.] We are obliged to defend ourselves. If there are no midnight cabals in the gentleman's district in Baltimore, if there are no dens where they coop up voters, and from which the Plug Uglies and others go forth, he must not assume that there are none in Massachusetts and Vermont. He must certainly not assume that we of Vermont and Massachusetts have not been schooled by necessity into defending ourselves at the ballot-box against such men. He must be charitable, I submit, and my friend from Delaware must, I submit, be charitable to us, if we cannot come to the same conclusion upon the testimony as they do.

Mr. SMITHERS. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that I have not in any degree impeached the motives of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and that the first stone was thrown by him; and he has persistently kept throwing them until now. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. I take them all back. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITHERS. That is perfectly satisfactory. I know that the feelings and relations which exist between the gentleman and myself are of the kindest and pleasantest character.

Mr. WHALEY. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee of Elections one question. It appears that the sitting member [Mr. LOAN] received 2,028 majority; the question I desire to ask is, whether the gentleman from Massachusetts thinks that the evidence before his committee is sufficient to show that the military interference in this election changed the result to the extent of 2,028 votes?

Mr. DAWES. There was no doubt left upon my mind that there might have been counted for the sitting member just as many votes as he might desire. That it was a little over 2,000 did not astonish me half as much as that it was not over 4,000. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHALEY. It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that there has not been a single instance where a man presented himself for a seat on this floor from south of Mason and Dixon's line that the gentleman from Massachusetts did not report against him. The gentleman pursues the same policy as that advocated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LONG.] If the gentleman from Massachusetts does not desire to admit any man south of Mason and Dixon's line as a member of this House, he should unite his destinies with those of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LONG,] and those of the gentlemen from Maryland, [Mr. HARRIS,] [Laughter.] I would tell the gentleman that I do not design to become his competitor on the McClellan ticket for Vice President. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from West Virginia should not succeed in getting more votes than those which he represented here in the last Congress he is the last man I should want to have on any ticket with me. [Laughter.] I also desire to say that the gentleman from West Virginia, when he says that I have gone against every man from south of Mason and Dixon's line, is entirely mistaken.

Mr. WHALEY. I should like the gentleman to show us the instance.

Mr. DAWES. I voted here against my party friends in this House for Representatives from south of Mason and Dixon's line until my friends were compelled, all of them but some twenty-eight, to come up and put in two men from Louisiana. I contended here until two members from Tennessee were installed in their places. Why? Not because they came without votes and slid in, but because they were the free choice of the voters of the district. Not exactly according to law, but because, which is worth more than all the forms of law, they had the voice of the voters in their favor, in one instance 8,000 strong, and in the other instance all of the voters who desired to go to the polls. That is my position. But as to others, who came here claiming seats as Representatives from south of Mason and Dixon's line, they could show no such title to a seat.

Mr. WHALEY. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that in the nineteen counties which I have the honor to represent, we had several thousand men in the Army—brave mountaineers, fighting the battles of the country—and notwithstanding that, I received a large vote.

Mr. DAWES. How many votes did you get for last Congress?

Mr. WHALEY. I acknowledge it was small, but according to the constitution of Virginia and of the United States. The gentleman will consider that the Richmond convention passed an ordinance prohibiting the election of members to the United States Congress, and almost the entire district was overrun by armed rebels, and not a single Federal soldier at that time had set foot on Virginia soil. The loyal people did the best they could under the circumstances.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from West Virginia never brought the figures before the Committee of Elections.

Mr. WHALEY. My seat was not contested, but Mr. Burnett, of Kentucky, offered a resolution declaring that WILLIAM G. BROWN, JOHN S. CARLILE, and myself were not entitled to seats, and it received three votes. All three of them, at the expiration of the July session, went to the support of Jeff. Davis. If the gentleman will allow the brave troops whom I have helped to organize to come back and take part in the elections, we will use no muskets and no bayonets, and I believe that in proportion to the population I will get as many votes as the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WILSON. Will the gentleman from West Virginia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WHALEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON. I simply wish to remind the gentleman from Massachusetts who has mentioned the Louisiana case, that at the time that election was held and those two gentlemen were sent here as Representatives from that State, there were no military forces in Louisiana, no bayonets at the elections, and no Massachusetts generals to control the elections.

Mr. WHALEY. I cannot yield. I want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I carried my gun and knapsack after I had served one term in Congress. I have organized as many regiments probably as any member of this House, and I should like to know where the gentleman from Massachusetts can show that record. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. Let me say to the gentleman that—

Mr. WHALEY. No; wait until I get through. You have a reputation for talent, but none for gunpowder. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. I will say—

Mr. WHALEY. No, sir, not till I get through. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Massachusetts has had, I believe, the attention of the House more than any other man in this body, except the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. He can attract as much attention in the House as any other man. He has only to ask for the attention of the House, and attention is always given him. And now I hope he will give me his attention. I am only a backwoodsman, [laughter,] only an ordinary man, with no pretension to talents, nor anything of the kind, only a soldier; but I say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that his speech will fall upon the Union men of every border State like a shower-bath; and I hope it will fall upon his constituents in the same way. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen upon the other side of the House have said to us in private circles, "You do not vote with us." Well, sir, we came here in good faith, and have done what we could to restore the Government. But, on the other hand, gentlemen on this side of the House say to us, "You vote with the abolitionists." Let me tell them that we are honest, that we are trying to restore this Government. But when you undertake to carry out the policy of ignoring the southern States altogether, I say to you that such a policy will not be sustained by the loyal people of any State. Why, sir, in my district there were, as I understand, two or three small precincts where the people did not dare vote for me because they were afraid I was a copperhead. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, in reference to the people of Massachusetts I have nothing to say, but when they send a Representative here and he becomes the chairman of an important committee in this House and as such proposes to ignore and disfranchise the loyal people of the border States of the South as well as the two hundred thousand of their brave heroes now fighting in the field, I think it is time for them to take the matter into serious consideration.

PORT PILLOW MASSACRE REPORT.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That forty thousand extra copies of the report of the joint committee on the conduct of the war, &c., with the accompanying testimony in relation to the late massacre at Fort Pillow, be printed for the use of the members of the House.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House decided that when it adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next. The motion was agreed to; and the question recurred on the motion to adjourn over.

Mr. VOORHEES. I made the motion because I understand there is a desire to discuss this contested-election case to-morrow, and I hope that there will be a general understanding that no vote shall be taken on the report to-morrow.

The proposition was assented to.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I hope not. There will be nobody here to hear the debate if it is understood that there is to be no vote taken.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I was originally in favor of the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to adjourn over, but upon reflection I think it would not be proper to take to-morrow simply for discussion. I do not know what the earlier part of this discussion may have turned on, but since I have been in the Hall the question has been mooted whether there are any Representatives from the slave States in this House. I want to settle that question, and I hope it will be done upon discussion when the House is full.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask leave to make a brief statement. A large number of gentlemen have left; the question is a very important one, and, as has been suggested, they ought to have a chance to vote, having left on the faith of the order of the House for adjournment over. They ought to have an opportunity to hear this discussion. I voted against the adjournment over.

Mr. GRINNELL. I understand it is the practice of gentlemen who live near the capital to go home and leave the rest here until August.

Mr. KELLEY. It is not my custom, and I voted against the adjournment this morning.

Mr. VOORHEES. I understand that it is the wish of both the sitting member and the contestant that the House should adjourn over.

The SPEAKER. If the House adjourns over this case will come up the first thing after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. ELIOT. I understand that debate has not been closed in the case.

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. ALLEY demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 59, noes 27.

So the motion to adjourn over was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. SHANNON, (at half past five o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned till Monday next.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, May 7, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND:

Almighty and Everlasting God! We beseech Thee be favorable unto the prayer of Thy servants which we make this day in Thy sight; for we would evermore in this high place of the nation acknowledge Thee. We believe with all believers throughout all ages on earth and in heaven in God the Father Almighty, the Creator of the world, and in Jesus Christ, His only Son, our Saviour, and in His Advent and Mission; in His Passion and Resurrection and Ascension into Heaven. We believe in the Holy Ghost, in the Holy Catholic Church, in the Communion of Saints, in the forgiveness of sins, in the resurrection of the body, and in the life everlasting. We believe in Thy righteous providence over men and nations, and especially do we believe in Thy care of our own nation from the beginning, even until now, albeit we are lying under the hand of Thy chastisement and are sorely afflicted. Wherefore we entreat Thee, O Lord our God, to hear us in this day of trouble. Spare Thy people, and give not Thy heritage to reproach; for to whom shall we look but unto Thee, O Lord, who hast set so great a mystery in the earth, even that mystery of suffering which, nevertheless, bears in it a beauty more divine than all the rapt visions of nature or of art. Wherefore our young nation, becoming voluptuous and verging upon those fearful perils of pride and luxury and fullness of bread which have swallowed up and destroyed so many States and cities, has been thrown into the burning furnace of her affliction that she may come forth again, not in the harlot's meretricious gauds and ornaments, but in the saintly purity and white-robed innocence of a noble matron fit to be the mother of children from whom shall spring the future heroes, martyrs, and chieftains of the world.

O Lord, our God, we beseech Thee, therefore, in this hour of our greatest anxiety and suspense, to give us patience and fortitude against all our fears. Hold in Thy hand the President, the Cabinet, the Congress, the State and municipal authorities, the Army, the Navy, and the whole people, not to destroy, but to deliver and to save. Lay upon all minds an inspiration from above. Walk with this people as Thou didst aforetime with Thy servants in the seven-fold heated furnace, for in Thy presence and favor the very fears of our nation shall be holier than the dews of heaven, and radiant, far more radiant, to reveal our great and coming destiny than all the pearls that have ever glittered upon the necks of queens.

And now, O Lord our God, if the prayers of Thy servant in this high place shall be ended, and with many affecting memories and standing visions of these great times he shall pass away, nevertheless, henceforth as heretofore, may the blessing of Thine eternal covenant abide upon the Senate of our country. Into Thy keeping do we most earnestly commit all these Thy servants. May they stand before Thee as the just lawgivers and the wise counselors of a mighty people in this greatest and most fearful passage of their history, honored while they live with the gratitude of their fellow-countrymen, and when they die, accepted with abundant joy into the presence of Thy glorious Throne. And unto the name of God the Father, and God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, will we ascribe all the praise, now and forever. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMODORE WILKES.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I gave notice to the Senate some days since that it was very important to act on two or three Indian bills as soon as possible, and I now desire to have those bills taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will pause until the Chair ascertains whether there are any more reports from committees, which are first in order.

Mr. WILSON. It is necessary that we should have an executive session for a few moments, and it is of great importance that it should be at the earliest possible moment. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in the consideration of executive business, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Kansas, it was Ordered, That the official members of the Episcopal church, Wyandott and Quindaro mission, Kansas conference, have leave to withdraw their petition and other papers from the files of the Senate.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. FOOT. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 16th of April, information in relation to the proposed change of the south front of the Treasury building, have had the same under consideration, and directed me to report the following resolution as the judgment of the committee. I ask for the present consideration of this resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to make the proposed change.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. The select committee on slavery and freedmen, to whom was referred a petition of natives of Louisiana and citizens of the United States of African descent, praying that all the citizens of Louisiana of African descent born free before the rebellion may be admitted to the rights and privileges of electors; also sundry other petitions of colored citizens of the United States, praying that the elective franchise may be granted to the colored people of the United States, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report them back with a recommendation that they be referred to the Committee on Territories, which, by vote of the Senate, has that whole subject under consideration.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 159) for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, recommending an appropriation to pay the interest due the Orchard Party and First Christian Party of New York Indians, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

No. 132) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, which, by direction of the committee, he intended to propose when the bill should be taken up for consideration; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WADE. The committee on the conduct of the war, at the request of the Secretary of War, have visited our released prisoners at Annapolis and Baltimore, and have directed me to make a report accompanied by the evidence taken by the committee. I move that twenty thousand copies of the report and evidence be printed for the use of the Senate, and be printed with the report relative to the capture of Fort Pillow, as a part of the same document.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up Senate bill No. 266. It is a bill to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. I hope not until the morning business is gone through with.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will give way for morning business after I get the bill up.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senate will go on with the morning business. Resolutions have not yet been called for. I do not think it is exactly fair—I do not mean to intimate anything unfair to the Senator from Michigan—it is not exactly a fair way to take up a bill during the morning hour and then for a Senator to say after it is taken up I will give way and let in other business. It gives an undue advantage. I hope the ordinary course of business will be adhered to, and that the Senate will not sanction that mode of doing business. I have a resolution that I desire to introduce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan to take up the bill indicated by him.

The motion was not agreed to.

ELECTION OF CHAPLAIN.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Senate will on Wednesday next, at fifteen minutes after twelve o'clock, proceed to the choice of a Chaplain of the Senate.

TROUBLES BETWEEN CHILI AND BOLIVIA.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not inconsistent with the public interests, to furnish to the Senate copies of any recent correspondence of the minister of the United States at Chili relating to the existing troubles between Chili and Bolivia.

CONDITION OF CONGRESSIONAL CHAMBERS.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I submit the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint select committee, to consist of three members on the part of each House, be appointed by the respective Presiding Officers to examine into the present condition of the Senate Chamber and Hall of the House of Representatives, as regards the lighting, heating, ventilation, and hearing; and the defects and disadvantages existing in the same; and that the said committee obtain from Charles F. Anderson, architect, a statement of the principles upon which he proposes to regulate these particulars, with a view to their improvement, so as to secure the better adaptation of these Halls to the purposes of legislation and the preservation of the health of those occupying them; and that the committee also obtain a statement or estimate of the expense that will attend the necessary alterations, and the probable time that will be required for making them; and the said committee shall be authorized to make report by bill or otherwise at the present or next regular session of Congress.

If there is no objection, I should like to have the resolution considered at the present time.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. I will inquire of the Senator whether it would not be better for the Senate to confine its inquiry to its own Hall, without undertaking to institute an inquiry with regard to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BUCKALEW. This subject is being acted upon by the House of Representatives, and it is the desire of the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings in that branch that the subject shall assume this form. I think there will be great convenience in having the joint action of both Houses on the subject. I have consulted with the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings of the Senate and also of the House of Representatives, and they agree in this proposed direction of the subject.

Mr. SUMNER. I am clearly of opinion that something ought to be done. My only question was how we should approach the business, and on that I have no opinion which is so positive as to induce me even to make a suggestion counter to the proposition before the Senate.

The resolution was adopted.

MINT AT SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. CONNESS. I move now to postpone all prior orders and take up Senate bill No. 176. It is a bill that was reported from the Committee on Finance a long time since, and will excite no particular debate, I think. I ask the Senate to take it up. The Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER,] who is so anxious to get up another bill, can have the floor next.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 176) authorizing the erection of buildings for the branch mint at San Francisco. It appropriates the sum of $300,000 to be expended, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the erection of a suitable building or buildings for the use of the branch mint at San Francisco, in the State of California.

Mr. CONNESS. In the sixth line of the bill after the word "in" I move to insert the words "the purchase of a site, if necessary, and;" so that it will read:

To be expended, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the purchase of a site, if necessary, and the erection of a suitable building; &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. What is the amount of the appropriation contained in the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. COLLAMER. I will inquire of the gentleman from California whether such an amount as that is needed now when a mint has been established in Oregon?

Mr. CONNESS. I will state for the information of the Senator from Vermont and the Senate that the establishment of a mint in Oregon can only relieve the mint of San Francisco from a portion of the increase that is naturally going on from year to year in the production and coinage of the precious metals on the Pacific coast. The present mint at San Francisco is entirely unfitted and unsuited for further operations, and the question as to whether new buildings should be erected is one that scarcely admits of any difference of opinion. Many reports have been made to the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject, and he has recommended that this course be taken, and recommended the appropriation of this amount. It is true that since that time the Senate has determined that $100,000 shall be appropriated for the creation of a mint in Oregon, in place of $75,000, which was also recommended, for the establishment of an assay office there, there being a difference only of $25,000 between the amount appropriated for a mint there and the amount that was formally recommended for the establishment of an assay office at that place. That cannot at all affect the amount that may be necessary for the erection of suitable buildings for a mint at San Francisco, because the production of the precious metals there is going on in a great ratio of increase.

It will be remembered also by the Senator from Vermont that—perhaps it is our misfortune; I will not speak in reference to that—the amount of money proposed to be appropriated by this bill is diminished by forty per cent. when it is reduced to coin, which is the only money used in California. I will say in addition that no matter what amount may be appropriated, it is to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and no larger portion of the appropriation will be used than is found to be necessary. I hope, therefore, that the amount will be allowed to remain as it is.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to inquire of the Senator from California whether the Government does not at present own a sufficient quantity of real estate in San Francisco to accommodate the mint buildings, and what amount it does own.

Mr. CONNESS. I am very glad the Senator has made that inquiry, because it enables me to state an interesting fact, perhaps, to the Senate in that connection. The Government now owns in the city of San Francisco one half of an entire block, on which the custom-house, the post office, and other buildings of the United States are built. It is a very large piece of ground. I cannot give its exact dimensions. It is far more than enough for the erection of a mint; and yet it is a question of economy alone as to whether the Government should use it for that purpose; and I will explain that in one moment. It is located in the lower part of the city, upon what is known as made land, and if the mint building should be erected there the foundation will have to be piled, which will be a very expensive job. The probability is that the piling of the foundation would consume one half or more of the entire appropriation. It may, therefore, be found necessary and economical for the Secretary to authorize the purchase of ground elsewhere, reserving that ground, which is of great value to the Government. That is the reason why I offered the amendment which the Senate has just adopted inserting the words "for the purchase of a site, if necessary." It will be a question to be determined by the architect of the Government whether this ground shall be used or other ground purchased. My own opinion is that the most economical course for the Government to pursue will be to select other ground on account of the great expense for piling for a foundation on the ground we now own. I suppose the half block of ground to which I refer is worth at the present time at least $300,000.

I will state in addition, while I am up, that the ground on which the present mint is erected is of considerable value. I suppose it is worth at least from fifty to seventy-five thousand dollars. The Secretary of the Treasury has authority under the law at present to sell that ground and pay the amount into the national Treasury, which will undoubtedly be done, so that the total amount appropriated here will not be expended for the erection of the mint.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was read the third time, and passed.

PREVENTION OF SMUGGLING.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to take up Senate bill No. 226.

Mr. CHANDLER. Before that is done, I desire to make a statement. I have a bill here—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Allow me to say that if the bill which the Senator from Michigan desires to bring up is a bill that will not lead to any debate I will give way; but I do so with the understanding that I shall have an opportunity to ask the Senate to take up two or three Indian bills that will occupy perhaps half an hour, which it is very important should be acted on.

Mr. CHANDLER. This is the most important bill before the Senate; it is to prevent smuggling.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to take up Senate bill No. 266.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 266) to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

By its provisions, from and after the 1st of August, 1864, all goods, wares, and merchandise, and all baggage and effects of passengers, and all other articles, imported into the United States from any contiguous foreign country, or countries, (except as otherwise specially provided,) as well as the vessels, cars, and other vehicles, and envelopes in which the same shall be imported, shall be unladen in the presence of, and be inspected by, an inspector or other officer of the customs, at the first port of entry or customhouse in the United States where the same shall arrive; and to enable the proper officer thoroughly to discharge this duty, he may require the owner or owners, or his, her, or their agent, or other person having charge or possession of any trunk, traveling bag or sack, valise, or other envelope, or of any closed vessel, car, or other vehicle, to open the same, or to deliver to him the proper key; and if such owner, agent, or other person, shall refuse or neglect to comply with his demand, the officer shall retain the trunk, traveling bag or sack, valise, or whatsoever it may be, and open the same, and as soon thereafter as may be practicable examine the contents, and if any dutiable article or articles shall be found therein, the whole contents, together with the envelope, shall be forfeited to the United States and disposed of as the law provides in other similar cases. If any dutiable goods, article, or articles, be found in such vessel, car, or other vehicle, the owner, agent, or other person in charge of which shall have refused to open it or deliver the key, the same, together with the vessel, car, or other vehicle, shall be forfeited to the United States, and shall be held by such officer, to be disposed of as the law provides in other similar cases of forfeiture. But the Secretary of the Treasury may release such goods or other articles on such terms, and such vessel, car, or other vehicle, on payment of such fine, not less than fifty dollars, as to him shall seem just and proper.

The Secretary of the Treasury is to appoint, whenever he shall think it necessary, additional inspectors of the revenue for the following districts, to wit: Passamaquoddy, Maine, four; Portland and Falmouth, Maine, eight; Eastport, Maine, four; Boston and Charlestown, Massachusetts, fourteen; Pembina, Minnesota, two; Chicago, Illinois, eight; Michilimackinac, Michigan, two; Sandusky, Ohio, one; Cuyahoga, Ohio, three; Erie, Pennsylvania, one; Dunkirk, New York, one; Buffalo Creek, New York, six; Niagara, two; Genesee, two; Oswego, five; Champlain, four; Vermont, two.

To avoid the inspection at the first port of arrival, required by the first section of the act, the owner, agent, master, or conductor of any such vessel, car, or other vehicle, or owner, agent, or other person having charge of any such goods, wares, merchandise, baggage, effects, or other articles, may apply to any officer of the United States, duly authorized to act in the premises, to seal or close the same, previous to, or immediately upon, their importation into the United States; which officer shall seal or close the same accordingly; whereupon they may proceed to their port of destination and be there inspected. Provisions are made for the mode of sealing the packages, &c., and penalties provided for those who may break the seals.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to amend the bill in the first section, third line, by striking out the word "August" and inserting "July."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, who reports this bill, to what it occurs to me must be an error in the bill. On page 3, section two, additional inspectors of the revenue are proposed, as follows: "Passamaquoddy, Maine, four; Eastport, Maine, four." I should like to inquire of the chairman whether there are two such districts?

Mr. CHANDLER. I cannot answer that question.

Mr. MORRILL. My impression is that there is but one district, and that that is Passamaquoddy; but yet I am not quite confident it is so.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator can move to strike it out.

Mr. MORRILL. I should not like to do that without ascertaining more definitely about it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The district of Passamaquoddy covers a very large extent of country, and it is very possible that the Department desires that there should be as many as eight inspectors, but has made some error in regard to the division. I think there had better be inquiries made in regard to that point before the bill is finally acted upon. If it is a question of number, I think they will need a considerable number to accomplish the objects of the bill. I think there is an error in the description there, but they may want the officers. I hope the Senator from Michigan will let it go over until to-morrow morning, and have it made the special order at half past twelve o'clock. The bill ought to be passed early, but it ought to be looked into.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I have no doubt it is right. I know this was furnished by the Commissioner of Customs himself, who ought to know all about it, and doubtless does. The bill generally was framed by the Commissioner of Customs with the view of preventing the enormous frauds on the revenue, and I cannot for one moment suppose that Mr. Sargent, the Commissioner of Customs, should have made a mistake of this kind. He was present, acting with the committee, and furnishing the facts.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am aware of the importance of the bill and the propriety of passing it as soon as possible, but I am inclined to think there has been a mistake as to the districts in Maine. My impression is that Eastport and Passamaquoddy are in one district. We can ascertain by to-morrow how the fact is.

Mr. CHANDLER. I submit a motion that the bill be postponed until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock, and made the special order for that hour.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVAJO INDIAN CAPTIVES.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I now move to take up Senate bill No. 226.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 226) to aid in the settlement, subsistence, and support of the Navajo Indian captives upon a reservation in the Territory of New Mexico, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $100,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for the purpose of settling the Navajo Indians, now captives in New Mexico, upon a reservation upon the Pecos river, in New Mexico, for the purchase of agricultural implements, seeds, and other articles necessary for such purpose, for breaking the ground, and for subsistence of the Indians to the end of the next fiscal year.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the said reservation may, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, be so extended and enlarged on the south as to include the entire valley of the Pecos river, known as the Bosque Redondo, and that the whole of said reservation so enlarged shall be designated and known as the Navajo and Apache reservation; and as such shall, until otherwise ordered by law, be exempt from sale and free from all occupancy except by the said Indians for the purposes herein mentioned, excepting such portion of the said land as is now occupied by Fort Sumner, and as may be needed for the use of said fort.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have another amendment from the committee, the purpose of which is to abolish one Indian agency and establish another:

And be it further enacted, That the southern agency of New Mexico is hereby abolished, and that an agent for the Kiowa, Apache, and Comanche Indians be appointed, at a salary of $1,500 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Secretary of the Interior sent the following letter to the Senate:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., April 5, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War, dated the 31st instant, and a copy of a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, of the 4th instant, upon the subject of providing means of subsistence for the Navajo Indians of New Mexico upon a reservation at the "Bosque Redondo," on the Pecos river.

Concurring with the Commissioner in the views he expresses on the subject, and also with the War Department in relation to it, I have the honor to recommend that Congress appropriate $100,000 to effect the objects contemplated.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. P. USHER, Secretary.
Hon. HANNIBAL HAMLIN, President of the Senate.

The following is the letter of the Secretary of War which accompanies it:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, March 31, 1864.

SIR: The commander of the department of New Mexico reports that there are now at the Bosque Redondo four thousand one hundred and six Navajo Indians, with strong probabilities that the remainder of the tribe will soon be collected at that place. General Carleton estimates the entire number of these Indians at five thousand, but it is believed that this is an underestimate, and that the tribe, when collected, will number at least seven thousand souls.

These Indians have been at war with the people of New Mexico (with short intervals of peace) for nearly two centuries, and if the plan of colonization now commenced can be successfully carried out, it will relieve the Treasury from the large expenditures that have been necessary in carrying on military operations against them, and will do much for the settlement and prosperity of New Mexico. It is important for the success of this plan that measures should be taken at once to establish them fully in their new homes; to provide for their wants in their changed condition, and to establish them fully in their determination to abandon their old homes and manner of living.

They are now dependent upon the War Department, but there is no appropriation under the control of the Department from which their wants can be supplied, except that the issue of subsistence is justified by necessity, and must be continued until the Interior Department is prepared to assume their control and relieve this Department from the burden of maintaining them.

It is important that this should be done as speedily as possible, and in this, and in whatever else that may be necessary to insure the success of this plan, the War Department will give its hearty coöperation.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Hon. J. P. Usher, Secretary of the Interior.

The Committee on Indian Affairs, not being quite satisfied with the general terms in which these letters expressed this recommendation, appointed a meeting for the purpose of considering this question by itself, and requested General Canby, who had for several years been commander of the military department of New Mexico, to appear before the committee in person, and explain to the committee the necessity and the propriety of this recommendation. General Canby stated to the committee that since we acquired the Territory of New Mexico we have been compelled to keep within that Territory, mainly to preserve peace among the Indians, nearly three regiments of troops all the time. He stated and gave as his opinion that if these Navajo Indians who now have surrendered were to be kept on this reservation on the Pecos river it would reduce the necessary military force to be kept in that country to eight companies; that eight companies of troops could serve the purpose of keeping these Indians, and keeping the peace with them; so that the military expenses of the Government in New Mexico would be very largely reduced. He stated the fact that both under the present Administration and under the last Administration, indeed for several years, I think as many as seven or eight years, the settled policy of the administration of the military department of that Territory has been to get possession of these Navajos and get them out of the mountain-fastnesses where they were, and to colonize them and put them on some reservation within the Territory of New Mexico. The military department has in fact, under the lead of General Carleton and Kit Carson, succeeded in getting these Navajos into their possession, and placed them at the Bosque Redondo, which is in the neighborhood of Fort Sumner; in fact, Fort Sumner is in the very center of the reservation proposed. The Secretary of the Interior requests the appropriation of $100,000 for the purpose of putting this reservation in proper condition, and to purchase seeds, implements, &c., to enable these people to go on and to a great extent become self-sustaining, and relieve the Government of expense.

These Navajos are a peculiar people. They have raised large flocks and herds; they have some manufactures of their own. The Navajo women make the most celebrated blankets in the world; and they have been accustomed to the cultivation of the soil by means of irrigation, which seems to be a necessity in all that New Mexican country, so that it is not taking men who have had no experience in irrigation to settle upon the soil where it is necessary for them to irrigate in order to support themselves.

Mr. President, I have thus briefly stated the facts as presented to the committee; and while the committee, perhaps, had the question been originally left to them as a military matter whether they would take the Navajos from one section of New Mexico and place them in another, might have arrived at a different result, we did not go into the consideration of that; but taking the facts as we find them, with these Navajos upon our hands and at this point, with the recommendation of the Military Department and the recommendation of the Interior Department, we felt that there was no other course under the circumstances to pursue but to favor this appropriation, and we have reported accordingly.

Of the other sections of the bill, one is to extend it so that what are called the Southern Apaches can also be put on a portion of the reservation; and the third section is simply to abolish the Southern Apache Indian agency, and allow another Indian agency to be established in its stead, which is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CONNESS. If the appropriation of $100,000 would give us the results that we are promised in this case, I should think that the appropriation was well made and that it was the most economical disposition of the question that could be made; but I have grave doubts about that; and as to the benefit of this appropriation, indeed the whole scheme comes here surrounded by more than an ordinary degree of doubt and suspicion. It will be remembered, Mr. President, that about the first information we had concerning the capture or so-called capture of the Navajo Indians came very suddenly upon us. All at once we were informed that four thousand Indians had surrendered to the Government. To one unacquainted with the Navajo Indians and with their history, or with the history of operations connected with them, that would seem like a great accomplishment; but when it is known as it is that just such surrenders as this have been made over and over again by the Navajo Indians, and that they have remained at peace with us just as long as we fed beef to them and paid them out of the national Treasury, and when we ceased we had to fight them again, I do not think there is anything particularly new or attractive in it, nor anything particularly profitable to the nation in it.

I had considerable doubt about the reality of this surrender; and as I was informed and believed that General Canby was the best-informed man in or near this city upon Indian affairs in New Mexico, I called upon him in regard to the matter. I had no considerable conversation with him; he was in a great hurry at the time, and so was I, but I consulted him in regard to the matter, and I asked him, "General, how is it about this so-called surrender or capture of the Navajo Indians, and about their desire to reside on a reservation at peace with the United States?" Well, his response to me was a pushing up of his shoulders, with an expression of great doubt as to the whole matter. It was evident to me, both from what he said and what he did, that he had no faith in the whole arrangement.

I accuse no one in this connection. The honorable Secretary of the Interior in making this recommendation has undoubtedly been guided by all the information placed before him; but it does appear to me that the appropriation of $100,000 under the direction of an agent who is to be paid $1,500 per annum is simply throwing away that amount of money. The whole question of the surrender or so-called capture by Kit Carson, or Colonel Carson, of these Indians, is in my mind surrounded with great doubt. I think it is a question that should be thoroughly investigated and understood before this appropriation shall be made.

I may be replied to by asking what shall these Indians do in the mean time? Well, if it were a fact that they had surrendered, if it were a fact that they were determined to remain thereafter at peace with the United States, I have no doubt but that the very best thing the Government could do would be to feed them and continue to feed them. As to their civilization and the extent to which the arts are practiced and known among them, there is a good deal of poetry about that. They are, by those who know them, represented to be one of the most rascally bands of Indians in the country. They have no morals at all. They keep no bargains or understandings or treaties. They have violated their bargains, understandings, and treaties with the Government over and over, and they will do it again in my opinion. After they eat up this $100,000 you will still have to keep three regiments in New Mexico. In fact, in that connection, let me say that there is no probability, nay, no possibility, within any reasonable time of our being able by reason of this measure, or any measure of the kind, to reduce our military force in New Mexico. We want to increase it in fact, rather than reduce it; and why? Because it is one of our southwestern positions where, at the end of this rebellion, if the time shall ever come, (and we all expect it to be hastening on,) bands of rebels will retreat to, and it will be necessary for us not to reduce our force there, but to increase it and aggregate it. If this proposition were left to me, from what knowledge I have picked up, and I have tried to obtain all that I could upon the subject, I would deal with it thus: at the present time, whatever appropriation I authorized to be made, I would authorize to be expended by the War Department, taking care that a proper officer was placed in command there, and not establish a reservation at this time.

My opinion is that the measure as proposed now will prove entirely abortive, entirely wasteful, and without any results. I regret, sir, to be placed in the position of being compelled to cast these doubts upon it and upon its wisdom; but I cannot avoid it, as I believe it will be a wasteful, unnecessary, and unprofitable expenditure.

Mr. HOWARD. I rise to make an inquiry, sir. I was not attending with much care to the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin. I wish to know in what way and by what authority these Navajo Indians are held in captivity; who captured them; why was it?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I stated, before the honorable Senator came into his seat, upon the information of the Secretary of War received through General Carleton, who is in command of that department, that the Navajos are captured and upon our hands as captives to the amount of five thousand five hundred, and they would probably come in to the amount of seven thousand. They have them in fact around Fort Sumner, down on the Pecos river; and the Secretary of War recommends, and the Secretary of the Interior recommends, that a reservation there be established for them.

Mr. HOWARD. But I wish to know who captured these Indians? Why was it done? Were they making war upon the United States? Was there an Indian war?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will state to the honorable Senator from Michigan that there has been a warfare going on between the Navajo Indians and the New Mexicans of that Territory for nearly two hundred years. When we acquired the Territory of New Mexico, we took it with this war on our hands, and we have been compelled to keep, as General Canby stated to our committee the other day—we requested him to appear before the committee to give us the facts in relation to it—a large military force there constantly, making war on these Navajos, capturing them, and, as my friend from California says, letting them go, and then they break the treaty, and we have to capture them over again, again and again, which I dare say is true as he has stated. We have kept that military force there for years and years, and it has been the settled policy of the administration of the military department of New Mexico to get these Indians and colonize them at some place out of the mountains where they were, upon some spot in New Mexico where a force could be stationed in their neighborhood to watch them and to prevent this war and depredation; and the place which is selected, by looking on the map it will be seen, is selected in the neighborhood of the Staked Plain, as it is called, on the east of them, and about sixty or seventy miles from the mountains upon the west, in the valley of the Pecos.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President, the subject of our Indian affairs in New Mexico is not a topic with which I profess any great familiarity, but after all I have some thoughts upon that subject which I wish to suggest for the consideration of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I hope I may have their attention.

I understand that in the Territory of New Mexico we have a condition of Indians entirely different from that which we had to meet east of the Mississippi or in the northern and northwestern part of our country. The Indians there are not a people who have any local habitation. They are not as our tribes were, who had a particular spot of hunting ground and some little cultivation, but they live dispersedly all over the Territory, especially among the hills, while our white inhabitants settle along in the valleys. These people thus having no particular locality are not conditioned as our Indians were with whom we could make treaties, and as to whom we could make laws to prevent the white people from going into the Indian country. They wander dispersedly all over the Territory of New Mexico, and every now and then they make a foray down into the valleys where the white people live and rob them, take their cattle and sheep, for they are a pastoral people pretty much; and then the Indians retreat and fly back to the mountains. Finally forces are sent out against them and make war upon them, and then they submit and make peace and receive certain presents which are always expected to attend the making of peace. The next day, or whenever another opportunity presents itself, they make another foray. Then you have another attack upon them, followed by another treaty and another set of presents.

This I believe to be the true condition of that country; and so believing, I believe further that the only mode of dealing with this people is just to subject them to the laws of the Territory. Now they are not subject to the laws of the Territory. It is considered that the local laws of the country never apply to Indians. If these Indians be at any time arrested in their forays and stealings, and taken and made an example of, and punished, imprisoned—for nothing has greater terror for an Indian than to be imprisoned; he can hardly endure it—I say a few examples of that kind, nay, a distinct knowledge that they were subject to the laws of the Territory, would be the best mode of dealing with them. They now say "Law for white man; no law for Indian;" and the white people are not permitted unless led by our forces to avenge themselves or to reclaim their property by force. We have laws against that. But if we would make a law subjecting these Indians to the operation of the laws of the Territory in which they live, not making them citizens, but subjecting them to the law and those punishments, the very terror of that law would, in my opinion, be far greater security than any amount of force you can send there. I trust this subject will receive the attention of the committee.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. HOWARD. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of this bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I think this is not a bill that ought to pass. I do not see any propriety in making charitable provisions for a race of Indians who are not disposed to keep any treaties with us, and who are continually practicing these barbarities upon our settlers out there. It seems to me it is nothing more nor less than undertaking to reward a set of roving nomadic thieves and plunderers who will not even thank us for the gratuity which we are now offering them. It seems to me, so far as I can understand the subject, to be a downright waste and squandering of the public moneys upon objects who are utterly unworthy of it. I shall therefore vote against it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My honorable friend from Michigan certainly cannot understand the facts of this case, it seems to me, if he opposes this proposition. The War Department tell us that we have them on our hands now as captives of war, and they are being fed out of the subsistence department by General Carleton this day. Six thousand mouths are being fed all the while. What are you going to do with them?

Mr. HOWARD. I can answer that question very easily; parole them and let them go. They can certainly do no more mischief hereafter than they have been inclined to do heretofore. But the object of the bill is not such as it appears to be stated by the Senator from Wisconsin. The object is to provide these thieves and plunderers with "agricultural implements, seeds, and other articles necessary for such purpose, for breaking the ground, and for subsistence of said Indians to the end of the next fiscal year." I am not inclined to pay even Indians who commit robbery and murder upon me and my countrymen. I do not think it is a very dignified proceeding myself.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 24, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Hale, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, and Wiley—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Howard, Richardson, Sprague, and Wilson—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Collamer, Harding, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Wade, and Wright—14.

So the bill was passed.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I appeal to my honorable friend to allow me to pass one or two other bills, on which I presume there will be no discussion.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill just passed took half an hour.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I supposed that would excite some discussion, but I do not think these others will.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator can take up the bills that will excite no discussion in the morning hour. I think we had better go on now and dispose of the bank bill.

The motion of Mr. SHERMAN was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 395) to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. HENDERSON, in section twenty-two, line three, after the word "exceed" to strike out "$300,000,000" and insert the words "the amount now authorized to be issued by the Comptroller of the Currency to banks already created;" so that it will read:

That the entire amount of notes for circulation to be issued under this act shall not exceed the amount now authorized to be issued by the Comptroller of the Currency to banks already created.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to have the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have determined to vote for this amendment of the Senator from Missouri, but I do so with the expectation on my part, if it shall be adopted, to modify it by some provision to allow all the State banks that choose to organize under the national system to come in and organize under it. The amendment as it stands naked by itself would go to the length of excluding them altogether.

Mr. SHERMAN. It would be a repeal of the law as it stands.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not design taking up time on this amendment. I only wish to say that I concur in most that was said by the Senator from Missouri in the speech he made some days ago in support of this amendment. I believe it would be wise to stop this issue of currency by these national banks, and therefore I shall vote in favor of limiting the issue to the banks already created. That is not a repeal of the law, as the Senator from Ohio suggests. I understand that banks have already been established which will authorize the issue of $50,000,000 of currency, or more; and I think we had better stop where we are and see how that operates before we go any further. It is not a proposition to repeal the law, but to stop issuing any more of this national bank currency. I am in favor of that and shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. POWELL. I was requested by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NESMITH] to state that he is absent from the Senate on account of indisposition.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Grimes, Henderson, Howard, Powell, Richardson, Saulsbury, and Trumbull—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, and Wilson—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Collamer, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Riddle, Wilkinson, and Wright—14.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will now submit the amendment of which I gave notice the other day.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to insert at the end of the bill, as additional sections, the following:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act no person, banker, banking association, or banking or other corporation shall make, issue, or reissue any bills, notes, or certificates of any kind or denomination whatever designed to circulate as money, which at the passage of this act shall not be actually issued and in circulation as money under the laws of the United States or of the several States, unless the said person, banker, banking association, or corporation shall redeem the same at its place of business in gold and silver coin on demand: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit those associations which have become duly organized under the provisions of "An act to provide for a national currency secured by a pledge of United States stocks, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved February 25, 1863, and shall have transferred and delivered to the Treasurer of the United States the bonds of the United States, under the provisions of the fifteenth and sixteenth sections of said act, from receiving the currency to which they have become entitled, and from putting the same into circulation as money under the provisions of said act: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit any existing banker, bank, banking association, or corporation existing under the laws of any State, and having notes, bills, or certificates in circulation as money, from organizing themselves into banking associations under the said act of Congress and acts amendatory thereto; and in case of such organization, and upon complying with the provisions of said act, they shall be entitled to receive and put into circulation, of the national currency provided for in said act, an amount equal to the amount of the notes, bills, or certificates of said bank in circulation, which shall be from time to time withdrawn from circulation, redeemed, and canceled, not exceeding the amount of its capital stock.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act every person, banker, banking association, or banking corporation shall reduce the amount of its notes, bills, or certificates, in circulation as money, to the amount of its cash capital actually paid in and ——— per cent. added thereto, or to the amount actually secured by the pledge of the stocks of the United States, or of the State where the bank or banking office is situated, pursuant to the laws of the United States or of the State where the bank is situated; said reduction to be made in the following manner: one fourth of said excess of circulation beyond what is above provided shall be redeemed and canceled on or before the 1st day of ——— next; one half on or before the 1st day of ——— next; three fourths on or before the 1st day of ——— next; and the remainder on or before the 1st day of ——— next; and upon all bills, notes, and certificates issued or reissued, or remaining in circulation as money, over and above the amount as provided in this and the preceding section, the said several bankers, banks, or banking corporations shall pay to the United States a tax of one per cent. per month.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. As those are two distinct sections, of course the amendment is capable of division, and the vote should be taken on each separately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOOT in the chair.) The question will be taken on both sections together unless a division be asked for by a member.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question will be on the adoption of the first section of the amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The effect of the first section is substantially this: to prevent any new organization under the existing national banking law, except such organizations as shall be made by State banks now existing which may surrender their organization, withdraw their circulation, and come into operation under the provisions of this act. The first part of the section, without either of the provisos, would have precisely the same effect as the proposed amendment of the Senator from Missouri; but the first proviso to the section allows the national currency which has already been secured and applied for at the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury to be issued and go into circulation as money; and the second proviso authorizes State banks who have now an outstanding circulation to withdraw that State circulation, organize under the provisions of this section, and receive an amount of circulation of the national currency equal to their present outstanding circulation, not exceeding the amount of their capital stock.

Mr. President, I am not a practical banker. I have never owned any stock in any bank, State or national. I may never be fortunate enough to own any such stock; I therefore do not claim any weight for my opinion upon the ground of practical experience. I distrust my opinion so far as that is concerned. To fortify myself on that subject I had occasion to write to some gentlemen of great practical experience, and among them to one gentleman in the State of New York. Instead of answering the communication directly himself, he referred it to one of the most experienced business men in the Empire State, a man of as large experience practically in the business of banking as any gentleman in the State of New York, as I am informed and believe. He is the gentleman who was selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, as I understand, as his first choice to be Comptroller of the Currency; but from his business relations and position he was compelled to decline the appointment. I inclosed the amendment to a gentleman and indorsed upon it the inquiry, "What is your opinion of this?" and he referred it to that gentleman, and that gentleman writes a letter to me on the subject, in which he says, "I fully concur in your amendment."

He goes on to give his reasons at considerable length. That gentleman is Thomas W. Olcott, of the city of Albany. He certainly has had practical experience in the business of banking. He knows it in all its operations as well as any man among the great financial men of this country, and his opinion is worth consulting. I do not claim for my opinion from practical experience that it is entitled to weight.

When this amendment was under discussion the other day in the Senate, and I was stating to the Senate the effect of the amendment that I intended to propose, the president of one of the largest banks of the city of New York was present. I did not know it at the time. I received from the city of New York on his return a letter, in which he fully indorses substantially the amendment that I have offered. He says:

"You have struck the key-note—limitation of paper money to amount outstanding in any form."

That is the key-note; that is the solution, and the only saving solution, to our financial difficulties in the currency.

"With gold at 175 or 180 it is evident to all who understand the subject that the point of danger is near, and will certainly be reached by any addition whatever to the existing volume. Your plan proposes:

"1. To limit all bank circulation to amount now outstanding, under penalty of paying new issues in gold and silver.

"2. To limit national bank act to amount now authorized—say twenty-nine millions.

"3. To revoke national bank act excepting so far as to allow State banks to transfer themselves into it under the limitation as in No. 1.

"4. To require all banks having notes in circulation beyond the amount of capital or notes not secured by Government or State stocks to reduce them to that standard, under penalty of paying one per cent. per month upon the excess.

"This is both wise and fully secures the object.

"1. It gives State banks time to consider the best method and moment for making so important a transition.

"2. It prevents the banking system of the country from being taken in possession by unskilled and adventurous men, and so far removes an important objection to being affiliated with them.

"3. It permits existing institutions to carry into the new system more upon terms of equity, their coin and surplus, and thus transfers real capital.

"4. It insures to the new system more of the character, experience, and traditional advantages of existing organizations than can possibly be secured under a rival system having a basis so broad as will inevitably lead to ruin, both to the banks and the public.

"5. Finally it saves the country from financial prostration.

"Much more I would be glad to say at leisure. Your views are so much in harmony with the able remarks of Senator HENDERSON who followed you, that they are entirely reconcilable."

And in a postscript, he says:

"Your plan is the only one that the old State banks as a body would for a moment consider, and to it I believe they would give most favorable regard."

Mr. SHERMAN. That is written by a bank officer, I suppose.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It was written by Mr. George S. Coe, president of the American Exchange Bank of New York.

Mr. President, I do not propose to stand here to discuss this question. I leave it to other gentlemen of more practical business experience and of more enlarged views of finance and of currency than I can lay any claim to. But I believe, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] said the other day, that next to the military question which is to determine whether we are to have victory or defeat in the field, the question for the American statesman this day to consider is the question of our currency. I distinguish it from the question of finance, because we can easily raise taxes. The other day in half an hour we passed through the House of Representatives and almost through the Senate a bill to add fifty per cent. to the taxation proposed upon foreign importations. We can levy taxes in every form. We can put a tax upon sales of one half of one per cent. or one per cent., which would raise $100,000,000 of itself.

There is no difficulty in reaching money enough by way of taxation; but the difficulty and the threatening danger is, that the very standard of value, by which all values are measured and all contracts are discharged, is this moment afloat. It is like an India rubber yard-stick, two feet long to-day and four feet long to-morrow, and all caused by this redundant, illimitable, and limitless system of making paper money. I think this Government has the power to put on the restraints, to put down the brakes, to stop it both by the national Government and by the State banks. By the power of taxation, by the power of declaring these banks that will issue paper not redeemable in gold and silver not solvent institutions and put them into bankruptcy, and various other ways, we can reach and master and control the circulation of the country. It is the bounden duty of this Senate to rise to the crisis of the hour, to meet the responsibility, and to take hold of this matter with a strong hand and control it. What is this bill unlimited by any provisos but a bill to provide for issuing this day $300,000,000 of new circulation in paper money to be added to the $800,000,000 already afloat?

It seems to me just as certain as that effect follows its cause, that if you do it or if you pass a law that shall authorize it to be done, gold will of necessity go up in price; and when it reaches two hundred per cent. what consequences may we expect to follow? Mr. President, although I have had no practical knowledge in financial matters of this description, I have for twenty-five years of my life given some attention to the study of the great laws of political economy, the laws of supply and demand, the laws of trade, the laws of currency. I have studied them and reflected upon them, and have some most settled and determined convictions in relation to them. I believe those laws are as certain, as clearly to be ascertained, as the great laws of nature, and they are irrepealable too by act of Congress or of any State Legislature. They are the laws of God stamped upon the nature of things. You may vary them for a moment in their natural operations by the obstacles that laws may interpose, but they assert their supremacy in the end, and they will control you and you cannot resist the power of those laws in their operation. The day of compensation is certain and sure, and the history of the whole world demonstrates it to be so. Mr. President, in my opinion, what we want now is to meet this thing as it is, stop the swelling of this paper volume, decrease it gradually, allow the national bank system to go into operation, favor it by making these national banks your depositories, favor it by allowing the notes of these national banks to be received in payment of Government dues, encourage the State banks to organize your system and surrender the old system, to come in and take the national currency, and put your limitation upon this bill and let it be fixed so that the financial world shall know that there shall be no further increase of paper money. Let them know there is a limit fixed beyond which it cannot and it shall not go, and by fixing the limit you will restore confidence in the financial world.

Mr. President, I will not be betrayed into making a long speech upon this subject, though my heart is full. I feel earnest, and perhaps I express myself strongly. I express my own opinion with the utmost respect to the opinions of those gentlemen who differ with me, to the Secretary of the Treasury, who I believe is struggling with this question to do the very best he can, and yet he must allow me, with other gentlemen around me, the right and the privilege to think for myself on this question, and to bring to its consideration all the light and all the experience and all the study which I have had during that portion of my life since I first commenced the study of political economy.

I hope the Committee on Finance will consider this proposition, and consider it fully. I want to act with them, and I wish to act upon the principle neither of destroying the State banks nor making war on the State banks, nor of destroying the national banks nor making war on them; for, as I said the other day, I desire to bind together the interests of these men in the support of the system and in the support of the Government, and I believe that if while you encourage the national system you allow only the State banks to come in and take the advantages under it, you will substantially bind all these interests together.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, when I first read the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin I supposed it was one of the numerous amendments intended to indirectly defeat this bill; but when I come to read it now, and when I see from the manner of the Senator that he is really sincere in offering it, I am profoundly surprised. Let us analyze this amendment for a moment; and I shall not go off into a discussion of the general merits of the bill, because after the various propositions of amendment are made I may then have some general observations to make in regard to the bill; but now let us look at the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The first proposition is that no banker or bank organized in the United States shall, after the passage of this law, issue any bank bill—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Not already in circulation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not already in circulation. Every bank charter now in existence in the United States is therefore substantially repealed or modified by our act; that is, we declare that no bank organized by any State law shall, after this day, issue any bank note.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Unless they redeem in gold or silver.

Mr. SHERMAN. In other words, we change the law of every State in this Union by one single proposition. Now, where is the constitutional power to do it? Who has ever claimed such power? We have the power to tax these banks, and indirectly through the power of taxation we may affect their circulation; but here at one broad sweep the Senator would substantially repeal all the State laws, forbid them to issue or reissue a single note under any circumstances, whatever may be the facts. Where is the power to pass such a law? What Senator here claims such a power?

Now let us look at the next proposition in the Senator's amendment. In that he reserves to the banks already organized under this law the right to receive their bills under the provisions of the law; in other words, he retains in existence the law so far as the existing banks are organized; he allows them to receive their notes, so that he does not affect the system as far as they are concerned. He gives to the banks already organized the monopoly of the banking under this system, and prevents new banks from being organized under it. But that is not the worst of it. No wonder that the president of one of the leading banks of the United States cordially approved this amendment of the Senator.

What is the third proposition? It is that any bankers or banks organized under the laws of any State now in existence may avail themselves of the privileges of this banking bill, and nobody else shall. That is, the banks now in existence would have the complete monopoly of an organization under this act. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he is willing to vote for such a monopoly? It would be the most odious, the most offensive that could be proposed by any man. It is to confine the benefits of this bill solely to the banks now organized. There is a bank in Pittsburgh, or western Pennsylvania, that I believe has issued ten times the amount of its capital stock. The Senator from Pennsylvania probably knows that. And yet that bank that is thus inflated, that has thus issued ten times its capital stock as circulation, might, under this proposition, for twenty years have the right to bank under this banking bill, and would only reduce its circulation by installments from time to time, when no other citizen, no other individual in the United States could avail himself of the privileges of this act. In other words, it confers on the State banks the monopoly of organizing under the national law, and they alone would have the right to form a bank association. No individual, however wealthy, no citizen, however rich, no man, however patriotic, could avail himself of the privileges of this banking system, except those banks now organized under State laws, and they could do it without restriction.

Why, sir, the propositions contained in this amendment certainly cannot receive the sanction of the Senate. The first provision is to repeal all the banking laws of the States by forbidding them to issue or reissue any note. The attempt to enforce this provision would not only create lawsuits, but would create troubles without number. You cannot force the banks into this system. The purpose of the bill is to induce them to come into it. This proposition would prevent them from issuing or reissuing a single note. The next proposition is to give them a monopoly of the banking business under this law. Taking those three propositions together, it seems to me they make the amendment monstrous.

Then the second section of the amendment provides that from and after the passage of this act every person, banker, banking association, or banking corporation shall reduce the amount of its notes, bills, or certificates in circulation as money to the amount of its cash capital actually paid in, and ——— percent added thereto. Therefore a bank in the State of New York whose circulation is secured by the deposit of State or United States securities must reduce its circulation to its cash capital, while another bank that has no security whatever, that deposits no stock as the basis of its issues, may go on and issue notes to the full amount of its capital stock, without regard to the question of security. There is nothing in this second section that requires these bankers to secure their outstanding circulation with United States stocks. Not only that, but they can issue or keep out under the provisions of the section notes to the amount of their capital stock paid in, whether their notes are secured or not, and they can issue more, provided only they will secure the excessive issue by a deposit of United States stocks.

Such a provision as this would be simply absurd. Its adoption would not only be a violation of the Constitution, the exercise of a power that no gentleman it seems to me can claim as delegated to Congress, but it would be an absolute defeat of this bill. Sir, if Senators are not satisfied with the bill or with the general system, let them defeat it directly. If they desire to propose amendments to perfect it, I shall not complain. After those amendments are all considered and acted upon, and the bill is made as perfect as we can make it, it will be time for us to discuss the merits of the bill, and I may then have occasion to make some reply to the observations submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] on Friday, but not till then.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio objects to the amendment, first, that it contains in its first section a provision to repeal all the bank charters granted under the laws of the several States. As I understand it, it contains no such provision whatever. By every bank charter in every State the banks are required to redeem in gold or silver on demand. It is of the very essence of their charter, the granting of the franchise, that they shall redeem their currency in gold and silver, though now perhaps some of the States may have passed special laws authorizing the suspension of specie payments. We have the constitutional power to declare what no State certainly has the power to declare; at all events in the minds of many persons we have the constitutional power to declare that something but gold and silver shall be a tender in the payment of debts. No State Legislature has any such power. We exercised that power when we declared that our legal-tender notes should be received in the discharge of private as well as public obligations. Is it not within our power to repeal the benefit of that law in relation to any class of banks in this country that are swelling the currency, that are raising the price of gold, threatening us with financial embarrassment and ruin by an over issue, a redundant issue of their paper circulation beyond the amount of their capital stock? What is the effect of my proposition in that respect but to declare that as to them, those banks which will go on issuing a currency not redeemable in gold and silver, they shall not use our Treasury notes in payment of the debts which are due from them? That is all; it repeals no bank charter; and I undertake to say that it is beyond all question that we have the power to declare that every bank in this country and every banker who does not pay his debts in gold and silver on demand is a bankrupt, and we could put him into bankruptcy and appoint a receiver by the judge of one of our courts, and wind up his affairs. Is there anybody who doubts it? Does the Senator from Ohio doubt it? That is all that is contained in that provision, and in my judgment it is clearly within the powers expressly delegated by the Constitution of the United States to Congress.

But again, the Senator says that because by the provisions of that section I would limit the organizations to be formed under this act to those that have already been organized and have put up their securities and have become entitled to their circulation, I am for creating monopolies under this act. Not at all. Ever since the law of last year was passed it has been an open field and fair play; every man who had his securities who desired to organize an association could organize, deposit his securities with the Comptroller, and take his currency.

But again, the Senator contends that the other provision of the section secures to the State banks already existing the monopoly of the banking system of the country under this act, and therefore it would be unjust. Is there a man occupying a seat in this Senate Chamber who would not from the bottom of his heart rejoice if all the State banks now existing should withdraw their circulation at the earliest practicable moment, and should see fit to reorganize under the provisions of this act? We should then have a system of banking by no means a monopoly, for it would be a free system of banking, embracing all the banks and bankers of the United States, and all the men who have been engaged in the business for years.

The Senator refers to the case of a bank at Pittsburgh, and he says we should be giving a most unjust advantage to that bank under the operations of this section, because he says that bank has extended its circulation to ten times the amount of its capital. That may be so; but the provisions of this section declare that if such a bank is organized under this act and applies for circulation, it shall not have circulation to exceed the amount of its capital. As I put my pen upon paper to draw the words of this section, I thought of those banks that have over issued their paper beyond their capital stock; and the idea which presided when I drew it was to seize upon this occasion to control them and compel them to reduce their circulation. I hold it to be the duty of this Government, and to be clearly within its constitutional power, to seize and control and master the currency of this country, for if there is one thing in my opinion which was intended by the Constitution, it was that this Federal Government and not the States should be the master of the circulating medium of the Union.

The Senator says that there is nothing in that provision of the section which requires those banks that bank upon the system of New England, that is, of paying in all their capital stock without putting up bonds as security, to put up security. I would be very glad to incorporate into an amendment the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio if it could be acceptable to the members of the Senate, and provide that such securities might be put up, either in the stocks of the States where they are or in the stocks of the Federal Government, or both together. I say to the Senator from Ohio that I care nothing about the form in which the amendment may be made. What I want is to limit the volume of paper money. I wish to reduce gradually the volume of that circulation. I wish not to make war on the State banks and bring on a financial crash, disaster, and ruin, involving it may be the credit of the Government as well as the credit of individuals.

Mr. President, we have been placed in this most anomalous position—and it is one of the dangers of our situation—that it is for the interest of the men who hold the stocks of the Government of the United States to depreciate them; and why? Because they get the interest in gold, and the more they depreciate the stocks the more stocks they can buy with the gold they receive. It is a strange, anomalous state of things, and still it is a fact, and a fact worth considering.

I do not see, I confess, the objections which the Senator from Ohio raises to this amendment. I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate. I would be glad to hear gentlemen abler than myself by far, consider this question in all its bearings—the necessity of limiting the amount of paper money, of putting a limit beyond which it cannot go, and of reducing the paper volume. I care not in what form it is issued, whether in greenbacks by the Government, or in this national currency by the national associations, or by the State banks; I say it is our duty to stop swelling the volume and to reduce that volume. If the Senator from Ohio can contrive the manner in which to accomplish it, that is all I ask. Forms I care not for. My amendment may not be in the right form. Let some other gentleman bring forward an amendment that will accomplish the work; stop swelling the volume, and reduce the amount of the existing volume.

Mr. HALE. I do not know, Mr. President, that I ought to address the Senate at this moment under the invocation that has been made by the Senator from Wisconsin who wished that some abler man than he was would do it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I concede it to the Senator.

Mr. HALE. I confess that I sympathize entirely with the object which the Senator says he has in view, a reduction of the volume of the currency. I recollect some years ago hearing a man in one of the country towns who had just been elected to the Legislature of one of the New England States give his idea of what genuine Democracy was, and he said it consisted in going just as hard against banks as was possible. [Laughter.] I hardly believe that proposition. But, sir, what I rose to say principally at this time was that the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin strikes me as extravagant; he will excuse me for saying so. I think that by a very brief amendment, not near as voluminous as the one which he has presented, he may reach his object directly, and it would be more explicit and more easily understood if it were put in this form:

And be it further enacted, That all those instruments heretofore known as State constitutions be, and they are hereby, abolished. [Laughter.]

That would reach it directly, and then there would be no doubt that this could be done; but as long as they stand in the way, it seems to me that there is a little difficulty. The Senator from Wisconsin put the query whether there was anybody in the Senate who doubts that Congress have a right to enact that if banks neglect or refuse to pay their obligations in gold and silver, they should all be put into bankruptcy. I confess that I am that unfortunate individual who doubts exceedingly the power of Congress to do any such thing, for the grant of power to Congress on that subject is in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, and the power there given is:

I take it a uniform law cannot be said to be one that singles out a particular class of individuals or a particular class of corporations, and imposes upon them a duty in default of which they shall go into bankruptcy, while it leaves to other individuals and other corporations the power to go on without any such restriction. I apprehend that if Congress should undertake to say that all banks that do not redeem in gold and silver should go into bankruptcy, and leave insurance companies or any other companies the privilege of paying their debts in a depreciated paper currency, it would not be such a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcy as was intended by the Constitution. The Constitution intended by “a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcies” one that would operate upon all individuals, upon all classes, and upon all corporations; and it did not mean when it gave Congress the power to enact uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy that they may pick out here and there a class of corporations or a class of individuals, and say that if they did not redeem in gold and silver they should go into bankruptcy while other classes should be under no such obligation.

Suppose you apply it to individuals; suppose Congress should undertake to say that all wholesale importers of dry goods should pay their obligations in gold and silver, and if they did not should go into bankruptcy, while all wholesale importers of other classes of merchandise might go on paying in depreciated currency. To my humble apprehension it seems that there is no such power; and if Congress were to undertake it they would vastly exceed their authority. They have no such right.

I confess to as much ignorance on the general subject of finance as the Senator from Wisconsin, and a good deal more, for I cannot pretend to have made so much effort to enlighten myself upon it as he has; but there are a great many notions that pass current in communities, and that are received with all the reverence of divine revelation, and there are a good many propositions in regard to this subject of political economy which, when tried by the test of practice, are absurd and false. Let me illustrate. The doctrine of the balance of trade is continually talked about, and we have got an idea that if the imports exceed the exports by the custom-house books we are doing a ruinous business. That is pretty much conceded to be the truth, that if the custom-house shows an amount of importations exceeding our exports, we are doing a ruinous business. Let me take a case. Here is a vessel that starts from Portsmouth, New Hampshire, or Boston, Massachusetts, with a cargo of ice, worth nothing at the custom-house; she takes that for ballast, and goes to New Orleans and sells the ice. She there takes a freight of cotton to Liverpool, and possibly when she goes to Liverpool she may dispose of that, and take another freight for the Baltic, and with the result of the ice and the freight that she has earned by carrying cotton from New Orleans to Liverpool, and by carrying something else from Liverpool to the Baltic, she buys a cargo of hemp and iron worth it may be $100,000, and imports into the country $100,000 worth of hemp and iron; the custom-house shows that she has not carried out anything; there has been no export. She took ice which was worth nothing on the custom-house books, and with the earnings of her freight from New Orleans to Liverpool, and the earnings of her freight from Liverpool to the Baltic, she secures $100,000 which she invests in a cargo of hemp and of iron, and brings that home to this country. Then the custom-house shows $100,000 worth of goods imported into the country, and nothing carried out; and the theory of a good many of these political economists that learn what little they know out of books is that that is a ruinous business, and must destroy any country under heaven. A little practice explodes that theory.

I do not know of any single theory in regard to banks that will stand the test of philosophy, except the very one that we are now illustrating, and that is that an immense inflation of bank paper tends to a ruinous state of things, to wit, the increase of prices. That I believe everybody agrees to; but when you come to the question of what has produced it, and what is the remedy for it, wise men diverge and differ. Now, as to the remedy, I think that if the telegraphic news we have got from Grant's army is true, it will have more effect in lowering the price of gold and producing what we desire than all the acts we have passed and all we could pass, and all the speeches that have been or will be made.

For myself I confess that I have very little confidence in this bank bill; but as I do not profess to know so much as a good many men, I am content to do on this as I have done on a number of other occasions. When the Administration, the Secretary of the Treasury, and those associated with him, who are intrusted by the Constitution and by the people with the business of managing their Departments, have devoted as much attention to the matter as they have, and come forward and propose this measure, and tell us that in their judgment it is one essential to the salvation of the country and to enable them to discharge the duties which the Constitution and the people have devolved on them, I am willing to yield to their sagacity, to their patriotism, and to their judgment, even though they come to conclusions different from what my own poor judgment would have indicated. My judgment on this matter would have been that this bank bill will be of very little effect either for good or for evil; but as the Secretary of the Treasury thinks it will have a beneficial effect and enable him better to discharge his duties as the head of the Treasury Department, I am willing to go for it.

But much as I am willing to give up to the Secretary of the Treasury or to the Administration on this subject, let me tell you, sir, that if you pass this bill and undertake to exempt these national banks from the power of taxation by the States, or if you undertake by any indirect means to do the same thing, you will create a storm in this country that you cannot withstand. It is utterly useless to decry State rights and State sovereignty. I know that the doctrine of State sovereignty has wrought infinite mischief in the country. It is the parent of this rebellion; and the Virginia doctrines of State rights promulgated in the last century are deluging that land with blood to-day and converting its once fertile fields into a desolation and a waste. But while I loathe and detest and abhor the doctrine of State rights carried to that extent, we must remember that there are States, that they have powers; that it is just as essential to the perpetuity and the salvation of this country that the States should be preserved in their just and legitimate power as that the Union should exist. What is the Union? It is a union of States; and when you destroy the States really or substantially, you will have nothing to make a Union of. The States must be sustained in the first place as the pillars of the temple of the Federal Union. I apprehend that if you will look at the history of taxation you will find that in many if not most of the States of this Union the tax on banks is the one tax that yields the States the most income and which bears the most lightly on the people. The State governments derive no inconsiderable portion of their revenue from the tax on banks; and this amendment which undertakes in substance, for that is the substance of it, to strike them all out of existence would be the most fatal blow that could be made at the legitimate sovereignty of the States.

Mr. President, the States, as I have said, derive no inconsiderable portion of their revenue from this source, and the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin is substantially to repeal the charters of all the State banks. The Senator shakes his head, I have no doubt sincerely. I will not tell him that when he shakes it there is nothing in it; I know there is a good deal in it. But let me ask the Senator, does he suppose there is a bank in any State that can to-day redeem in gold or silver? Not one. Besides, what would you think of a Government which does not pay its own debts in gold and silver, which issues a currency depreciated as our currency is now depreciated, and then turns round and says to the banks, "Although we do not pay gold and silver, although we use a depreciated currency and are compelled to do so in order to maintain the national life, yet you shall do what we cannot do?" Why not let the United States go into bankruptcy if they have to use depreciated paper, instead of saying to the banks in the States that they must pay gold and silver or go into bankruptcy?

However speciously this amendment may be presented—and I know the Senator from Wisconsin can present his views as forcibly and as speciously as anybody—the real substance of it is a blow, a death-blow at all the banks in the United States; and when you have enacted it you have stricken a more fatal blow at the Union of these States than this rebellion did. We can get over that; we are getting over it; but when you strike such a blow as this and prostrate all the banks at the footstool of the General Government, submitting them to a rule which you cannot live by yourselves, you will have struck a fatal blow at the very existence of the States. It is for these reasons that I am opposed to this amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I desire very briefly to reply to two or three of the positions taken by my honorable friend from New Hampshire. He says, in the first place, that my amendment would be in better form, in fewer words, and much more effective if I would simply say, "Be it enacted, That all the constitutions of the several States are hereby abolished." I do not yield to my honorable friend from New Hampshire in my sincere respect as well as my deep and settled conviction in the necessity of this Government, as well as the State governments themselves, maintaining, preserving, and defending all the rights of the States under the Constitution of the United States. I believe in State rights, sir; that they are expressly mentioned, reserved, protected, and defended in the Constitution itself, and as they are reserved by our Constitution, protected, and defended; I believe in those rights, and as a citizen of the United States, and as a citizen of a State, I feel bound to respect and to defend them. While I say this, I go as far as that honorable Senator goes or can go in the denunciation of that specious doctrine put forth and maintained by Calhoun and those who have followed him in relation to the rights of the several States, which, as he maintained, would enable them to abolish the Union and overthrow the Constitution and destroy the Government. Sir, our system is complex: the States have rights and the Union has rights, and the Constitution of the United States is the bond of that Union, and the guarantee of them all. The Constitution of the United States gives to this Government its rights; the Constitution of the United States defends the rights of the several States, and by one of the express provisions of the Constitution this Government is bound to protect, defend, and preserve the republican form of government in every State under the Constitution, which secures to the people the right to govern themselves, and secures the rights of the States themselves.

But, sir, this proposition of mine in no respect whatever trenches upon the constitutional rights of the States; and if the honorable Senator from New Hampshire desires to meet me on that ground, I am prepared to do so, and I believe I can demonstrate that, by the men who made the Constitution of the United States, by the history of the times when it was made, by the debates in the Convention where it was made, it was the express understanding and determination of the men who made our Constitution to give to this Government the absolute, the unlimited, the unquestioned control over the currency of the United States or over that which was to circulate as the money of the people of the United States. Among the express powers given to this Government was one to establish a uniform system of weights and measures, to coin money, and to regulate the value thereof. It forbid the States to issue bills of credit, and bills of credit at the day when those words were used meant paper money and nothing else, as decided by our courts and so understood.

I know that by the action of the Government for sixty or seventy years it has been held and maintained that the States have the power to incorporate institutions to issue paper money. The people have acquiesced in it; the courts have decided in favor of it; Legislatures have admitted that right; and so long has that right been exercised and acquiesced in that I, in the present state of things, am obliged to recognize these institutions as existing institutions, defended by long usage, by law, and by the decisions of the courts. That is the true state of the case. But when I assert the power of this Government to coin money and regulate the value thereof, when I assert that this Government has just as much control over the standard of value as it has over weights and measures, I do not trench upon the constitutional rights of the States nor upon any of those rights.

Mr. President, in my opinion, the men who made the Constitution intended to have no money but gold and silver. They intended that no paper money should be issued under the authority of the States or under the authority of the Federal Government either. Vexed and goaded as they had been by paper money, having drank of its bitterness to the very dregs, they met, in the Convention which formed the Constitution, hard money men. They had learned from experience what all philosophy teaches, that a thing to be done is not yet done, that the future is not the present, that a mere promise to pay money is not money itself. Gouverneur Morris in that Convention declared "the moneyed interest will oppose the plan of Government if paper emissions be not prohibited."

Gouverneur Morris, the leading financial man, I may say, of the Convention which formed the Constitution, declared that the Union itself could not be formed unless paper emissions by the States should be prohibited. Mr. Mason, in that Convention, also declared that "he had a mortal hatred to paper money." Ellsworth declared "that it was a favorable moment to shut and bar the door against paper money." "Paper money," said another, "can in no case be necessary." Wilson said in this Convention that "he would remove the possibility of paper money." Randolph expressed his antipathy to paper money. Langdon said that "he would rather reject the whole plan"—that was the plan of the Constitution—"than retain these three words: 'and emit bills;'" which meant bills of credit or paper money.

I maintain, Mr. President, that the intention was to give to this Federal Government complete control not only of weights and measures, of the pound, the bushel, the yard-stick, but the power to fix the standard of value, the medium of exchange for products and services as well as for the payment of debts, and that that standard should be fixed in gold and silver coin only; and it is equally certain, in my opinion, that they intended to provide, and they believed they had provided, against the possibility of paper money being issued under either State or Federal authority. I believe that such was the real intent of the men who made the Constitution, and what they really said in the words they put into the Constitution. They intended that this Government should have no money but gold and silver. They struck out "bills of credit" when they made the Constitution, on the very ground, as one member said, that he would brand paper money as the Beast of Revelation. The idea of putting into the Constitution the power to emit bills of credit was expressly negated, and bills of credit meant paper money and nothing else. Still I agree, as I stated a little while ago, that the long acquiescence of the people, the action of the State governments, the decisions of the courts, and the action of this Government, have recognized the fact that these banking institutions of the States are established institutions, and I am bound to recognize that fact; but I will not go so far as to say that this Government has not the power to control them, at least to the extent of compelling them to redeem their notes in gold and silver on demand.

Now, Mr. President, I come to another point raised by the Senator from New Hampshire. He says that we are authorized to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy. That is very true; but what does uniformity mean except that it shall be uniform throughout the whole country and in every State? I undertake to say that bankrupt laws have always been applied to classes, and only to particular classes. I know that the bankrupt law of 1841 of the United States was made more general and was intended to embrace more classes of men than were ever brought under the operation of a bankrupt law before; but bankrupt laws have generally been confined simply to merchants, to particular classes of individuals, traders, and bankers. The uniformity which is required of us is that the law shall be the same in one State as another; that it shall apply to the class of individuals to whom we apply it with justice, equality, uniformity; and this amendment does apply it, not merely to the State banks, but to every banker and every banking corporation which shall fail to redeem its future issues in gold and silver. Here is a point that the Senator from New Hampshire overlooked altogether.

The Senator from New Hampshire complained that in this provision I was seeking to compel the State banks to do what we do not do ourselves. No, sir. What I say in the amendment is that new issues hereafter to be made, which are not already made, shall be redeemed in gold and silver, for my purpose is to stop the swelling of the volume. If they will put in circulation bank paper which is redeemable at any moment on demand at their counter, I do not object to such banks being formed and putting their notes in circulation as money, nor does this amendment prevent it.

The Senator from New Hampshire cannot doubt, I think, that it is the law of Congress alone which authorizes banks now at their counter to redeem in anything else but gold and silver. It is our own act which allows them to redeem with our legal-tender notes. No State under the Constitution has the power to authorize a bank to pay in anything else but gold or silver, and in the courts of every State in the Union if a bank was prosecuted for not redeeming its bills it would be compelled to pay in gold and silver but for the law of the United States authorizing redemption in legal-tender notes. Can we not take back the privilege which we have granted, this privilege of redeeming debts in something besides gold and silver?

Can we not say to a certain set of banking corporations that are expanding the volume of our currency, endangering our credit, threatening the country with financial ruin, that if they will persist in this course, if they will put in circulation irredeemable bank paper beyond their capital, beyond the limit that we fix, not that their charter shall be repealed, not that the State laws shall be invalid, but that our own law, which authorizes them now to redeem in something besides gold and silver, shall be repealed so far as it gives them that advantage? That is all there is of it. We take back the privileges we have given to men to pay debts in something besides money, in our legal-tender notes, and we take it back from those corporations that are swelling the circulation and doing those things which of necessity swell the volume of paper and endanger the credit and carry up the price of gold.

The honorable Senator says, referring to a telegram which it is said has been received from the field of operations, that if the telegram be true that Grant has succeeded in driving Lee from the field of battle it will do more than any speech or any act of Congress to reduce the price of gold. I believe it. I believe that if General Grant wins a decided victory now it will be the final crushing and decisive blow upon this rebellion. I believe that if he has succeeded, or is succeeding now, this Government will be established in the minds of our own people and in the minds of the whole civilized world upon a foundation which can never be shaken, and when it is once so established its credit will command the whole money of the world. Let the fact go out to Europe that we have won the decided victory, that we have established this Government beyond peradventure, that there can be no doubt and no failure in the maintenance of this Union, and our bonds will be sought for by all the money kings of the world as the most precious of all the investments that can be made, and gold will flow across the ocean to this country to purchase those bonds, and of necessity the price of gold will come down and the price of our securities will go up. I can believe all that.

At the same time, next, as I stated sometime ago, to the great military question in the hands of General Grant, is this question in our own hands in relation to the volume of paper money which we put in circulation, or which we allow to remain in circulation among the people of the country. It is for us, I think, the responsibility is on us, the Congress of the United States, to seize this business of money in this country, the business of circulation, to regulate it, to restrain it by proper enactments; and while we make war neither on the State banks nor on the national banks, neither upon the ideas of the Secretary of the Treasury nor upon the ideas of the great financiers of New York and New England and the country throughout, we can by proper legislation reconcile them all on a safe, solid, moderate basis which we ourselves can enact and dictate, and which it is our duty here to do.

The Senator from New Hampshire says that if we by our enactment here shall impose a different system of taxation upon the State banks from what is imposed on the national associations, we shall raise a financial storm that we cannot resist. Sir, it may be so. I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire that we ought to tax these banking institutions precisely upon the same basis. The advantages which we give to these national associations are of another kind. We make them our depositaries; we receive their money in payment of debts due to this Government; and this is an immense advantage, let me say to the Senator from Ohio. It gives them credit; they are backed up by the whole credit of the Government and its immense operations, amounting to $1,000,000,000 per annum.

The very fact that the currency of these banks can be received in all these transactions, when the State bank paper money cannot be received at all, is of itself benefit enough to confer on these institutions to induce the State banks to organize under the system. But when you come to the question of taxation, it is not necessary that we should discriminate and tax the State banks more severely than we tax these national associations. We should, as the Senator from New Hampshire says, I doubt not, produce a storm in the country that we could not resist; and let me ask him as bearing on that same question, if by carrying out the policy of this bill and what is alleged to be the policy of the Secretary of the Treasury and the advocates of his policy on this floor, you declare open war against the State banks, what kind of a storm will you raise then? Gentlemen may smile at it now; but if, as the Senator from New Hampshire says, the simple proposition to tax the State banks more than you tax the national banks, will raise a storm which you cannot resist, what kind of a storm must you meet when you undertake to carry provisions, the avowed purpose of which is to absolutely destroy the State banks altogether? Are we prepared for that?

Mr. JOHNSON. Since this amendment was offered by the honorable member from Wisconsin, on Friday last, I have considered it with a very earnest wish to arrive at a conclusion such as would bring about the object he has in view, the reduction of the circulation of the country to some fixed sum which would be sufficient and only sufficient for the business of the community; but I have been unable to see either that Congress has the power which my friend's amendment assumes to exercise, or that if it had the power, the object he has in view would be accomplished by it.

I do not propose to argue now the right of the States to charter banks. The debates to which my friend has referred in the Convention, as we have all seen, are equally applicable to paper money issued by the Government of the United States as to paper money issued by the States. There is not a single reason suggested by either of the gentlemen who participated in that debate which is not as applicable to the first as to the last. They were against all paper money; but it was uniformly held afterwards—and perhaps the gentlemen who participated in that debate did not mean to go further—that paper money redeemable in gold and silver would be legitimate money; and from that time until this the States have been chartering banks; the United States upon two occasions have chartered a bank; and the State banks and the Bank of the United States have been authorized to issue paper money.

But the most striking instance—I am not here to say whether it is constitutional or not—is in the legislation which Congress during these troubles have thought proper to adopt. We have not only issued paper money, but we have gone perhaps further than ever was gone before, and gone perhaps further than the framers of the Constitution ever contemplated: we have made that paper money a legal tender.

Mr. COLLAMER. Even for past debts.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir; even in the discharge of debts already contracted. As I have just stated, it is not my purpose to contest the validity of that legislation, except so far as to say that if I had had a seat on the floor of the Senate at that time, with the opinions I then entertained and now entertain, I should have voted against that measure. But it is now the law of the land, as far as Congress can make it the law of the land, and it has received more or less the sanction of the judiciary of the States, and, as I believe, a portion of the judiciary of the United States; and even if there was a reasonable doubt as to the constitutionality of such legislation, in the present condition of the country I would rather think it the duty of the judiciary to yield their particular doubt rather than decide against the measure when that decision would be fruitful of almost ruin to the country.

But, Mr. President, if there is an authority in the States to authorize associations to issue paper to be used as currency in the transactions between man and man, then it is certainly not in the power of the United States, except under the clause to which I shall advert in a moment, to interfere by legislation with that power. It is a matter exclusively as between the State and the corporation. It is a matter in regard to which the citizens of each State alone are to be consulted and over which they alone have control. Assuming, therefore, that the power exists in the States, I am unable to see upon what ground the first or the second section of the amendment proposed by my friend from Wisconsin can be maintained. It tells us that the first section is not obnoxious to the objection that it interferes with any existing State right or the right of any existing bank under State law to issue currency, because it professes only to deal with such issues as may hereafter be sent forth by these banks and not with any notes which are already outstanding. If that be so, the result would be that these banks would have two kinds of issues. The circulation which they have now outstanding they will have a right to keep outstanding, and they will not only have a right to keep it outstanding where it is not brought in for redemption, but as often as it may be brought in for redemption they will have a right to reissue it, and the obligation which this proposition imposes upon the banks of redeeming their circulation in gold and silver will not apply to that circulation, but will apply to such as they may issue after the passage of this act, the result of which would be that the banks might have $100,000 of paper that they would be obliged to redeem in gold and silver, and one, two, three, or four hundred thousand dollars, as might be the extent of the present issue, which they would not be obliged to redeem in gold and silver.

But there is another difficulty, which, perhaps, is one more of expediency than of power. By your tender law you have made it the duty of these banks to receive in payment of debts due them your notes; they have no choice. Every debt that is due to the banks already by contracts now made, and every debt which the banks may hereafter have by contracts hereafter to be made, may all be discharged as against the banks by the debtors of the banks in this paper money. If you compel them to take paper money in discharge of their debts, how are they to redeem in gold and silver? If I am answered by saying they must keep in bank the exact amount of the circulation which you compel them to pay in specie, how long will it stay there? A bank has $200,000 to-day in coin, and it has $200,000 in circulation which it is obliged to redeem in coin. How is it to redeem that circulation if they are permitted to keep it out afterwards, after the coin which they are to use in meeting the $200,000 is exhausted? Then they have no coin with which to meet the circulation. Therefore the whole effect of the amendment, if I understand it, is that after the first issue to which this provision will apply has been made, if the amount of coin in the bank is not more than sufficient to meet that first issue, they will not thereafter be able to make any second issue.

But there is another thing which I submit to my friend from Wisconsin. Admitting that you have a right to exact of them a redemption in gold and silver coin on demand of issues which they may make under the authority of this amendment; suppose they do not do it; what is to be done?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In answer to both this and the other question I will say, that provision only applies to new issues hereafter to be made, and in the existing state of the country I do not expect under this provision any such issues would be made at all.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then there is no necessity for the provision.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There is a necessity for this provision or some provision to prevent the State banks now existing from issuing beyond what they have already issued.

Mr. JOHNSON. That I understand, but that does not get rid of the difficulty.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If they are compelled to redeem what they hereafter issue in gold and silver?

Mr. JOHNSON. But suppose they do not, what are you to do with them? What I mean to say is this: there must be some mark by which you can identify the new issue from the old issue. Otherwise how can a man who holds the note of a bank tell whether he is entitled to receive payment of it in gold and silver or not? By the date?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not like to interrupt the Senator; but he is putting questions to me as if he was asking a reply at the moment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not object to it at all. But I was about to ask, supposing now the power exists—I do not propose to say anything more on that subject—and supposing one of these banks to issue more than the amount of its present circulation, or if the bank draws in a portion of its present circulation it thinks proper to issue another circulation, and that other circulation you require to be redeemed in gold and silver coin on demand, and the banks refuse so to redeem it, what are you to do?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suppose the only difficulty would be in the evidence of the holder in proving what notes had been issued after the passage of this act calling upon them to redeem on demand in gold and silver. If they did not so redeem, he could sue them and recover a judgment and compel them to pay it. If there is any difficulty about the identification of the particular bills that are issued after this act takes effect, provisions could easily be made that would cover that so as to secure to the party the proper evidence.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think it would be attended with very great perplexity in every way.

So much for the first section of the amendment. The second section provides:

That from and after the passage of this act every person, banker, banking association, or banking corporation shall reduce the amount of its notes, bills, or certificates in circulation as money to the amount of its cash capital actually paid in and — per cent. added thereto.

Then the amendment specifies the installments by which that reduction is to be brought about. It seems to me, and I suggest it to the consideration of my friend from Wisconsin, that that is a clear violation of the rights of the States, which I assume to exist, to have banking corporations and to say how much a bank shall issue upon its capital. In the first place, how much capital a bank shall have and how much it shall be permitted to issue upon that capital must be a State regulation, providing it has jurisdiction over the subject at all. If that be so, the right is clearly interfered with if you say by congressional legislation that they shall not issue more than a certain amount, or that if they have already issued under the laws which authorized them to issue more than the amount you think proper or expedient, they shall reduce the excess to what you suppose to be the legitimate amount. I suppose it to be very plain that whether a bank violates its charter or not is a matter as between the State granting the charter and the corporation itself, and therefore, assuming, I repeat again, that there is authority in the States to grant the charter, that must be a question over which the United States have no control.

My friend from Wisconsin said the other day that he thought it was very clear under the Constitution of the United States that over the subject of currency the Government of the United States has exclusive jurisdiction, although he admitted then and admits now that the right of the States to establish banking corporations was too long settled to be successfully contested. But assuming, as he says he did, that Congress has power over the subject of money, likening the currency to money, because Congress has the authority to coin money and to regulate the value thereof, he says it must have the authority to interfere by regulation with State issues of money or quasi money, but yet he seems to admit that that of itself would not give to Congress authority to terminate any of the banking charters of the States; but he maintains that it might be done under what has been termed the bankrupt law. My honorable friend is not to be told, nor is the Senate to be told, that in relation to the authority of the Government to interfere under that clause with State corporations very serious doubts have been entertained. It was proposed at one time in Congress, and whether a doubt as to the authority of Congress over the subject led to the defeat of the contemplated legislation or not I am not sure, but it was defeated. I confess that for one I have always supposed that under the authority to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy corporations might be included. The doubt originally entertained when the first bankrupt act was passed and entertained when the second bankrupt act was passed, was whether the clause was applicable to any other class of traders, so to speak, than those who were merchants, whether it could be extended at all for the benefit of those who might desire to become bankrupt. It was supposed to be an involuntary right as far as the bankrupt was concerned; but that doubt, I think, has been long since set at rest.

But one thing is certain, that whether Congress under the authority to establish a uniform rule on the subject of bankruptcy may include corporations and declare them to be bankrupt, it must do so by passing such a bankrupt act. You cannot make these corporations and nobody else bankrupt. Over the subject itself of a failure to meet engagements, Congress must legislate by some uniform rule. It would be unjust legislation, and therefore, as I think, not within the meaning of the clause, that Congress should interfere with these corporations and have them brought into bankruptcy if they fail to pay their obligations in gold and silver, and leave everybody else at liberty to discharge his obligations in paper money. But it would be especially hard to apply that clause of bankruptcy to these institutions when you have yourselves made it their duty to receive in payment of debts due to them this paper currency.

I admit, with the honorable mover of this amendment, and on that subject there is no difference of opinion I suppose among the members of the Senate, that it is very desirable that the currency if it be inflated should be reduced. We all concur in that. The only question is, how is it to be reduced? My friend from Wisconsin, if I understood him this morning, assumed as true that these $300,000,000 were to be added to the amount which he supposes now to be outstanding as currency, which I think he said was $700,000,000 or $800,000,000 more, making $1,000,000,000. I do not understand that to be the object or the effect of the bill. The $300,000,000 which may be issued under this bill if it becomes a law is sooner or later, or as soon as possible, to take the place of $300,000,000 now outstanding. The Secretary of the Treasury cannot contemplate keeping out all his issues, and having sent forth in addition to that amount $300,000,000 more.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will ask my honorable friend, is there any such provision in the bill requiring him only to issue this national currency as the present paper circulation shall be withdrawn?

Mr. JOHNSON. No; I do not know that there is.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Then my argument is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Secretary's letter assumes an opinion, which we hold in common with him, that the currency is to be reduced. He proposes to accomplish it in part by means of these banks.

Mr. COLLAMER. He proposes to reduce it by curtailing the State banks, not these at all.

Mr. JOHNSON. He does not propose to curtail these banks. He proposes to let them issue $300,000,000. What I meant to say was that the Secretary of the Treasury, when he is complaining of the surplus of issue, and is attributing the financial difficulties of the country to that surplus, certainly cannot mean that he will have anything to do in keeping the surplus out.

Mr. COLLAMER. He put it out.

Mr. JOHNSON. But he must mean to take it in. If he does not succeed in limiting the amount of the State issues I do not see how he is to do it. If he does not succeed in limiting the amount of the State issues then there is only one other way in which he can succeed in limiting the circulation, and that will be by withdrawing from circulation a portion of that which he has himself issued. I am reminded by the honorable member from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that he has not issued by two or three hundred million dollars what he was authorized to issue. He has not issued it because he is unwilling to inflate the currency. I do not know—I speak in comparative ignorance; the members of the Finance Committee, and especially my friend from Ohio, who is perhaps more particularly informed on this subject, can tell me—what the amount of outstanding circulation was when our troubles began. There were some two hundred and twenty million dollars, I believe, of bank circulation, and there was supposed to be about two hundred and fifty million dollars of coin circulation, making four or five hundred million dollars. The latter was more or less a matter of conjecture. You can never tell the amount of gold and silver actually in a community.

Mr. COLLAMER. Your statement of the circulation includes all the southern States.

Mr. JOHNSON. It includes all the southern States, as a matter of course. We have lost that; and I dare say they have lost it too. It has gone from us.

Now, how much circulation do we need? If the United States needed before these troubles commenced $500,000,000 of circulation consisting of paper and of coin, I suppose it is not too much to say that the wants of the loyal States, looking to the necessities of the Government and the large transactions in which they are engaged from time to time, will need some five or six hundred million dollars; that is to say, they will need more than the whole country required before the war commenced.

But, Mr. President, I rose principally for the purpose of saying that I cannot vote for the amendment proposed by the honorable member from Wisconsin, because I do not see that we have the power to do—

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to ask the Senator, with his permission, if I understood him correctly when I understood him to say there were $250,000,000 of gold in circulation in this country in 1860.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is supposed to be the amount of gold in circulation in the whole country at that time.

Mr. HENDERSON. There never was anything like that amount in circulation in this country.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know what you call "circulation." It was in the banks and in private hands. As I said, it is impossible to ascertain the exact amount of gold and silver in any country. I mean coin: I do not mean gold or silver that is in family use as plate or ornament. I meant to say this: that the amount of gold and silver coin in the country at the commencement of the war was supposed to be $250,000,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. In circulation?

Mr. JOHNSON. In circulation, in the banks, and in private hands, as I have always understood. I may be in error about it.

Mr. HENDERSON. There may possibly have been $200,000,000 of coin in this country in 1860; but I apprehend that under their charters the banks were required to keep a large amount of that coin on hand, and I believe they did have over $80,000,000 in coin in their vaults at that period. I have no idea, however, that there was exceeding from eighty to one hundred million dollars in coin in circulation in this country in 1860 or at any other time.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is impossible to tell the amount of circulation; nor can any one tell with accuracy the amount in the country ready to be circulated. All that can be done is to approximate to that amount, and if my memory does not serve me faithfully it was supposed to be about $250,000,000 in the banks and in private hands.

Mr. HENDERSON. It may possibly be.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I see, or at least I think I see, that there are mischiefs connected with this system; but I can also see that there are benefits which may be the result of it. The mischiefs resulting from the system, as I think, are that it brings the Government more closely in connection with the moneyed interest of the country. Another mischief is one which I suppose the Senate will protect the States against—they have done it already and I suppose they will adhere to that amendment—by leaving these banks subject to State taxation.

But the benefit to the country is that it proposes and promises to give a uniform currency. The want of that currency from the beginning of the Government at all periods, except when the Bank of the United States was in existence, everybody has felt. It was a crying evil. The Bank of the United States, as long as it was in existence, in a great measure remedied that mischief; but the Bank of the United States is now extinct. We have no currency except the currency which exists under State authority and the currency which the United States have authorized by their legislation. We know that there is no uniformity existing now; and just in proportion as the want of uniformity is great is the loss which the community suffer.

There is another benefit which I think I can see in the system. It will enable the Government in the future to raise money with more facility than they are able to raise it now. They are raising money now ostensibly at par; that is, $100 of stock brings to them $100 in what they call money; but that money consists in Treasury notes, and in the market it is at some forty or fifty per cent. discount; so that they are really getting only some sixty dollars for $100. If this banking system places it or promises to place it, in the power of the Government to carry on the war in which we are now engaged, and hereafter to carry on the country after the war shall have terminated, with more facility than it is able to do now or has been able to do in the past, let us give it a fair trial. If it turns out in the future that it will be productive of the mischiefs referred to by my friend from Missouri, the correction is in the hands of Congress. The last section of the charter gives to Congress the authority to repeal or modify it. It is unlike the charter of the Bank of the United States. That was granted for a specific period. This exists only so long as Congress thinks proper to let it exist. Individually, therefore, as a reason for my vote, I shall vote for the bill provided the amendment as to taxing by the States is preserved and one or two other amendments not so important as that are adopted, and against the amendments suggested by the member from Wisconsin.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suppose it is not likely that we shall dispose of this bill to-day. I have just received a communication from the honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. HARRIS,] who is detained at his hotel to-day by indisposition, that he expects to be in his seat to-morrow, and desires to vote upon some of these questions before they are decided. I will therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. We have business to attend to in executive session.

Mr. SHERMAN. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust that we shall go on and finish this matter some time. There must be an end of all things, as Sancho Panza says, and there must be an end to this bank bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not object to its being continued. I only state that I have received a note from the Hon. Mr. HARRIS, who desires to be present when the vote is taken on this important question. He expects to be in his seat to-morrow. I have no objection to continuing the consideration of the bill, if the Senator thinks it desirable; but we have business in executive session that should be attended to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will withdraw that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be done by unanimous consent, the yeas and nays having been ordered. The Chair hears no objection, and the motion is withdrawn. The question recurs on the adoption of the first branch of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin. The Chair understood the Senator from Maryland to call for a division of the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWE. Let it be reported.

The Secretary read the amendment, to insert at the end of the bill, as an additional section, the following:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act no person, banker, banking association, or banking or other corporation shall make, issue, or reissue any bills, notes, or certificates of any kind or denomination whatever, designed to circulate as money, which at the passage of this act shall not be actually issued and in circulation as money under the laws of the United States or of the several States, unless the said person, banker, banking association, or corporation shall redeem the same at its place of business in gold and silver coin on demand: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit those associations which have become duly organized under the provisions of "An act to provide for a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States stocks, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved February 25, 1863, and shall have transferred and delivered to the Treasurer of the United States the bonds of the United States, under the provisions of the fifteenth and sixteenth sections of said act, from receiving the currency to which they have become entitled, and from putting the same into circulation as money under the provisions of said act: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit any existing banker, bank, banking association, or corporation existing under the laws of any State, and having notes, bills, or certificates in circulation as money, from organizing themselves into banking associations under the said act of Congress and acts amendatory thereto; and in case of such organization, and upon complying with the provisions of said act, they shall be entitled to receive and put into cir-ulation, of the national currency provided for in said act, an amount equal to the amount of the notes, bills, or certificates of said bank in circulation, which shall be from time to time withdrawn from circulation, redeemed, and canceled, not exceeding the amount of its capital stock.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to have the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. HARRIS] is confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. POWELL. I desire to state that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NESMITH] is detained at his lodgings by indisposition.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 3, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Doolittle, and Harlan—3.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Joice, Kansas, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Salisbury, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Collamer, Foot, Harding, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomerooy, Richardson, Trumbull, and Wright—14.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now will be on the second branch of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, to add at the end of the bill, as a new section, the following:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, every person, banker, banking association, or banking corporation shall reduce the amount of its notes, bills, or certificates in circulation as money to the amount of its cash capital actually paid in and — per cent. added thereto, or to the amount actually secured by the pledge of the stocks of the United States, or of the State where the bank or banking office is situated, pursuant to the laws of the United States or of the State where the bank is situated; said reduction to be made in the following manner: one fourth of said excess of circulation beyond what is above provided shall be redeemed and canceled on or before the 1st day of — next; one half on or before the 1st day of — next; three fourths on or before the 1st day of — next; and the remainder on or before the 1st day of — next; and upon all bills, notes, and certificates issued or reissued, or remaining in circulation as money, over and above the amount as provided in this and the preceding section, the said several bankers, banks, or banking corporations shall pay to the United States a tax of one per cent. per month.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend that amendment—

Mr. CHANDLER. Vote it down and let it go.

Mr. WILSON. No; I am for it. Senators will find that they have been engaged in a very poor business in passing this bill unless some such provision as this is inserted in it. I move to insert in the fifth line of the amendment after the word "of" the words "ninety per cent. of," and in the fifth and sixth lines to strike out the words "and — per cent. added thereto;" so that it will read:

That from and after the passage of this act, every person, banker, banking association, or banking corporation shall reduce the amount of its notes, bills, or certificates in circulation as money to the amount of ninety per cent. of its cash capital actually paid in.

If this amendment prevails, we shall put the State banks on the same footing that we put these national banks, and allow them to circulate ninety per cent. of their capital stock actually paid in. I certainly see no reason why we should allow this discrimination in favor of the State bank circulation against the banks that we are establishing by this bill. Some of these State banks with a capital of $100,000 have $200,000, $300,000, and $400,000 of paper circulation. I think we should tax it out of existence at once, and put the State banks on the same footing that we put our own national banks. As it now stands, we discriminate against ourselves. Therefore, sir, I am for this amendment.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. This amendment if adopted will be very unjust toward the State that I represent. We have no State banks. Five or six of our cities are getting ready to organize under the national banking system; but if this amendment should be adopted Kansas will be left out. I suppose the Senator does not want to rule Kansas out.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think, if the Senator from Massachusetts will look at the effect of the adoption of this amendment, he will abandon his attempt to amend it, and will vote against it. It directs that one fourth of the "excess of circulation beyond what is above provided shall be redeemed and canceled on or before the 1st day of — next." I will ask any Senator what power we have to say to a bank organized under a State law, the mere creature of State law, that it shall cancel so much of its circulation by such a time? We may, and intend to do so in the tax bill, levy a severe tax upon the excess of circulation above ninety per cent. of its capital stock; but it must only be in the form of a tax. I assure the Senator from Massachusetts that his object will be accomplished if he will keep out of this bill everything that relates to the State banks. The House of Representatives, in the revenue bill, have already put a very heavy tax on the State banks; and it will be within our power to amend it so as to make a very large tax upon the excess of circulation above ninety per cent., and a more moderate tax on that below ninety per cent. That course will probably be adopted by the Committee on Finance; but whether it is or not, we will then have it in our power to levy on the State banks an equitable tax. This amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, it seems to me, is clearly unconstitutional and ineffective, because the courts would say at once, the moment the question was raised, "The United States have no power to say that the State banks shall, within a limited time, cancel so much of their obligation." I trust, therefore, it will not be adopted.

Mr. WILSON. I understand the tax bill before us taxes the national banks and the State banks alike.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are taxed alike so far as the ninety per cent. of circulation is concerned; but all in excess of that is taxed very heavily. It will accomplish the Senator's object.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, if this object is to be accomplished, I care not whether it is accomplished in this bill or in the internal tax bill. It seems to me, however, that when we are passing an act the object of which is to take care of the currency of the country, we ought in this very act in some form to provide for the reduction of the excessive circulation of these State banks. It seems to me that we have all power over this subject of currency. I know that in the debates of many years ago, when the question of currency was the great question before Congress for years, that the statesmen who engaged in these debates maintained the power of this Government over the question of the currency as absolute and complete. But, sir, if there is a doubt about that, I suppose the Senator from Ohio does not doubt the power to tax this existing banking issue out of existence. I think this is the place to do it and make a certainty of it, for if I knew that we did not intend to adopt this policy I would not vote for this bill. I therefore move to strike out all of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin after the word "that," and to insert what I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts cannot offer another amendment, which would be an amendment in the third degree, without withdrawing his first amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts withdraws his first amendment, and offers another to strike out all after the word "that" in the pending amendment and insert in lieu thereof:

All notes in circulation in money by any persons, bankers, banking associations, or banking corporations, exceeding ninety per cent. of their capital actually paid in shall pay a tax of one per cent. per month.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust that the Senator from Massachusetts, who is undoubtedly a friend of this bill, will not clog it with this amendment. I assure him that this subject of the mode of taxing banks and banking circulation is under consideration now. In addition to the tax there must be a mode provided of assessing and defining it, requiring certain returns to be made, and some machinery to be provided. I trust he will allow that subject to stand where all other taxes stand. I myself desired the tax on the national banks to be stricken out of this bill, but I was overruled in that particular. It was deemed important to reserve the right by the States to tax these national banks; but the committee agreed unanimously, in regard to the general plan of taxing State banks, that it was better to leave it where all other taxes are left and where the necessary machinery may be provided, assessors' returns, collectors, &c., in the internal revenue bill. I trust, therefore, that the Senator will not incur the bill with his amendment.

Mr. WILSON. With these assurances I will withdraw the amendment; but if I believed that it would not be adopted by the Senate I certainly would not consent to support this system. It seems to me to be increasing the circulation of paper money instead of diminishing it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts withdraws his amendment to the amendment, and the question returns to the last branch of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In that amendment as it stands, there are several blanks which have not been filled. I do not propose to take up the time of the Senate by now offering to fill those blanks, and for the present I will withdraw the amendment. I may offer it at some subsequent time.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] moved to reconsider the vote of the Senate the other day on the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER,] and I should like to have that motion to reconsider disposed of now. I will state that after a conference with some Senators who favored that amendment, I have drawn an amendment that will probably be satisfactory and carry out the object of the Senator from Michigan. I trust that the motion to reconsider will be disposed of now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland to reconsider the vote of the Senate on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. GRIMES. Let that amendment be read. The Secretary read the amendment, in section thirty-one, lines twenty-five, twenty-six, twenty-seven, and twenty-eight, to strike out the following words:

St. Louis, Louisville, Chicago, Detroit, Milwaukee, New Orleans, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Pittsburg, Baltimore, Portland, (Maine,) Albany, and San Francisco.

Mr. GRIMES. I ask for the reading of the substitute that the Senator from Ohio proposes.

Mr. SHERMAN. The substitute that I now offer goes upon the supposition that these cities will be restored to the places in which they stood in the bill, and with that explanation Senators will understand the amendment. The amendment that I send to the Chair is an amendment to the thirty-second section of the bill, another section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question will first be put on the motion to reconsider. The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now returns on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CHANDLER. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to insert in the twenty-eighth line of the thirty-first section, after the word "and," the word "Buffalo." I believe there is no objection to it, if the system is to prevail.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now offer an amendment to strike out all of section thirty-two after the enacting clause down to and including the word "par," in line five, in the following words:

That each association shall select, subject to the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, an association in either of the cities named in the preceding section, at which it will redeem its circulating notes at par.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That each association organized in any of the cities named in the foregoing section shall select, subject to the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, an association in the city of New York, at which it will redeem its circulating notes at a rate of exchange for all cities west of the Alleghany mountains not exceeding one fifth of one per cent., and for all cities east of the Alleghany mountains at par; and each of such associations may keep three fifths of its lawful money reserved in cash deposited in the city of New York. And each association not organized within the cities named in the preceding section shall select, subject to the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, an association in either of the cities named in the preceding section, at which it will redeem its notes at par.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the honorable member from Ohio to explain exactly what the purport of that amendment is. I am not sure that I understand it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps I had better explain it, as Senators will then understand it better than by the reading of the formal amendment.

It was manifest from the vote of the Senate the other day that it was their desire to have a uniform redemption, so that this will be a uniform national currency. The banks everywhere being directly or indirectly compelled to redeem in New York, their notes will be at par, or nearly par, everywhere, with only the difference of the expense of transporting the notes from one region of country to the other. If my amendment prevail, all the country banks, as they are called, may redeem at either of the cities named in the thirty-first section; that is, the cities of St. Louis, Louisville, Chicago, Detroit, Milwaukee, New Orleans, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Pittsburg, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Boston, Portland, (Maine,) New York, Buffalo, Albany, and San Francisco. The place of redemption is to be first selected by themselves, with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency. But each association in these centers of redemption must redeem its notes in New York. For the cities lying west of the Alleghany mountains they can be allowed not to exceed the rate of one fifth of one per cent., but for all east of the Alleghany mountains they must be redeemed in New York at par. The effect would be that a bank, say in Maine, might redeem at Boston or Portland, whichever it selects; but Portland and Boston, Philadelphia and Baltimore, Cincinnati and St. Louis, and all the cities named here, must redeem in the city of New York. This is a very severe operation upon the banks; but as Senators expressed by their votes the other day their desire to have this uniform redemption, after consulting with the Comptroller of the Currency and the Secretary of the Treasury, I have prepared this amendment, carrying out that general desire.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will inquire whether the country banks themselves are required to redeem at par in any one of these places.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are compelled by this amendment to redeem at one of the centers named in the thirty-first section.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. At par?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir, at par. In addition to the clause I have drawn there is the following language in the same section:

And the Comptroller shall give public notice of the names of the associations so selected at which redemptions are to be made by the respective associations, and of any change that may be made of the association at which the notes of any association are redeemed. If any association shall fail either to make the selection or to redeem its notes as aforesaid, the Comptroller of the Currency may, upon receiving satisfactory evidence thereof, appoint a receiver, in the manner provided for in this act, to wind up its affairs: Provided, That nothing in this section shall relieve any association from its liability to redeem its circulating notes at its own counter, at par, in lawful money on demand.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will ask the Senator why he cannot change his amendment so as to make it meet substantially the vote of the Senate before, and provide that these banks in these several centers of redemption shall redeem either at New York, Philadelphia, or Boston. It would accommodate more, and I think would be very much more satisfactory to the different regions of country, and answer the purpose as well. Take, for instance, the New England banks. It would be very much better for them if they could redeem in Boston.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the operation of this amendment, all the banks in New England could redeem in Boston at par, or in Portland. Those places are so near together, and Boston is so convenient of access, that probably it would be better that Portland should be stricken out, and then they would be compelled to redeem in Boston at par. But if these places are made centers of redemption, if they are claimed to be so important in their communities as to be centers of redemption where the local banks must redeem their notes, they ought certainly to redeem somewhere else.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to redeeming in Boston.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then Portland should be stricken out as one of the centers of redemption.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is not necessary to do that.

Mr. SHERMAN. If Portland is kept in as a center of redemption for the banks of Maine, then certainly Portland ought to redeem in New York.

Mr. COWAN. Is there anything in the bill to prevent a bank in Maine from redeeming in San Francisco?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Unless the Senator will agree to establish the centers of redemption according to the vote of the Senate the other day I am not prepared to say that I would agree to it; but this proposition to make them all redeem in New York has taken me by surprise. I think perhaps the Senator had better let this particular amendment lie over until to-morrow so that I can look into the matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection. I simply desire to carry out the wish of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. The effect of this amendment is to make Philadelphia, Boston, and all these other places subsidiary to New York.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know but that would be the best way; but, as there is no probability of finishing the bill to-night, I should like this amendment to lie over that I may look into it a little.

Mr. JOHNSON. The western trade is now carried on considerably with Baltimore and Philadelphia, and their balances are there, and they would prefer to have their money there.

Mr. GRIMES. That is but a small portion of the western trade.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly most of the business of New England is done in Boston, and not in New York.

Mr. SHERMAN. Any bank in New England can redeem at Boston, except only the banks of Portland. If Portland is stricken out of the centers of redemption, they may redeem also at Boston.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It involves a little more responsibility just at this moment in reference to my own city than I am willing to take without further consideration. I hope, therefore, the amendment will go over until to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection. I withdraw it for the present. I will ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, unless there be objection.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have two or three amendments that I wish to present that will not occupy much time. It will be observed, in the first place, that this measure provides that the bills issued by these banks shall be received by the Government upon all debts due to Government except duties on imports. In the next place, it provides that these notes shall be payable on all claims on the Government except for interest on the public debt. If I to-day present a bill for one thousand or ten thousand dollars to the bank and demand payment, and they do not pay me in currency, and I go to the Secretary of the Treasury and deposit it there, it becomes a debt upon the Government, and the Government are bound to pay it. It will be observed that when this becomes a debt upon the Government it is to be paid in these same currency notes; so that if I present my money at one bank and they will not pay me, I go to the Treasury and they pay me in another bank's paper, and I go and present that, and they do the same all the way around. In order to correct that, in section twenty-three, line thirteen, after the words "except interest on the public debt," I move to add the words "and in redemption of the national currency;" so that it will read:

And also for the salaries and other debts and demands owing by the United States to individuals, corporations, and associations within the United States, except interest on the public debt and in redemption of the national currency.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the member from Vermont to say in what manner the national currency is to be redeemed under that exception? In gold and silver?

Mr. COLLAMER. I will endeavor to explain. I fancy it has in some measure escaped the notice even of Senators themselves that we have two sorts of currency now provided for, to say nothing about coin. In the first place, we have a national currency. That consists of the notes that these banks issue. Then we have another currency which is called in our law lawful currency. Lawful currency consists in Treasury notes; national currency consists in these bank notes. Now, as it stands, our national currency is not lawful currency. Our national currency is these bank notes.

Our national currency consists of these bank notes; our lawful currency consists of the Treasury notes. The Treasury notes which the nation issues are not the national currency, they are the lawful currency. The result of the jumble is, that the national currency of this country is not the lawful currency, and the lawful currency of this country is not the national currency; the currency issued by the nation is not the national currency. If this is borne in mind—for this is the way it stands in our law—the amendment which I propose will be readily understood by the Senator from Maryland. The paper of these banks we here engage to receive for all debts due to the Government, and we say it shall be payable out on everything due by the Government. As the clause now stands, without my amendment, if these bank notes are not paid by the bank issuing them, and therefore become a claim on the Government, they would be liable, like all other claims on the Government, to be paid in these bank notes. Then the effect would be what I before stated: I go to the bank and they refuse to pay me, and I come to the Treasury for my pay, and I am there paid in the notes of some other bank of the same kind. I then go to that bank and they will not pay, and I come back to the Treasury and they pay me again in the paper of some other national bank. We never can get a redemption in this way, even in lawful currency; and hence it is that I propose to insert here that this bank paper, which is called national currency, when we want to redeem it, and the claim comes upon the Government to redeem it, shall be redeemed in lawful currency.

Mr. SHERMAN. Lawful money.

Mr. COLLAMER. Lawful money. The gentleman has got another refinement and another additional distinction. This just compounds the proportion and makes it a little more algebraic than it was before. Simply by inserting words providing that all these notes shall be paid out on all claims by the Government, except in the redemption of the national currency my object will be attained. That will prevent redeeming this national currency with national currency, and will require the Government when it has occasion to pay the national currency that the bank issuing it does not pay, to pay it in lawful currency or lawful money. That is the only effect of my amendment; and unless gentlemen really wish to keep up a sort of double dealing, a sort of thimble-rigging all the while, they will adopt my amendment. If they desire to keep an everlasting thimble-rigging on the nation, they will reject it.

Mr. JOHNSON. The doubt I had was whether it would compel the United States to pay in coin.

Mr. COLLAMER. No; that is not the effect. It is only to prevent their redeeming it with this same kind of paper.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then it is to allow them to redeem it with Treasury notes.

Mr. COLLAMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that the criticism of the honorable Senator from Vermont is hypercritical. The distinction between the different kinds of money is drawn by the law. Greenbacks are called "lawful money of the United States." That is the name given to them by the law of 1862, and that lawful money is made a legal tender. The notes issued under this act are called national currency. It is necessary always to have descriptive words to describe the different kinds of currency, and therefore all our bonds are by law or by popular designation given a particular name. If anything, a child or a dog or a currency, goes out, it has a name given to it either by its parents or by the people generally. The people have designated the various forms of bonds by the name of five-twenties, ten-forties, and so on. The law of 1862 called the paper issued by the United States "lawful money." That designation is given to it, and we now speak of it every day in common parlance as "lawful money." The Senator did not think it was lawful money, because he thought Congress could not make it a legal tender, and could not therefore invest it with the capacity of lawful money; but still it is lawful money, used and taken and called and named everywhere as lawful money. The bills issued by the banks under this act are called "national currency" in contradistinction from "lawful money," and the act provides that this national currency may at any moment be converted into lawful money.

But the Senator has found a possibility, a remote contingency so far off that I should think it required a great amount of acumen to discover it. He first assumes that a bank has failed and refuses to pay its bills, and the United States assumes payment, and a bill is finally presented to the United States for payment, and then he says that the United States may use the bank bill of some solvent bank under this system to pay this broken bank bill. Suppose it does. The very moment that national currency is not redeemed in lawful money, according to the terms of this act, the bank is closed, wound up, and the currency thus dishonored cannot be used for any purpose. The provisions of the law provide for its cancellation, for its redemption within thirty days. It cannot be used. The very moment the bank breaks and fails to redeem its paper, that moment, or as soon as it is legally ascertained, the Comptroller must appoint a receiver. The receiver seizes upon the assets and converts the assets into lawful money of the United States, lifts and takes up all this national currency, and in the mean time the law provides that the United States itself will redeem it. For the redemption of this paper money the United States has a lien, first upon the bonds of the United States in the vaults of the United States Treasury, next upon all the property of the bank, next it has the individual liability clause, so that it seems to me this remote contingency is scarcely worth guarding against, and it might only embarrass the Government by preventing the Government from paying out the notes of a solvent bank, a money-paying bank, in redemption of the notes of a bank that is broken.

If this bill is a success I have no doubt that within a very few years after the war is over there will be no currency but national currency and gold and silver coin. That is the idea of the Secretary of the Treasury, who, you may say, is the father of this system. For reasons that I will not now discuss, he believes that money issued directly by the Government as a circulating medium cannot be always kept at par, but that a currency resting for its basis upon the stocks of the United States, which the banks are bound to redeem in lawful money of the United States, will more speedily enable him to resume specie payments, and he hopes by the aid of these organizations, after peace shall have come—because we cannot expect to resume specie payments during a time of war—that lawful money, as it is called, of the United States, the notes of the United States, will be funded and retired, and nothing will be left except this national currency and gold and silver coin. The contingency which is sought to be provided for by the honorable Senator is too remote, it seems to me, to give any cause for alarm.

Mr. COLLAMER. It was not necessary for the purpose of answering my argument fairly to try to prejudice it because I made it. The Senator could have answered it on its merits. He has, however, undertaken to inform the Senate that I did not believe in the tender clause. What for? Is that pertinent to the question? Not at all. It is done to prejudice me. It is saying, "You were against the tender clause, and what you say on these questions ought not to be regarded." The allusion could have been made legitimately for no other purpose. I take it, however, that my proposition of amendment is not to be prejudiced much in that way before the Senate. Here I would observe to the Senator from Ohio, that it would be very well if he had in supporting this bill understood the various parts of it and their relation to each other, so as to preserve its consistency in some way. If gentlemen will turn to page 41 they will perceive that the men who carefully considered and drew this bill did not think this such an impossible contingency that it might not be guarded against, for it is there provided that if a man has presented to the Treasury a note of one of these banks which is not paid by the bank, "thereupon the Comptroller shall immediately give notice, in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury shall by general rules or otherwise direct, to the holders of the circulating notes of such association to present them for payment at the Treasury of the United States, and the same shall be paid as presented in lawful money of the United States."

The Senator says my amendment might embarrass the Government and prevent its paying out the bills of good banks, when in this very act it is provided that the payment shall be made in "lawful money," and it is merely to conform the different parts of the bill to each other that I have proposed the amendment. I simply propose to say, in the forefront of the bill, on the 20th page, that this paper which is called national currency shall not be used in redeeming national currency, that it shall not be used to redeem itself, that it shall not be redeemed except in lawful money, as the bill provides in the latter part of it. My proposition is simply to conform the different parts of the bill to each other, to make it consistent with itself. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Henderson, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Trumbull, Wade, Wiley, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Conness, Fessenden, Hale, Howe, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Van Winkle, and Wilkinson—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Davis, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Howard, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ten Eyck, and Wright.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. I now propose this amendment, to come in at the end of section twenty-three:

Every association formed or existing under the provisions of this act shall take and receive at par for any debt or liability to said association any and all notes or bills issued by any association existing under and by virtue of this act.

This is simply to provide that all the associations formed under this act shall receive each other's bills in payment of any debts or claims due them. It does not require them to take on deposit or redeem each other's bills, but simply that they shall receive them in payment of debts.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not the slightest objection to the amendment, but I desire to know where it is to be inserted.

Mr. COLLAMER. I propose to put it at the end of the twenty-third section, but I have no choice as to the place where it shall come in.

Mr. SHERMAN. I prefer that it should come in at the end of section thirty-two, which provides for redemption.

Mr. COLLAMER. Very well, I will propose to put it there.

Mr. SHERMAN. It should be preceded by the words "and provided further, that."

Mr. COLLAMER. I so modify it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. I offer this amendment to follow the one just adopted:

And provided further, That every association which shall be selected and designated as receiver or depository of the public money, shall take and receive at par all of the national currency bills, by whatever association issued, which have been paid to the Government for internal revenue, or for loans or stocks.

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized by the act to designate such of these banks as he shall select as depositories of the public moneys received for taxes, &c. I want to provide that these depository banks shall take all such money as the Government takes, and therefore I have offered this amendment to effect that purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is undoubtedly correct, and I think it is already substantially in the bill; but I prefer that it should be attached to the section authorizing deposits.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have no choice about the place. The Senator can select his own place.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be inserted at the end of section forty-five.

Mr. COLLAMER. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have another amendment, to come in after the word "deposits" in the ninth line of the thirty-first section:

And one half of the coin received by each association from the Treasury for interest on its bonds shall by such association be kept, held, and sequestered as a part of the amount of money required so to be kept on hand, until the full amount is composed of coin, which shall so remain until specie payments shall be resumed.

All gentlemen speak of the institution of these banks and the redemption of their notes in what is called lawful money as a temporary matter, all looking to a condition of things in which there shall be a specie redemption; that is, when these bank notes shall be convertible into specie. I look to that, and hope that will some time or other happen. I speak of the banks because they are already established by law. But it seems to me it would be well to make some little preparation for such an event, to prepare the way to commence again the convertibility of our currency into specie. It is with a view to that that I have offered this amendment.

These banks receive from us six per cent. interest in gold annually on their bonds, the payments being made semi-annually. My proposition is not to require these banks to buy any gold in order to prepare themselves for an ultimate specie redemption; but the bill provides that each bank in the small country towns shall keep a capital of fifteen per cent. on hand and the city banks twenty per cent. over and above and beyond their bonds which make the body of their capital; and inasmuch as that percentage is to be kept, and of course to be kept useless, for the bill says they are to have that much on hand all the time, and of course it is to remain on hand as an ultimate responsibility and not for present use, I desire that they shall keep some of the gold which they receive from the United States on their bonds in aid of that fifteen or twenty per cent. fund until they make up that whole amount in gold, and that then they shall retain it in gold as a reserved fund to meet an ultimate prospect of coin redemption. I propose that they shall keep one half of the gold that they receive from the Government toward this reserved capital until they make up the whole of that capital, and that then they shall continue to reserve it until specie redemptions are resumed.

I am not very tenacious about providing for keeping one half. If gentlemen think it any better or kinder to them to say that they shall keep one fourth of that money until they make up their reserved fund, I have no particular objection. I think they might keep one half. It costs them nothing. True, they cannot make so much by dealing in that gold, selling it out and buying it in over and over; but as they receive it from us for interest on their bonds, and inasmuch as they have got to keep a reserved fund on hand, I desire, and I believe it would be a sound policy, and would help the currency of these banks themselves, to require them to keep a portion of the gold they receive from the Government to make up that fund.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am really desirous to accept every proposition submitted by the honorable Senator that I think will not defeat the object of the bill; but I think this would be a provision so onerous as to defeat the system. Suppose the Senator had in his possession $100,000 of bonds, on which by law he was to receive $6,000 in gold every year, exempt from State taxation, free from all liability to State governments, liable only to the tax imposed by this Government on its own securities, I ask him whether he would care to invest that money in a banking system when he would be compelled, in the first place, to pay all the local taxes that he might be assessed on almost an equal amount of currency issued on the bonds; whether he would be willing to pledge those bonds as security for circulating notes; whether he would be willing to run the risk of the assessment of taxes, the risk of banking, and yet be compelled to lay aside one half of the gold received as interest to lie idle in the vaults of the bank? It seems to me it would defeat the system. It can hardly be expected that this national currency should be made better than our lawful money issued by the United States. It cannot be required to have any more safeguards or sanctions than we impose ourselves on our lawful currency. To require one half the interest to be set aside to lie idle as a fund, it seems to me would be very harsh, and would prevent men from embarking in this business.

When specie payments are resumed in this country it will be by the gradual approach of our lawful paper money to the standard of gold and silver. For instance, if General Grant, and the other generals who are acting under him, should have gained this week a great and glorious victory, and our armies should everywhere be victorious along the whole line, that fact alone would make our lawful money approach the value of gold and silver. Suppose that to-morrow in consequence of such a series of victories peace should be proclaimed in this country, and a united and happy country should again commence its history with even a large debt of $2,000,000,000, who does not know that our lawful money would at once come up very nearly to the standard of gold and silver? But when that lawful currency is reduced and funded, as it would be gradually by the operation of self-interest, by being converted into interest-bearing bonds instead of being simply used as a currency from hand to hand, who does not know that that would bring us back to specie payments? It cannot be done suddenly, nor can we fix a day on which it shall be done, nor will it be done by laying aside little three per cents of gold. It will only be done when the march of victory, when success shall have given us a country able to bear the necessary taxation and able to bring our paper money up to the standard of gold and silver. It seems to me that the immediate effect of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont would be directly contrary to what he desires. He wishes to promote the speedy resumption of specie payments. So do we all. But I ask him whether the accumulation of this gold in the banks of the United States at the rate of $9,000,000 a year, laid aside, accumulated, and withdrawn from circulation, reserved beyond the power of use, will not be likely to make gold scarce? We all suppose that the natural tendency of the hoarding of gold is to raise its value. Is not that the Senator's idea? It seems to me that I have heard something like that from him. We know that the natural tendency of the day, hoarding gold in the vaults of banks and the pockets of individuals, tends to raise the price of gold. Why? Because a certain amount of gold is absolutely necessary to pay the interest on the public debt and for other purposes, and the very moment you diminish the stock of gold that can be used for these purposes you raise its value and consequently put off the time of resuming specie payments. If your law provided for an accumulation of gold at the rate of $9,000,000 a year, because three per cent. on $300,000,000 would be $9,000,000 a year, you would withdraw that gold from the ordinary currency of the country toward the payment of the interest on the public debt; you would hoard it up, and at the same time you require those persons who have to pay your duties on imported goods to pay in gold; and if you add to the accumulations already held by the banks the accumulations recently held by the United States Treasury, it seems to me you defeat the very purpose of the amendment.

The better way is not to depend upon these little reserves, this hoarding of gold in the banks, for the purpose of securing specie payments, but rather to depend on the victory of our arms, the success of our cause, the restoration of the Union, those great public facts which will unlock the bags of the miser and will pour out from the vaults of your banks the accumulated gold that is hoarded by cowardice and fear; and certainly in organizing a system which I hope will lead to the resumption of specie payments sooner than the present system, I would not provide for the accumulation of gold in the vaults of the banks; I would make gold free as air, circulate it as broadly and as readily as possible, in order to expedite that time when gold and paper may stand on a footing of perfect equality, when the debt of the United States may be funded, I trust, at a low rate of interest, and when the national currency which is provided for by this bill may fill that vacuum in our country which has not been filled for many years; when we may have a national currency convertible everywhere, in one part of the United States as in another, redeemable everywhere, based upon public securities, the faith of the nation, redeemable in gold and silver wherever presented. Certainly, in order to lay the foundation for that "good time coming," I would not require these banks to hoard in their vaults beyond the power of use the specie of the country, thus making a demand for that which is absolutely necessary for the legitimate wants of commerce.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Vermont by adding to it the following:

Provided further, That every State bank and individual banker shall be compelled to hold and retain one half of the specie received for interest on Government bonds, until the resumption of specie payments.

I want to perfect the Senator's proposition.

Mr. COLLAMER. If the Senator can contrive any way to execute his, I shall not object to it.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is as practicable as the Senator's.

Mr. COLLAMER. There is no way of executing that; the other we have power over.

Mr. CHANDLER. It will be equally unjust to both; but if it is to be applied to the national banks, I want it applied to all banking institutions, so that there shall be equality.

Mr. COLLAMER. In the one case we have control over the institutions; in the other we have not. In relation to my amendment, I do not want to occupy much time; I do not suppose there is any possibility of its being adopted when the committee are opposed to it, but I will say a single word for it.

The Senator from Ohio says it is requiring the banks to keep money without any use for it. We require them already to keep fifteen per cent. or twenty per cent. on hand, and not use it. That is the provision of the bill. This amendment therefore does not require them to keep any greater amount on hand than the bill now compels them to keep. The result will be that instead of the whole fifteen or twenty per cent. being in greenbacks, the gold they put into that fund will relieve just so many of their greenbacks for use. It is therefore no burden to them. As to its lying idle, I require nothing more than the bill does, so that that argument has no application. Is it supposed that the small amount of gold set apart in this way will affect the currency of the country? Is it desirable that it should be understood by the country that these banks are to have nothing else but their greenbacks and national bonds, that they are not to have any gold, that they are to make no preparation for ultimate redemption in gold, and that we will do nothing calculated to make them do so? Do we want to keep them irresponsible except in a paper currency which we think so valuable? I do not see the wisdom or propriety of it, and I persist in my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Vermont by reducing the proportion from one half to one fourth.

Mr. COLLAMER. I suppose I am at liberty to accept that amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not, the Senator's amendment having already been partly acted on; but it can be modified by unanimous consent.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to accept the modification.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is so modified.

Mr. CHANDLER. I object to all discriminations between the national banks and other banking associations or private bankers. Take the First National Bank of the city of New York, with a capital of $5,000,000, and the proposition as first offered, reserving one half, at the price of gold to-day would deprive that bank of $105,000 premium on the gold which it might sell, and throwing such an amount of coin upon the market would depress its price. It is perfectly understood that after the close of this rebellion, or as soon as the world shall have become satisfied that the Government is to stand, capital from abroad will rush in here for the purchase of our securities, because we pay a higher rate of interest than any other nation on the face of the earth. Satisfy the world to-day that Grant has won a substantial, decided victory, and it will not be ninety days, it will not be thirty days before money will be coming over in millions to be invested in securities that will pay five or six per cent., when they can only get two or three per cent. on the other side of the ocean. Why compel these banks to hold gold to the detriment of the Treasury, to the detriment of the nation, when they can sell it at seventy per cent. premium and buy it back at five within six months? Why compel them to submit to that loss? It is essentially wrong. You do not compel individuals, you do not compel the State banks to do this. Why compel the national banks to do it?

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope that this amendment of the Senator from Vermont will be adopted if it be only for the purpose of getting the word

"coin" into this bill. I sincerely desire that it shall appear somewhere in the measure. And now, as an answer to the argument made by the Senator from Ohio to the proposition moved by the Senator from Vermont, that if General Grant gains a victory the greenbacks will be worth equally as much as coin, I oppose this proposition, that if the greenbacks shall rise to be worth as much as coin it will be just as easy for these national banks to keep the whole reserve in coin as to keep it in greenbacks. Why not keep then the whole fifteen or twenty-five per cent. required in the bill in coin, because there is no difference between coin and greenbacks; and if we desire that there shall be "coin" in this bill if it passes, why not require the banks to keep it? If the two are not equal in value, it is one good reason why they should keep a part in coin, so that the object intended ultimately, I presume—specie payments—shall be brought about in the country as speedily as possible; and as I have just said, if they are equal in value it is as cheap to the banks to keep the coin needed, every cent of it, as it is to keep the greenbacks. I think I demonstrated the other day that this reserve is totally inadequate to the redemption of the paper anyhow. The idea of fifteen per cent. of immediate liabilities, circulation and deposits, being a sufficient reserve fund to meet the payments of a bank, I say is a thing really out of the question.

Now, the idea of having no coin on hand, and making no arrangements for the future acquisition of coin, is perfectly outrageous. The idea of specie resumption, the idea that a day will come when specie resumption can be had under a bill of this kind is certainly foreign to the mind of any man who will look at it for a moment. I shall vote for the amendment in order to get the word "coin" into this bill in some way. I really think we ought to use it so as to signify to the world that the people of the United States have not forgotten that a paper circulation is worthless unless it is redeemable in coin.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not wish to reply to what the honorable Senator said on Friday until I saw it in print. It pained me excessively. He was not attacking simply the currency of the country, the national currency of these banks, but he attacked the public securities in a way that, whatever he might think of it, was exceedingly harsh and offensive to me. I do not intend to reply to what he said until I see it in print. I know that was the effect on all of us. We are endeavoring to make this national currency as good as lawful money of the United States. He may be able to show that our lawful money is now depreciated; he may be able to show that our bonds are worth only fifty-seven or fifty-eight cents in gold; he may repeat all these facts about our national credit, in defense of his own State institutions, the notes of which are certainly not as good as either greenbacks or national bonds. He may talk about "coin" not being in this bill, and about our purpose to exclude coin from the bill. He is entirely mistaken. I do not wish to reply to his speech until I see it in print, because I prefer to have precisely his words before me.

I have replied to the Senator from Vermont upon the merits of this proposition, not wishing to go into collateral matters. I again repeat, why require these banks to lay aside a portion of the interest which the Government pays to them? That interest is not paid to them for the benefit of these circulating notes; that interest is their interest, which they are entitled to under the law, which you have pledged to them, which you have secured to them as against the States and against State taxation. Why should they not have this interest? Why should not the banks who own these bonds have the full interest of the bonds? There is no reason why they should not. The amendment will tend to cripple the operations of the system, but the Senator from Vermont says that this gold can be used as part of the reserve fund, but under the language of his amendment it cannot be used for any purpose.

Mr. COLLAMER. Neither can any of the reserve fund.

Mr. SHERMAN. The reserve fund may be paid in and out; it is a floating reserve fund. A large portion of it may be in New York. All that the bill requires is that the fund on hand shall be so much. It is not always required to be the same identical money. Sometimes it may be in the form of a draft on the city of New York; sometimes it may be in the form of bills on a bank in Boston; sometimes in one form and sometimes in another. This reserve fund is kept there on hand, but it assumes various forms, it changes and modifies; but here you take the gold, the identical pieces, you put them in a vault, you exclude them from the national currency, you exclude them from the volume of gold and silver coin, you hoard them precisely as a miser does. It seems to me the thing is very different. This gold coin, under the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, cannot be used for any purpose, even to pay their own bills, under the language of his amendment. I think, therefore, it tends to cripple these banking associations without doing any good.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to say one word simply in answer to what has been said by the Senator from Ohio in reference to my depreciating the credit of the United States in the remarks I made last week. I am not disposed to rest under a charge of that sort. The Senator makes the charge and then says he will wait until he sees my printed remarks in order to ascertain whether the charge is true or not. I made no attack upon the credit of the United States. If anything which I said can be tortured in that way, I simply say that I did not intend any such thing, and I hope this statement will be perfectly satisfactory to the Senator from Ohio and to others. I am aware that I spoke hurriedly, rapidly, and without time to select the language that I used; but I did not intend to make any attack upon the credit of the United States, nor to depreciate their bonds. I am aware that when any Senator makes an objection to a measure in this body it is very easy to say that he is against the best interests of the country. We are required to swallow down everything without making a grimace, we are required to take for granted everything that is presented to us here, or else the accusation is made that we are trying to decry the credit of the United States, that we are attempting to do something that is prejudicial to the best interests of the country. I apprehend that I am just as anxious to maintain the credit of the country as is the Senator from Ohio. I am just as anxious to see this rebellion put down as the Senator from Ohio. I am just as anxious to see General Grant march into Richmond and over every inch of territory of the soil of the seceded States as the Senator from Ohio. I think the Senator has done me a very great injustice in the remarks he has seen fit to make.

As to his remark in reference to the credit of the institutions in my State, I care nothing. I can tell him that the banks of my State to-day are ready to redeem in coin every dollar of their circulation; they could do it to-day with a repeal of the legal-tender law of Congress. I do not ask that it be done; I have not made such a proposition; I voted for the legal-tender law. There is a very large amount of coin on hand in the banks of the State of Missouri; but I am not here to vindicate them. I wish the Senator would permit us to require a reserve fund in these national banks equal to one tenth part of the coin in the banks of the State of Missouri according to their circulation. The proposition of the Senator from Vermont, as modified by the Senator from Maryland, does not now give that one tenth part; and yet the Senator from Ohio objects to it. I care nothing about his slur on those institutions; I am not defending them; this is not the appropriate time to do it; and therefore I let that pass. But, sir, I do not intend, without saying aught against the insinuation, to permit the Senator to insinuate that I am attempting to depreciate the bonds of the United States. Does not the Senator know that the bonds of the United States are not worth dollar for dollar in gold? And is it disloyal to say so? We had better comprehend the fact and go to work to elevate the bonds of the United States, to appreciate them in the market, and adopt a system of financing that will do so. I am not prepared to do it; I am aware that my abilities are not sufficient to enable me to do it; but when a measure is presented here which is calculated to flood the country with an irredeemable circulation, and I propose some amendments to it which I think will benefit the country, will improve the bill, I do not think it is altogether charitable in the Senator to insinuate improper motives on my part.

Sir, I am willing to let the bill go; let it be passed, and its miseries will demonstrate the truth of what I said the other day. You will never make a circulation that is worth a cent under this law. It will never benefit Mr. Chase, the Secretary of the Treasury; it will never enable him to make a loan. It will never enable the people of this country to enjoy a sound circulating medium; but it will bring the same distress that the banking systems of days gone by did which were based entirely on public credit. I am not per se a bank man. I know no reason for the issue of a circulating medium in the shape of paper except for its convenience. The paper dollar ought to be the representative of a gold dollar, and the country that under the plea of necessity violates that rule, in the end suffers; and the Senator from Ohio is young enough yet to live to see that day. He will find that his own pet measure will bring upon the country the distress that has always been brought upon every civilized nation that adopted a system of this character.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I certainly do not desire to do the Senator from Missouri injustice, but he has now repeated substantially the remark which I said gave me great pain. I do not desire to wound the feelings of the honorable Senator, and therefore I would have made no allusion to it but for his remark. He substantially said on Friday that this paper system would not be good, that the bills would not be good, that the people would lose by them, that they were not upon a sure foundation; and he has repeated the remark now that whenever a nation resorted to paper money they would always regret it. He tells us, however, that he voted for the legal tender, he voted for issuing greenbacks, &c. If these bills are not good, it is because the United States is not good. The Senator could not have read this bill without knowing it. Every dollar by this bill is based upon $1 10 of the securities and promises to pay of the United States; therefore these notes never can fail until the United States fail. Not only that, if these banking associations fail to pay these notes, there is in this bill a guarantee that the United States will pay them. If these bills fail it is because the United States fail to make good that promise. I say, therefore, it is painful for me to hear any one say that a note based upon the public credit, secured more than dollar for dollar by public securities, six per cent. bonds of the United States, and that, too, when that note is indorsed and guaranteed by the United States, is not good.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him what the United States agrees to pay in, provided these notes are protested?

Mr. SHERMAN. In the lawful money of the United States.

Mr. HENDERSON. What is the lawful money of the United States? Is it gold and silver?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is the offensive nature of the remark; the gentleman seems to impute that the lawful money of the United States is not the good basis of a promise.

Mr. HENDERSON. Now, permit me to ask the Senator one other question. If the United States should see fit to issue $600,000,000 more of greenbacks, would greenbacks in the market be worth as much as they are to-day?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; and I say it is the purpose of this system to substitute for greenbacks a paper money which is guaranteed by other guarantees, to have even a better currency than the greenbacks. The purpose of this national currency is to supersede the lawful currency; and why? Because, as the Senator has well said, the history of nations shows that a paper money issued solely upon the faith of a Government, however strong, or however able to pay, will fall below the standard of gold and silver; that no paper money ever will exist equal to the par of gold and silver, unless it is a paper money issued by banks organized under the law of the country, based upon the credit of the country, like the notes of the Bank of England or the Bank of France. But, sir, the remarks of the Senator did seem to imply a want of security in the credit of the United States, and that was what I said gave me pain.

I do not wish to continue this discussion. I desire to confine the debate on these amendments simply to the amendments. I do not look on this as a new scheme; it is a law now, and we simply want to perfect it, and I have therefore declined to engage in any general discussion of the merits of this bill, but have sought to confine the discussions, as far as I am concerned, simply to the proposed changes in the law, because the law itself has not yet been fairly tried.

Mr. COLLAMER. With the indulgence of the Senate I propose to read a short dispatch from Secretary Stanton:

"Dispatches from Meade and Grant just received. Our army is 'on to Richmond.' Lee in full retreat; and Warren, Hancock, and Sedgwick on his heels."

[Sensation.]

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING. The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I ask the unanimous consent to present the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to furnish this House, if not incompatible with the public interests, copies of all correspondence between the Secretary of State since the 1st December, 1863, and Mr. Adams, or Lord Lyons, on the subject of a simulated report and document of the navy department of the so-called Confederate States.

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose that all of this has been contained in the diplomatic correspondence.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. This is correspondence which has taken place since the annual report of the Secretary of State. I presume there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania object?

Mr. STEVENS. I do.

MISSOURI CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

The House then resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections in the case of Bruce's Loan from the seventh congressional district of Missouri.

Mr. ELIOT. I have been constrained, Mr. Speaker, to take part in this discussion. Since I have occupied a seat upon this floor I have generally found it safe to yield to the judgment of the Committee of Elections upon questions which they have examined, and I have done so the more willingly because that committee has been constituted ably, and has been presided over by one of my own colleagues in whose judgment I have always been desirous to place great confidence. But I cannot follow that committee here, nor can I consent to be guided now by him. Probably I should have felt disposed to record my vote silently upon the questions involved in the report from this committee; nay, certainly I should have done so if the discussion had closed on Friday before the argument that was presented to the House by my friend and colleague, the chairman of that committee. But, sir, in the course of his argument, under some excitement, and with an emphasis not probably appreciated by himself, he turned toward me and holding this volume of testimony in his hands, felt it his duty to say that he was surprised that any gentleman from Massachusetts could be found willing upon this proof to record his vote in favor of the sitting member from the seventh district of Missouri, and could not understand how, to a Massachusetts constituency, such a vote could be defended.

Sir, since I have been here, my action in Congress has been regarded with more than friendliness by the constituents whom I have endeavored to represent. No gentleman has felt, I am quite sure, more untrammelled in his actions upon all questions than I have been. Indeed, I do not remember that it has occurred to me at any time to put to myself the question, before my name was called from the Clerk's desk, how any vote that I might feel prepared to give would be regarded by those for whom I spoke, because I have felt assured that whether it would commend itself to their judgment or not it would be accorded to me at home that it had been rendered upon deliberate examination and in accordance with my best convictions. If I should find myself voting to make vacant this seat from the seventh district of Missouri upon this evidence, unsatisfactory as it seems to me, inconclusive, partisan-like, resting not upon facts but opinions, upon guess-work, however much my friends at home might be disposed to regret my action, they would, I am quite sure, hold me justified, because they would believe that upon the evidence, studied, examined, deliberated upon by me, I had honestly come to that conclusion. The difficulty, sir, in this case would be that I should feel ashamed of myself.

I listened with as much care as I could to the argument which came from my colleague [Mr. Dawes] on Friday last, and I propose as well as I may in a few sentences to state the argument before I reply to it. I regret that he is not here, for I should be pleased to have any error into which I have fallen corrected on the spot. But yet I believe that I understand distinctly the ground which he assumed. He did not discuss the evidence in the case, but he made an argument which I am free to say, in my judgment, is not justified by the case itself, but which suggests a question that it may be thought best for some gentlemen from some central State to discuss.

It is the duty of the Government to protect the people, to control the rebel in the field, and to control rebels at home. If it be necessary, to protect the ballot-box from attacks by rebel voters, that the ballot-box, consecrated as it has been said by prayer in the more quiet regions where my colleague and myself reside, should be defended by armed soldiery, it is right, and what the Government has done has been properly done. It is the bounden duty of the Government, where it is needful, to see that the ballot-box is thus defended, as it may have been done in Maryland and in Kentucky and elsewhere perhaps. My colleague found it in his heart to commend fully the action of the Government in that behalf. But in defending the ballot-box against the votes of rebels, who would use bullets and steel instead of ballots if they dared to do so, it shall so turn out that a terror was caused in the community by reason of which masses of men were intimidated or deterred or kept from the polls, then although the Government is to be protected and defended in the discharge of its duty, yet Congress also has its duty, and that is to hold that such an election should be declared void, because it is the object of the Government not to strengthen itself by voters here, but to protect the ballot-box in its purity and to prevent the rebels from assaulting it through the polls. That I understand to be the argument of the chairman of the Committee of Elections.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have to say that that argument is not justified by the case which we are to pass upon. It suggests a question which I will state but will not discuss, for the case does not call for it, and that question is this: if it be true that it is the duty of the Government to protect the ballot-box against the votes of rebel traitors at home, as it is conceded, as it is claimed, as it is avowed to be, and if all loyal men without regard to their political opinions are free to vote, then whether because rebel sympathizers are deterred from voting by reason of oaths of allegiance which have been required and which their sensitive consciences will not permit them to take, or have been kept from the polls because they have been registered or enrolled as disloyal, or have remained from the polls because of a wholesome fear of anything that might befall them at the hands of loyal men indignant that recorded and registered disloyalists should thrust their traitorous heads into the company of honest men—whether then it be the duty of Congress to declare that such an election shall be vacated is a grave question, not arising in this case, but which, if it shall arise, may probably concern gentlemen upon this floor from the border States.

I do not propose now to debate that question; this is not the case when it needs to be done. But I may say, for it is in my heart to say it, that when that case does present itself, and when, on the facts I have stated, I am called upon on this floor to take part, by vote or voice, as a Massachusetts man, no act or vote or voice of mine shall be withheld that can uphold the arm or strengthen the heart of a loyal Representative.

But the chairman of the Committee of Elections speaks of a great terror which existed in this community! Where does he find the proof of it? It is in the imagination of my friend and not in the case before the House. Why, sir, there was a convention in Missouri in the early part of 1862, and an ordinance was passed, a portion of which I shall refer to. I do not understand that the contestant questions at all the validity of the action of that convention. In the ordinance defining the qualifications of a voter of Missouri there is an oath prescribed which is a pretty strong oath, an oath which loyal men would love to take and rebel sympathizers would not care to expose themselves to:

"I, ———, do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that I will support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of the State of Missouri against all enemies and opposers, whether domestic or foreign; that I will bear true faith, loyalty, and allegiance to the United States, and will not, directly or indirectly, give aid and comfort or countenance to the enemies or opposers thereof, or of the provisional government of the State of Missouri, any ordinance, law, or resolution of any State convention or Legislature, or any order or organization, secret or otherwise, to the contrary notwithstanding; and that I do this with a full and honest determination, pledge, and purpose, faithfully to keep and perform the same, without any mental reservation or evasion whatever. And I do further solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have not, since the 17th day of December, A. D. 1861, willfully taken up arms or levied war against the United States, or against the provisional government of the State of Missouri. So help me God."

Now, sir, that oath was taken by all men in Missouri who assumed to vote at the election. That was one trouble in the way of disloyal men.

Then General Schofield, on the 4th of August, 1862, issued an order, which is known as Order No. 24, and which I do not find referred to in the majority report of the Committee of Elections. I shall call the attention of the House to it. The order is to be found in Miscellaneous Document of this session, No. 13, page 62. It first provides that all loyal men of Missouri subject to military duty will be organized into companies, regiments, and brigades, as ordered in "General Orders No. 10, from these headquarters, dated July 22, 1862;" and in the second place, that all disloyal men, and those who have at any time sympathized with the rebellion, are required to report at the nearest military post, or other enrolling station, be enrolled, surrender their arms, and return to their homes or ordinary places of business, where they will be permitted to remain so long as they shall continue quietly attending to their ordinary and legitimate business, and in no way give aid or comfort to the enemy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if there were any such cause of terror as has been suggested, upon whom would it fall? Certainly not upon the loyal men of Missouri. By organizing the loyal men into militia and the enrollment of the disloyal men, by their own reports, it would be ascertained who in that State at that time were loyal to the Government or sympathized with the rebellion, and had been aiding or abetting Price, the rebel general. During that year, from these counties which are the subject of controversy here, from Buchanan, Holt, Andrew, Atchison, Nodaway, De Kalb, and Livingston, men had gone into the rebel army of Price which was battling against the Government. Some of these men had returned, and they aided the rebels as much at home as they did when they were away from home. And it was for the purpose of ascertaining who in the State of Missouri could be relied on as true to the Government that this order of General Schofield was issued. If anybody was deterred, if there was any terror in the community within the bounds of that congressional district, which is not proved, on whom did it fall? Not on the loyal men of the country. If it be true that there were bodies of men who refused to take the ordinance oath because they could not honestly take it, or who remained away, being enrolled under the order of General Schofield, not caring to expose themselves as rebel sympathizers, as they were, then all I can say is that it seems to me that it was a wholesome fear which ought not to be cast out except by that perfect love for the Union which returning loyalty will inspire.

But, sir, I want to come to an examination of this case, and to see upon what ground it is that a majority of the committee ask this House to say that the seat occupied by Mr. Loan ought to be vacated by him. One fact meets us on the threshold. Here are two reports made by a committee that is as equally divided as possible: five upon one side, represented by the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. GANSON,] and four upon the other, whose report is signed by themselves in person. Now, Mr. Loan has his seat just as I have mine, and just as you, Mr. Speaker, have yours. He holds, sir, his seat among us; his credentials have been found to be sufficient; the case before us is not an outside one, but one within ourselves, and the question is as to the right of his remaining here. I say that a divided report upon a case like this presents one argument, and not a weak one either, in favor of the sitting member; for if, as I think is not the case, the question were involved in fair doubt, if it were a matter of uncertainty whether in fact the sitting member should hold his seat or not, inasmuch as it is in his possession, all reasonable doubt should operate in his behalf, and he should retain his seat.

Again, I understand that this election in the seventh congressional district of Missouri was an election not only for members of Congress but for State officers, and that many persons were voted for and have since held office in the State of Missouri under the same circumstances which attended the election of Mr. Loan. I do not understand that the question has been raised in the State of Missouri as to the existence of such a terror as my friend and colleague referred to, or that objection has been ever made within that State to the parties there elected to State offices holding their trust.

Mr. BRUCE, (contestant.) The gentleman's remark is to this extent, that while these races for Congress have been contested, there have been no contests in reference to State offices. I will set the gentleman right in that respect by stating—and the sitting member will bear me witness to the truth—that a man who ran for the State Senate took more than one hundred pages of testimony, which is printed in the appendix to the journal of the State Senate, for the purpose of contesting the seat of the sitting member. The testimony of over three hundred witnesses was that they were driven from the polls. The question came before the Senate of Missouri, but the case was thrown out upon the ground of the want of proper notice of contest.

In the county of Buchanan there was a contest over the office of sheriff, which is worth $5,000 a year.

Mr. ELIOT. I am not quite sure that I understood entirely what was said by the contestant. If I did, it amounts to this, that there was one contested case which for some informality was unsuccessful, and that there has been a contest for one other office, that of sheriff. Well, sir, those exceptions, after all, go to prove the truth of what I said. This election extended to all portions of the State of Missouri now represented upon this floor. At that election many State officers were chosen. Now, if contests were made in only two cases, one of which was examined, and thrown out for informality, how can it be said fairly that any such terror was acting upon the minds of the people as to occasion any feeling of discontent and dissatisfaction with the proceedings of that election?

But this is not a question between Mr. Loan and Mr. Bruce. Mr. Bruce cannot have his seat, because no member of the committee has found reason to report in his favor. It is a question whether there shall be any representation from that district. The question is not one of expulsion, although Mr. Loan may be ejected from his seat. If it were, a two thirds vote would be required. But as the effect will be the same, the reasons constraining us to act in accordance with the report of the majority of the committee should be clear and conclusive.

Now, sir, what rule ought to govern us? My friend, the chairman of the committee, intimates that the rule applicable ordinarily does not apply in this case. Is that so? There are fifteen counties in this district. The question raised by the contestant is only in regard to eight. The evidence which has been taken confines itself to five of those fifteen counties. There are many voting precincts in those counties. How many there are does not appear in the case, but it is said in the course of the report made by the committee that there are not less than ten voting precincts in each county; then there would be within the district one hundred and fifty voting precincts. The whole difficulty which is complained of here is said to have been occasioned in eight of those precincts. The evidence applies to five counties, and is confined to eight precincts out of the one hundred and fifty. Now, suppose the irregularity had been confined to one precinct, and that by wrong proceedings, punishable in the courts, by violence or fraud, or otherwise, one hundred men were prevented from voting who tried to vote, it will hardly be contended that with a majority of 2,028 that should set the election aside. No matter what the force, no matter what the fraud, no matter what the violence, I suppose it will not be contended that if it shall appear that, with a majority of 2,000, but one hundred or one hundred and fifty were operated upon thus wrongfully, that election should therefore be held void. I do not understand that that will be contended for by those who act here with the majority of the Committee of Elections, because they claim that there were men enough in this district who were deterred from voting, and who were qualified to vote, to change the majority. That is a question of fact. There is no question of principle involved in it. We all admit that there should be purity and freedom and fairness of election. We all admit that without a free election there was no member chosen. The question is, how is the fact here? I understand that the sitting member presents himself here with a majority of the largest vote given in any congressional district in Missouri during that year. In no congressional district, with perhaps one exception, was there a larger vote thrown.

Mr. LOAN. It was the largest vote in the State. Mr. ELIOT. I am told that it was the largest in the State. I find by the report that the whole number of votes was 13,803. Of these Mr. Loan received 6,582, Mr. Bruce received 4,554, and Mr. Branch received 2,665. We find that the voters throughout the district exercised their rights to that extent. Where was the terror that acted upon the men who would have voted for Mr. Bruce? Where was the terror that paralyzed the men who gave their votes for Mr. Branch? No, sir; we have to settle this matter upon the proof; and with the proof before us, we have to ascertain whether it be true that the majority upon which Mr. Loan stands, and has a right to stand, can be overcome.

That brings us to the evidence. If the evidence overcomes that majority, Mr. Loan has no right to his seat, and we are bound to say so. I am not here not to say so; but I am not here to aid in turning out a loyal man because it is charged that one or two thousand men, or any number of men, were kept from the polls without proof of the fact.

There are thirty-four witnesses who have been examined, and upon the evidence I cannot find that thirty-four voters were intimidated and driven from the polls. There was a poll-book torn up in one precinct upon which it is said there were about one hundred names, and that of those hundred names nine tenths voted for the contestant. That might give to him 130 additional votes. And I find no proof in this document that more than that number of men qualified to vote were kept from the polls in that district upon that day.

Now, sir, how is it that of the intelligent gentlemen, conversant with work of this kind, who compose the Committee of Elections, five of them should be found to say that the sitting member ought not to have his seat because the election was not a fair and free one?

I will not go over the whole testimony, but I will refer to enough of it to show the character of the whole, and to show upon what the majority of the committee base their report.

The first witness is a man who was a candidate for the office of justice of the peace, a Mr. Edward J. Knapp. He lives in St. Joseph, in Buchanan county, a county from which, perhaps, more rebels had gone into the southern army than from any other one in this district. He testifies of what occurred in two voting places. In fact he says he attended four. He says he was at the Allen House, the market-house, the court-house, and a precinct near the Harness House. But he gives evidence concerning only two, and therefore it would appear from his testimony, at least negatively, that he saw no trouble in either of the precincts in reference to which he gave no evidence. He testifies in relation to the market-house and Allen House precincts. Well, sir, this general question was asked him:

"State, from what you saw and heard on that day, how many persons were prevented from voting by intimidation or interference by the militia at the several precincts in St. Joseph on that day."

To that general question he gave this general answer:

"A great many; in my opinion one fourth of the votes."

Now, he was at two places, and he tells us what he saw at those two places. And that is the proof upon which we must rest. We have no right to be guided by his guess.

The next witness but one, Samuel Ensworth, in answer to the same general question, says:

"I think there were at least one thousand votes that were not taken on account of improper influences brought to bear against the voters."

He attended two voting precincts, and only two. He swears to the whole county, as Mr. Knapp swears to the city of St. Joseph.

"One fourth the vote." What is that evidence worth? Are we prepared to say upon this proof that one fourth the votes in St. Joseph were affected? What does Mr. Knapp state as coming within his own knowledge? He says he saw John Cowie somewhat hardly handled; but further on it appeared that John Cowie voted. He did not lose his vote. Mr. Bruce received his vote. He says:

"I have no recollection of hearing anything said calculated to intimidate voters prior to the day of election."

That is an important fact: a man living in that community, who mingled with the people there, and yet heard nothing said about any intended violence prior to the election. If that fact be true, it goes far to give the negative to the state of facts which is represented to have existed by the chairman of the Committee of Elections. This witness, Knapp, states, however, that on the day of the election he saw Cooper B. Colman, James B. Pendleton, and several others, legal voters, leave the polls without voting, on account of interference with Mr. Cowie. Well, what of that? It does not appear that Cooper B. Colman had not voted earlier in the day. The witness does not negative that supposition at all. On the cross-examination the question is asked:

"Did you hear any threats or see any violence used against Cooper B. Colman to prevent him from voting?"

Well, sir, I wanted to know that fact; but the record says in reference to the question, "Ruled out by court on account of irrelevancy." Why was it not relevant? If the answer was not a proper one, this House could rule it out. If it was relevant, the House has the right to judge of it. But the question was not permitted to be put, and the fact that it was ruled out by Judge Tutt goes far to establish what were the feelings of the magistrate. The facts as they appear in this case show that this magistrate, Tutt, was himself a partisan of the contestant.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the testimony coming from this man shows that three persons may have been intimidated. They are all that he knows of. He could not have known anything beyond the precincts that he attended. He does not give facts. He gives no circumstances. He heard nothing until the day of election. And I put it to the House that there would be no propriety, there would in fact be indecency, in giving to this testimony any more weight than that he saw three persons who he believes were qualified voters who were not permitted to vote.

Then comes the testimony of Samuel Ensworth. I want to call the attention of the House to it, because I suppose that he is one of the strong witnesses upon which the majority of the Committee of Elections would rely. But before I do that, I want to call the attention of the House to another fact, showing the mind of this magistrate. Mr. Orton M. Loomis was called as a witness. In the course of his examination two questions were put to him. They are to be found on page 64.

"1. Did you, before said election and during the present rebellion, ever raise what is known as a secession flag on your premises? If so, was it raised in public view, and how long was it kept up on your premises?"

"2. Were you ever arrested and placed in jail by Federal troops? If so, when and for what were you arrested?"

Those questions did not appear in the depositions. They were put by the counsel who represented Mr. Loan. I should like to know the character of that witness. Mr. Loomis states some matters of opinion. I should like to know whether his opinion is one in which I should have confidence. The magistrate certifies that during the examination of that witness the aforesaid questions were asked, and that he refused to suffer them to appear upon the record. He says that he considers them impertinent, and unworthy of the case to record these questions as to the loyalty or disloyalty of the witness who is giving opinions which are supposed will influence the judgment of this House. He objected to these questions. Mr. Bruce, or the counsel representing him, did object to them. The judge did what I have rarely known done anywhere. He not only refused to record the questions which were put in the depositions and to take answers subject to the objection, but to have them recorded at all. He ruled them out as irrelevant and impertinent to the case.

Mr. BRUCE, (contestant.) The gentleman from Massachusetts states that "Mr. Bruce or his counsel objected to those questions." If the gentleman will look through the record he will find that neither on my part nor on the part of my counsel was there one objection to the gentleman asking any questions whatever. He will, on the contrary, find more than fifty objections on the part of the sitting member.

Mr. ELIOT. I find that these two questions were objected to. I do not know that it is stated anywhere by whom they were objected to. I do not mean to say that Mr. Bruce objected. I said that Mr. Bruce or his counsel objected. If it be true that neither Mr. Bruce nor his counsel objected, then I withdraw the remark. This magistrate not only objected to the evidence being taken, but to the questions being put upon the record. If this be so, it shows that this magistrate was not in a condition to take testimony involving the loyalty or disloyalty of any man. He was not in a condition to give an opinion which should have any weight in this House.

I come now to the testimony of Samuel Ensworth. He undertakes to give an opinion as to the whole county of Buchanan.

"Question. State if you heard of any threats of interference by the enrolled militia or others previous to the election on the 4th of November, 1862, with the voters at said election, or at any time."

"Answer. I do not recollect that I heard of threats made before the election, but heard often that threats were made prior to the election that persons enrolled under Order No. 24, and secessionists, would not be permitted to vote on the day of the election; I heard oftentimes threats that such persons would not be permitted to vote."

"Question. State your opinion, from all the facts that came to your knowledge, how many voters were prevented from voting by intimidation or interference by the enrolled militia and others with the polls and with voters from voting on the 4th day of November, 1862, at the election in Buchanan county, Missouri."

"[The opinion of the witness objected to, under the above question, by B. F. Loan, as being illegal.]"

"Answer. I think there were at least 1,000 votes that were not taken on account of improper influences brought to bear against the voters."

"Question. The class of voters alluded to above: please state what ticket was deprived of their votes by this interference, in your opinion."

"[The above question objected to, because it calls for the opinion of the witness upon an imaginary state of facts that witness don't pretend to have any knowledge of. The above question objected to by B. F. Loan.]"

"Answer. I can't say what particular ticket they would have voted; but do not think that the nominees of the unconditional Union ticket were deprived of many votes."

"Question. How did you intend to vote between Bruce and Loan?"

"Answer. I should have voted for Mr. Loan."

"Question. How many men did you see vote on that day, to the best of your knowledge?"

"Answer. I cannot tell how many I saw vote. I was in the market-house several times in the morning and saw several persons vote, and also two or three times at the Allen House in the morning, and saw several persons vote there; after dinner I was at the market-house again, and the table where they were voting was surrounded by an excited crowd, among which were many of the enrolled militia, and it was difficult to get up to the voting place, and I did not consider it safe for a person that was odious to the crowd to go there to vote, and I left disgusted."

But this witness intended to vote for Mr. Loan. How was he "odious to the crowd?" If his testimony can be relied on the "crowd" must have been his friends.

Now, what is that evidence worth? I do not care what Ensworth thinks. We do not any of us care what he thinks. We want to know what he knows; and we will do the thinking for ourselves. He thinks thousands of votes were kept from the polls. What facts does he know? He was himself at only two precincts in the county of Buchanan. He was at the Allen House, and tells us what he saw there. He was at the market-house, and tells us what he saw there. He was there but a little while, and he has narrated all the facts within his reach, but there is not a fact he gives us as a foundation upon which to rest these sweeping opinions.

Mr. UPSON. I desire to remind the gentleman that there are eighteen precincts in Buchanan county.

Mr. ELIOT. I will say that I have not been able to find any evidence as to the precise number of precincts in Buchanan county; but the general estimate is that there are about ten precincts in each county. But it seems there are eighteen in Buchanan; and this Mr. Ensworth attended at two of them; and he tells us everything he saw there. Now, what is his opinion covering the whole county worth?

He was asked how he intended to vote, and he says to us that he intended to vote for Mr. Loan. That fact is made a point. It has been urged in the argument, and is used in the report, that here is a witness who intended to vote for Mr. Loan, and who comes before the judge and gives the opinions as I have stated. He says, in answer to the question whether he heard any person in the crowd he says were at the doors speak against Mr. Bruce, that he does not recollect hearing Mr. Bruce's name mentioned. Again, when asked whether he saw any person in that crowd intimidated from voting for Bruce, he replied:

"I cannot say that I heard John P. Bruce's name mentioned in the crowd, but the feelings of the crowd were in favor of those that were to vote for the ticket called the unconditional Union ticket, and violent against those opposed to that ticket."

He says he was at the market-house twice in the forenoon and twice in the afternoon, and he says that in the morning but few votes were taken, and that Louthen and several others applied to have their names enrolled and offered to take the conventional oath; that one of the judges objected, and said that if Louthen insisted upon his right to vote he would be arrested; that he still said he would vote, and did vote, and was arrested. He further said he saw no one turned off, nor any other intimidation there.

"That was the fact in one case, and that was all he saw. He saw no intimidation there at all. Then he was asked what the loud talk was which he said resembled the action of a mob. He replied that it was the talk of a number of people who were excited, and were talking about a Mr. Cunningham having been struck by a soldier with a gun, about some one who was hit by it, and of some persons who were kicked and driven down stairs, as it was said. He knows nothing about it, and it is manifest that he is telling us of a little riot which occurred in the street, such as occurs in too many of our election districts all the country over during the excitement of an election.

Now that is what this man testifies to; that is the evidence he brings to us. The fact is that this guard which is complained of by the contestant and by the committee in their report was a guard which to a certain extent had been put there at his own request. Mr. Ensworth is asked:

"Have you ever heard said John P. Bruce say that he requested guards of the militia to be placed at the different voting precincts on said election day?"

"Answer. I heard Mr. Bruce say that he went to General Hall and told the general that he understood that there was to be an interference with voters at the polls; that persons that were enrolled under Order No. 24 were to be excluded from voting, and requested of General Hall to have a guard put at the different precincts to prevent any interference with the voters, and to leave the qualification of the voters with the judges.

"Question. Was Brigadier General Hall acting as commander of the enrolled militia here at that time?"

"Answer. I think Brigadier General Hall acted as commander of the enrolled militia of this district at that time."

Mr. Cyrus E. Kemp is the next witness, and he gives an account of the circumstances which transpired at that same election precinct. He says the election proceeded quietly until after one o'clock, at which time a band of enrolled militia entered the court-house, at which time the voters then present dispersed. He says he handed his book to one of the judges of the election and saw nothing more of it until it was returned by Captain Hax, the officer of the day, and General Hall, about half an hour after it was taken.

This is the strongest evidence we have in this case of that kind of interference which has been referred to by the chairman. More than one of the witnesses gives an account of this same matter. One of the judges of the election states that the polls were interfered with, and it may be claimed that the votes which were on the lists were lost to the contestant so far as they were for him. If the whole number were for him it would add but one hundred to his votes; and it is wholly impossible to weigh down the majority of 2,028 by any evidence in the case.

Now look at the testimony of John Fox. I will read it. He has given apparently a fair statement.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. UPSON. Gentlemen have called my attention to the fact that the minority report waives any claim to a seat in this House by the contestant. I have to say that the minority of the committee understood the gentleman, in his argument before the committee, to claim that the election should be set aside, and referred back to the people, and we so stated in our report. We now understand that the contestant did not so mean to be understood, but that he claimed he was entitled to the seat. I make this statement now in order not to do him any injustice. Yet the minority of the committee do not propose any amendment to the resolution now before the House, but prefer to take the vote directly upon the resolution.

COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair feels it his duty to announce to the House that neither of the members of the Committee on Enrolled Bills is in the city, and therefore no enrolled bills can be examined. The Chair therefore asks the House to enlarge the committee to three members. It has happened once or twice before that both of the members of the committee have been absent. Mr. COBB, and Mr. STEELE of New Jersey, who compose the committee, are both absent now.

Mr. McINDOE. I will state that Mr. COBB is absent on account of sickness in his family.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the Chair increasing the number of the committee to three?

Mr. PRUYN. I suggest that two additional members be added to the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to that proposition? The Chair hears no objection. The Chair appoints Messrs. POMEROY and McKINNEY as the additional members of the committee.

MISSOURI CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—AGAIN.

Mr. BAXTER. Do I understand that the present debate is to be confined to the contestant and the contestee?

The SPEAKER. It is the unanimous order of the House that when the contestant (Mr. Bruce) rises to make his speech the debate shall be confined to him and to the sitting member.

Mr. BRUCE, (contestant.) I understand that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] desires to speak, and I yield to him with great pleasure.

The SPEAKER. No gentleman rose, and the Chair was about putting the question on the resolution. If the gentleman from Maryland desires to speak he must speak before the contestant.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, it is with some reluctance that I make any observations on the case before the House at all. I do so merely because of observations that fell from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] on Friday last, who is not now in his seat; and my reluctance to address the House arises, in great measure, from the fact that he is not in his seat. But for those remarks, it would have been wholly unnecessary, indeed presumptuous, for me to undertake to discuss this case after the elaborate argument of my friend from Delaware, [Mr. SMITHERS.] The principles assumed by the gentleman from Massachusetts virtually touch all the States which have either themselves had civil war within their borders or have been near enough to the war to be affected by it; and bearing in mind the sneering and slurring tone in which the gentleman saw fit to refer to the States of Maryland and Delaware, it would, perhaps, not be altogether excusable if I allowed his speech to pass without some observations directed to those subjects.

An election case is not a personal contest between the sitting member and the claimant. It is a question relating exclusively to the rights of the people represented. The interests of the sitting member and the interests of the contestant are subordinate considerations, scarcely worthy of a moment's thought. The question is, whether either of the parties claiming the seat is entitled to speak here for the people of the district, and that is the only question.

That question, sir, can only be presented in two aspects: first, was there a valid election at all and anywhere in the district; and secondly, if there was a valid election, which of the two parties had a majority? If there was no valid election, then it is wholly immaterial whether one man was excluded from the polls or ten thousand men, whether one or the other had a majority of votes, none of which were cast legally. There being no election, no count is necessary, no count is relevant. No count can bear upon the issue to be decided here.

The question raised by the Committee of Elections is not whether the sitting member had a majority of the votes actually cast, nor whether he had a majority of the votes actually cast or actually tendered and illegally excluded. Those are questions which can only be considered after determining the previous question, whether there was an election at all. The question, and the only question, which the committee raises is whether there was a valid election in the seventh congressional district of Missouri at the period at which the sitting member claims to have been elected.

What is necessary to a valid election? Is it that everybody who is a voter in the whole district shall have had an absolutely free access to the polls? If that be so, then an assault and battery which prostrates a man near the polls in a private quarrel and prevents him from voting, or in a quarrel created for the purpose of preventing him from voting, will avoid the election. Is it that wherever an election poll is opened the voting shall be absolutely free and legal? If so, then all the hostile party have to do is to pick a quarrel with some one at some one place of voting and break up the election by violence at that one precinct, and the whole election is gone, although the sitting member may have had a majority of ten or twelve thousand out of an actual vote of thirteen thousand in the whole district. This is a reductio ad absurdum. To void an election at one poll in a district is not therefore an avoidance of the election everywhere.

What is the rule of law?

Where a whole election is centered at one poll, and the facts show that an overbearing force was present at that poll on the day of the election, with menace and violence such as would deter a man of ordinary firmness from approaching the polls and tendering his vote, that election is void.

Where, however, as in this contest, election polls are open at more than one place, a very different question is raised. There it has never been held by any parliamentary body in the United States that violence at one of several voting places operates to strike out more than the vote of that single election precinct from the count. If the violence extends over the whole district, or perhaps if it extended to the voting places in that district at which the great mass or a clear majority of the voters in the whole district must cast their votes, it may be reasonably adjudged to justify the avoidance of the whole election. I do not know that it has yet ever been so held. But it is the decided and adjudged election law of the American legislative assemblies that where, at an election, there are several precincts or places of voting, and violence invades the freedom of the election, the question is at what precincts did the violence prevail, and when you have ascertained its extent you have ascertained the extent of its operation upon the election. The question is not how many voters were deterred from voting, nor whether such voters so intimidated were the friends of the contestant or of the sitting member; but was there such violence used as to overturn and destroy the validity of an election itself—to show that no votes are entitled to be counted though cast; and when that fact is ascertained in respect to any precinct the vote of that precinct is to be stricken out, so far as that election is concerned, in making up the returns.

That, sir, is the parliamentary law of elections as known to the parliamentary bodies of this country. If there be any exception to it, I am not aware of it.

The prevalence of rumors or threats or intimidations before the day of election, or elsewhere than at the polls or in gaining access to them, is no consideration at all relevant to the validity of the election.

Now apply that rule to the case before the House. There are fifteen counties, I think, in that district. There is no pretense in the evidence—if I may be allowed to adopt the report of the majority of the committee—there is no pretense of any question as to the vote in any of these counties except as to five. That disposes of the whole case, then, except as to those five counties. In respect to them there is no pretense that there was violence except in eight precincts out of over a hundred.

Then, sir, the operation of this violence on the election ought to be confined to the precincts where it existed and not, as the majority of the Committee of Elections would have it, to operate to annul the election at all the precincts of those counties. Apply that rule, strike out the precincts where the violence is proved to have existed, and the pretense on which it is proposed to void the whole election is seen to be frivolous. Ten out of fifteen whole counties unquestioned, and no violence that could intimidate the people in one tenth of the precincts of those counties wherein the violence existed, relying on the report as submitted by the majority of the committee, and I have confined myself to the examination of the majority report.

What, I ask, is the law in reference to each of these precincts? There must be some overbearing violence which would prevent a man of ordinary firmness, for fear of personal violence, from approaching the polls; not fear of the use of force by legal means, whether civil or military, not fear of the sworn officers of the law, whether in uniform or not, executing the law at the polls, no sanctuary for offenders, whether traitors or thieves. A civil or military arrest may take place at the polls as legally as it may at any other place or at any other time. I say, therefore, that when the guns of the militia of Missouri were there at the polls in the hands of men in uniform with their glittering bayonets—as somebody in the testimony states—it is no evidence of violence. They are there for the purposes of protection, they are there as the officers of the law, and it is no violence that any man can complain of. If arrests were made they were made by the ministers of the law, and if any person arrested complained that his arrest was illegal, he had but to bring his complaint to the proper authorities, and if decided to be so illegal, and if he was thereby prevented from voting, still, in accordance with the decisions of the courts in election cases, the contestant would have the right to have his vote counted and allowed. If his arrest was illegal the law would remedy the injury inflicted by its officer by allowing the vote to be counted, not aggravate the injury by disfranchising a whole district. I think wherever there was an armed, uniformed, officered, mustered militia, it was not an illegal force overbearing the freedom of election, but the law present with force to protect the people from illegal violence.

When they come to apply that to the precincts in question here it does not appear that there were more than three precincts or voting places in reference to which a decent question could be raised as to the absolute freedom of the election.

There was one of the precincts in which it is said that the uniformed militia did a violent act. I think it was in St. Joseph, at the court-house precinct. It is said that they came in, tore up the ballot-box, and ended the election. That, according to the election law, would strike out that precinct. But it also appears in reference to that precinct that the judges of the election had not taken the oath that the constitutional law of Missouri prescribes in these rebellious times to test their loyalty.

Mr. BRUCE, (contestant.) With the permission of the gentleman from Maryland I will say that I do not think he has read the testimony. If he had he would have found the following on the cross-examination by the sitting member:

"Question. Before proceeding and entering upon your duty as judge of said election, did you and your associate judges take an oath prescribed by the Missouri State convention, entitled 'An ordinance defining the qualifications of voters and civil officers in this State,' said ordinance being adopted June 10, 1862, and which oath is now shown to you in section two of said ordinance?"

"Answer. My recollection is that that oath was administered to the judges by the county clerk."

"Question. Before entering upon the duties of your office as judge of said election precincts did you and your associates take another oath, as now shown to you in section five of said ordinance?"

"Answer. My impression is that the convention ordinance was complied with."

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. They say that they were qualified by the clerk. That was the phrase quoted in the report of the majority of the committee. The statement in the minority report evidently is that they had not been sworn according to the convention oath. I think that the admission of the gentleman is equivalent to the same thing, for the gentleman said that a dispute having arisen on the question whether the judges had been sworn or not, when he thought they had been, he admitted for the purposes of the case that they had not been.

But that is a matter of detail, and I do not contemplate going into the details of the election. I merely mention that in passing. I do not propose to go into the details of the testimony. I merely state what I understand to be the election law, and in general terms that I think the evidence shows that the contestant wholly fails to make a question about the election. I have carefully examined the majority report of the Committee of Elections since the last session of the House, and I think since the case of Vallandigham and Campbell there has been no such frivolous case brought before this House; no such groundless attempt to eject a gentleman from a seat which he holds by as good a title as any man upon this floor. That is my judgment.

But the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Dawes] thinks that, having had the misfortune to have been educated in one of the slave States on the borders of the rebellion, and having secret conclaves in my district in Maryland, brought up under the tuition of American clubs, and without the sanctification of Massachusetts prayer-meetings, it is not surprising that I and my friend from Delaware come to that conclusion; but he is at a loss to understand how his colleagues can face a Massachusetts constituency with those facts. I rather think the honorable chairman of the Election Committee will soon find an explanation more simple than satisfactory of the conduct of his colleagues. He may find it more difficult than they will to meet a Massachusetts constituency with this evidence, accompanied by his argument and vote to crush their friends, discredit their cause, and weaken the hands of loyal men on the burning borders of the rebellion. I am content to leave him to the people of Massachusetts.

But am I to be told that the law of elections is one thing in Massachusetts and another thing in Maryland and Missouri; and that men's judgments on election law must vary with their residence? If so, by what right is a Massachusetts rule to be applied to a Missouri election? If not, why is Massachusetts opinion invoked? If every Massachusetts Representative is to judge a Missouri election justly, he will not apply his Massachusetts ideas to the Missouri election. The Massachusetts mind must be educated to deal with every category of facts relative to elections under the conditions existing in Missouri; and if that gentleman means to draw disparaging contrasts between Maryland and Massachusetts, and would insinuate that the great prevalence of law and order in Massachusetts unfits him to deal with the more disturbed condition of Maryland or Delaware or Missouri I respectfully remind him that Massachusetts history is not one of unbroken quiet; and that he will not have to turn back many pages to find violent resistance to laws of the United States—unpopular, but still laws; and they may aid him to a more elevated view of his duty, or at least to understand how his colleagues can form unprejudiced judgments on the laws of Maryland and Missouri, and adjudge equal justice according to the evidence. But according to the gentleman from Massachusetts our education has been so bad, the violence around us has so deadened our sensibilities, that we, the members from Maryland, are not fit to judge of elections. Because, forsooth, our people, when they go to an election, do not open it with prayer their judgment is not to be taken! Why, sir, if the election that sent the gentleman here was opened with prayer, I cannot say much for the answer to it. I fear it will not commend that form of electioneering to the people of Maryland. I entertain serious apprehensions lest it injure the cause of true spiritual piety in matters of election. I rather incline to think that our Maryland people, uncivilized, Border Ruffians, and Plug Uglies, will think the light of the human reason, and a manly resolution to save the Republic—a resolution not to be frightened by any force, but to make the Republic supreme against any opposing violence—better guides than a prayer-meeting. I have no objection to those solemn forms. I regret that they have not been more effectual in the particular case. It is fortunate that that form of initiating elections seems to have been better responded to in other districts of Massachusetts than that which the honorable chairman of the Committee of Elections represents; and their conduct may vindicate and save the system which his so seriously impeaches.

But, sir, in our uncivilized and rough way, we are resolved to maintain the majesty of republican government in Missouri as well as in Maryland; and we think that in trying times we have done it. We take it as the most unkind and unexpected occurrence that a gentleman from Massachusetts should rise, after the great struggle for freedom in the loyal slave States of the Union, when triumph has perched upon their banners, and reproach them with the dust and sweat of the conflict, rather than swell the chorus of exultation by the voice of Massachusetts. They did not expect that a man of Massachusetts would walk over the battle-field of freedom and give them occasion to recall the words of Harry Percy:

"I remember, when the fight was done,
When I was dry with rage, and extreme toil,
Breathless and faint, leaning upon my sword,
Came there a certain lord, neat, trimly dress'd,
Fresh as a bridegroom."

"And still he smil'd, and talk'd;
And, as the soldiers bore dead bodies by,
He call'd them—untaught knaves, unmannerly,
To bring a slovenly unhandsome corpse
Betwixt the wind and his nobility."

Nor will it be surprising if

"He made them mad
To see him shine so brisk, and smell so sweet,
And talk so like a waiting-gentlewoman,
And telling them the sovereign'st thing on earth
Was parmaceti, for an inward bruise."

Though the gentleman would substitute a prayer-meeting for "parmaceti."

But the gentleman from Massachusetts is anxious to protect the reputation of the Administration. From what? From the common scolds of the Democratic party! From the general impeachment of wrong! They the guardians of the purity of elections! The honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. Ganston,] to aggravate the iniquity of the violence he imputes, and paint the innocence of the victims he defends, quoting from the sworn testimony which echoed his own party language touchingly and simply, said that there were still persons in Missouri who were in favor of "the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was," and that they there are designated as disloyal; and against them military violence was directed for that criminal faithfulness to the Constitution. It was their wrongs he would redress! This new-born zeal on the part of that Democratic gentleman and others for the purity of election may perhaps captivate inexperienced gentlemen like the one who heads the Election Committee, absorbed in thinking how his Massachusetts constituents will look at evidence, and forgetful or ignorant of events not yet remote. But my memory goes back to the time when, with economical and judicious fraud and violence, they grasped empire. They would have forgotten now the eternal infamy of Plaquemines, where Slidell plundered the State of Louisiana from the side of Henry Clay. They would have Rynders forgotten, who boasted openly that he voted some hundreds of men twenty times at every precinct in New York and determined that election against Mr. Clay. They forget that that was the starting point of all the disasters which have overcome the Republic, and which those frauds made effective. They have forgotten that James Buchanan was elected by the moral force of the October election in Pennsylvania, and that it has been proved in a court of justice that more fraudulent votes were polled in that city at that election than the majority by which they carried the State; so that the foundation of his disgraceful Administration worthily rested on a fraud.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I want to know who committed these frauds; whether or not it was John W. Forney.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I thought that perhaps the gentleman wished to make a suggestion of that kind. The mutations in public life show many such instances; but I think that Rynders has remained faithful. But I am not alluding to persons. The fact that I assert was established by an elaborate judicial investigation.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts tells us he wants to protect the Government against the imputation of using military at elections. In the name of history and of the memory of man, where did the violence of military at elections begin? Have gentlemen forgotten Kansas? Have they forgotten Lecompton? Have they forgotten New Orleans in 1857, where the sect of Know Nothings—that sect everywhere spoken against—were so powerful that nothing but violence could beat them down, and where the Democratic Legislature organized a special and exceptional military force for the purpose of suppressing them, which the Americans, true to their blood, defied, and after a war waged for three days compelled to submit to a free election at which the Americans asserted their usual and lawful superiority?

Military at elections! There are gray-headed gentlemen on the other side of the House. Have they forgotten the Washington massacre of 1857? Republican gentlemen at the North were then very silent. They did not care—like the gentleman from Massachusetts—to soil themselves by defending the every where downtrodden and reviled sect of Know Nothings, though the principles of free government were at issue in their oppression. To that class the gentleman from Massachusetts belongs, who wishes to keep his skirts so clean in the eyes of his enemies that he prefers to deliver over to their wrath his friends rather than encounter the risk of seeing justice done them.

The honorable chairman of the committee and his colleague to-day are the only men who have learned no lesson of manly wisdom from events. Bitter experience has taught everybody else that the rights of every one are the interest of all; that if there is to be power there must be unity and mutual support, and that all who are against the common enemy are for the Republic. When those sentiments cease to prevail, the Administration will cease to have a majority in this House.

But, sir, the Washington massacre, who has forgotten it? Who has forgotten that upon a day of a peaceful election, within the hearing of the President of the United States, and that President James Buchanan, under the pretext that violent men had come from Baltimore to overbear a municipal election here, on occasion of an accidental and transitory fight at the polls, over in a few minutes, and after everything had been quiet for nearly an hour, the President and Toucey ordered the marines to suppress the riot; some boys, like our pages, marched up with them dragging an old swivel, spiked, and wanting one wheel; and these soldiers in uniform, and with glittering muskets loaded by order with a ball and two buckshot, came to the polls, and were ordered to charge bayonets and fire, and did fire upon those boys and drove them away and captured their harmless gun, and then they wheeled in the other direction and fired point blank into a peaceful crowd of spectators, and thirty-six men fell, ten of them dead, in the streets of Washington, and all upon the false pretense that Baltimoreans had meddled with elections in Washington, but really to secure a Democratic mayor! Who has forgotten that? All done when there was no riot, when there was no fighting, when everything was quiet, and electors were voting at those polls at the rate of two votes and a half a minute! And when the dead came to be counted, there were no Baltimoreans among them; and when the wounded came to be counted, there was only one Baltimorean, and he a poor brakesman, who had come over in the cars that morning in the discharge of his duty, and he had cast his vote for James Buchanan; and when they came to count the dead and wounded, only two were of the American party at all, the rest being friends of the President who shot them down.

And when the Government tried fourteen men for this riot before a court of justice, with a Democratic marshal, a packed jury, and a court under the power of the Government, they could not convict one man of the riot for which they had shot thirty-six men in cold blood. And when the coroner's jury, after inquest upon two of the dead men, found that they met their death by the firing of the marines, causelessly and unjustifiably, there were no more inquests before the coroner, and the victims went to their graves with no more inquiry than if they were dogs shot by the police! Military at elections! If I were a Democrat, it is the last topic I would refer to. Prudence would counsel silence. It might be worth while even for the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, in defending his friends, to take some pains to look into the history of the country, if he has forgotten it, and see where the responsibility rests for military violence at elections. Sir, that one year was fruitful in examples, full of instruction.

Maryland elections have been referred to, and as usual misrepresented and misunderstood. With them my name has been continually connected by my enemies and the enemies of our cause. I have sat with contemptuous silence in this House for six years, scorning to notice railing accusations elsewhere. No man ever dared in my presence to impeach my conduct; nor did my competitors venture until my third election to transfer the contest from the papers and private slander to a tribunal competent to decide it under other responsibilities than those which restrain lying newspapers, the whispers of private malice, and audacious assertions upon the hustings. And as the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Dawes] has done me the kind favor on my own side of the House, in the midst of my political friends, to sneer at the conduct of my constituents in those elections in his effort to save the reputation of the Administration at their expense, I mean to take up the gauntlet, and to say that no elections have anywhere occurred of more national importance, or which reflected more honor upon the indomitable spirit and determination of the people to vindicate their rights at every hazard, than the elections in which I was a candidate, for which I have been falsified, and respecting which I have scorned to defend myself. My reputation was before the people where the events took place, and where the results sufficiently manifest their judgment of my conduct, which I am now here to defend before the people of the United States.

These are the elections that the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts scorns because they were prepared in secret conclaves of Maryland and Delaware, not opened with prayer. But, however decried, they were the work of that American party which organized to rescue the public school system from a Democratic and sectarian conspiracy, and first met and broke the power of the Democratic domination. Yes, gentlemen of the Republican party, none other ever broke its power. You encountered its fragments when its scepter was already wrested from its hand. Other circumstances arose to change the course of events. You achieved its destruction and drove its southern leaders to the alternative of submission or rebellion, but that decisive battle was fought by the Know-Nothing party, which the gentleman from Massachusetts now speaks so contemptuously about, and which many libel, now that it is dead, who feared it when alive. After years of contemptuous silence, I rise to vindicate its memory, and claim its true place in history, now that events are illustrating the fruits of its struggles.

Its memory is outraged by those who occupy the ground it won; and the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts requires me to break the silence I have so long observed.

I am here to-day to speak a chapter of history. In the fall of 1854, when I was absent from the country in Europe, the American party organized in Baltimore city, and by the secrecy of its organization it threw an unprecedented vote and swept the Democrats from power in that city. They had been in the habit of maintaining their authority there in their usual manner. That election took them by surprise. It was as peaceful and quiet as one of the honorable gentleman's prayer-meetings before elections in Massachusetts. In 1855 there were elections, municipal and congressional. At the latter I was for the first time a candidate; and it was the first open struggle for power by the Americans. The Democrats organized banded bodies of armed ruffians and bullies, who at nearly every poll in the city of Baltimore at the municipal election made deliberate assaults on the people there assembled, and numbers of persons were wounded. They carried by a small vote the municipal election, which took place two weeks before the congressional election, by this violence. Between the municipal and the congressional election the young men of Baltimore, the young mechanics of Baltimore, the heart and strength of the Republic and without which the nation would be nothing, organized themselves with arms and said, "We will vote if it is to be a vote, and fight if it is to be a fight." Again the Irish and Democrats, armed with United States weapons, took the offensive but failed at the polls, and the result was that we carried the day by a small majority on a very full vote, and nobody was fool enough to come here, after having appealed to arms as well as votes and been defeated, and attempt to impeach that election.

Furious at defeat, the Democrats organized their forces for the elections, municipal and presidential, of 1856. The great Irish ward was a vast arsenal, and men marched forth in battle array and fired deliberate volleys into peaceful crowds at a neighboring precinct. Instantly it was replied to. But the Irishman could not meet the American mechanic, and again the Democrats mourned defeat, while we grieved over our friends treacherously slain. We had either to be driven from the polls or to fight, and our young men preferred the latter alternative. Whether that would pass in an electioneering prayer-meeting in the honorable chairman's district now I know not, but it would have the approval of the Boston men of 1775, whose prayers were not inconsistent with fighting!

Then came the great contest for Governor in 1857. But in the mean time the Americans, having got possession of power, had done what the Democrats always refused to do—organized a police and armed it; for we did not choose that while we were in power ruffians should make an election a question not merely of numbers but of power. Representatives of the majesty of the law, we meant to enforce submission to it, and we organized and armed a strong police force; and it accomplished its purpose and kept the peace. At the municipal election in 1857 there was peace and quiet throughout the city of Baltimore, from one end to the other, excepting in the eighth ward, which is under Irish domination. There the Irish took possession of houses and armed themselves and shot at the police as they passed, and thrice they marched in a body with United States weapons to attack Americans at the polls; and as often they were dispersed and disarmed by the police. They were met everywhere by the organized and armed police, and, without hurting one of the villains who were thus aiming at their lives, they suppressed every attempt at disturbance throughout the city on the part of the Irish; and when the day closed there were only nine men dead or wounded to count, and they were policemen!

Two weeks afterwards the gubernatorial election came off. Governor Ligon, now a traitor, was then the Democratic Governor of Maryland. He thought that nothing could defeat the Americans of Baltimore city but the employment of the organized militia of the State, and therefore he repaired to Baltimore and issued a proclamation, calling out six thousand militiamen, borrowed muskets from Governor Wise of Virginia to arm them, to keep the peace in Baltimore, because, two weeks before, nine policemen had been shot in keeping the peace against the Democrats, his friends. Negotiations passed. I was a party to them. Mr. Swann was then mayor of the city. I am not entitled to take any share of the credit for the indomitable firmness he exhibited at that time. All I can say is that what he did I approved and was ready to stand by. I advised him to yield nothing to the Governor, but let him call his military into the streets of Baltimore if he dared; and that was Mr. Swann's own judgment. He had ample preparations for any emergency, and the Governor knew it; but that did not answer his purpose, which was to overawe the Americans by military force. He therefore sent his enrolling officers through the streets to find men to hold Wise's muskets, prepared for a bloody day, or to frighten the American party for the first time in history.

Those officers for two days endeavored to muster a force in Baltimore, but in vain. One store they were laughed at and they were kicked out of the next. The light division threw down their arms and refused to obey. And when two days had elapsed, and the Governor found that though he had plenty of muskets sent him by Governor Wise he had no men in whose hands to put them, another spirit came over his dream. He began to find that Mayor Swann had a sufficient force under him to keep the peace. He was satisfied with two hundred special police to do the work he called out six thousand soldiers to do. He was content to submit to two hundred muskets in the hands of the regular police what he intended to do with six thousand in the hands of the militia; and, disgusted at his own abortive attempt at military dictation, he issued a final order announcing that having secured the object of his official intervention he did not contemplate the use of his military force—which he had wholly failed to organize!—and slunk from the city which had tolerated his presence.

I recollect very well, after the negotiations had gone on all night, and men had become doubtful as to what was to be the result, an assembly that occurred in the broad place before the Holliday street theater, near the mayor's office. Quietly and calmly, well dressed, not a word above ordinary conversation, packed as closely as men can stand, they waited to know the order that was to be given; and when Mayor Swann bade them go home, await quietly the result of the negotiations, and bide their time, they greeted him with three cheers, and dispersed. Not far off the Irish, with clenched fists and yells, menaced them without being able to provoke a word, a groan, or a blow.

One of Governor Ligon's advisers saw that assembly over Mr. Swann's shoulder, and found his way through a back gate, and carried to the Governor what he had seen; and it was that sight which satisfied him probably that the arrangements of Mayor Swann were adequate to the emergency.

It was only three or four months after James Buchanan had shot down American citizens in the city of Washington, by the military of the United States, that his Democratic friends thus attempted to imitate his military method of making a minority equal to a majority in Maryland, but miserably failed. The day of election came and passed quietly as a Sabbath day; and the people recorded their reprobation of this illegal attempt at military usurpation by an overwhelming majority; and Holliday Hicks was by their voice Governor of Maryland! Even the violence of Governor Ligon could not provoke the people of Baltimore to insult or outrage him; and the people he came to subjugate double their police force round his headquarters to insure him against the violence he provoked.

John C. Groome, the opponent of Governor Hicks, is now disloyal to the United States and a friend of the southern rebels!

Now let us pause and contemplate the historic significance of this election. Where would you have been had Groome and not Hicks been Governor of Maryland prior to the inauguration of President Lincoln? Where would you have been had Groome instead of Governor Hicks held the military power of that State in his hands on the 19th of April, 1861?

It is strange enough to see a Massachusetts Republican in this House overlook the connection of this election with that period, and speak lightly of the men who then saved the Republic.

Well, sir, an election was held in 1858 with like results, and Democrats submitted to the invincible. Finding they could not crush us by organized military force, which now was out of their power, they organized a most infamous association, called the Reform party, whose duty it was to lie down, in the public prints and in public speeches and by secret associations, what they could not fight down in open daylight. A few respectable people were deluded into covering its infamy by their names. The leaders were not of a material that could meet American mechanics on the broad ground of republican equality at the polls; they shrank from contact with the rough crowd at the polls; they wanted an election managed like a ball-room; they would have a police to play gentlemen ushers in removing all unclean contact with their vulgar competitors at the place of voting, and they tried their hands at party organization. They went to the polls and stayed until about ten o'clock, getting all the votes they had, and when they had run dry, by a preconcerted arrangement they withdrew from the polls, and said they were not allowed to vote, and whined about freedom of elections, and vented their puny spite on their powerful and successful antagonists; who exposed their tricks, defied their power, and laughed at their discomfiture. But fortune had reserved them for her mockery. They were destined to an unexpected triumph, due to other causes, and followed by an unexpected residence of their chiefs in Fort Warren. They failed to defeat me in the city of Baltimore, but an event which was the precursor of the rebellion gave the Democrats of the counties the Legislature. Both results demand our consideration here.

It was John Brown who gave the Democrats and Reformers the Maryland Legislature of 1860—that infamous Assembly which created and named the commissioners of police, who organized the mob of April 19 into a rebellion against the United States. It was that Legislature which prepared in 1860 arms and troops for 1861; it was that Legislature which found its fitting end in Fort Warren, but with John C. Groome in the gubernatorial chair would have wielded all the military power of Maryland against the United States in 1861; and no reflecting man can doubt that had Maryland done as Virginia did the capital must have been abandoned.

My competitor—who has since been honored by a residence in Forts La Fayette and Warren—was simple and honest enough to believe the howl of his reform friends over his defeat by violence and fraud, and in an evil hour, at their instigation, rashly contested my election on much the same sort of evidence now produced against the honorable gentleman from Missouri. Now, for the first time, my enemies left the arena of newspaper slanders, where I would not condescend to battle with them, and met me upon the fair field of a legal contest, with sworn testimony, although they contrived to cheat me out of an opportunity to take my evidence, and the reform association undertook the prosecution for Mr. Harrison. And when the evidence came to be summed up and analyzed only twenty-six illegal votes were proved in all my district, and forty or fifty cases of assault and battery in all of the city of Baltimore! On that election committee the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Dawes] voted with Hon. John A. Gilmer, of North Carolina, that the election was not void, and that I was entitled to my seat! He did not then think secret conclaves, the prevalence of club violence in Maryland, fit topics in an election contest, and his vote on that case leaves him without excuse in his unworthy and groundless slur on elections which he himself had investigated, and on sworn evidence pronounced valid. He cannot plead even ignorance in extenuation of his libel on the character of Maryland elections.

He insinuated that my views and those of the gentleman from Delaware were influenced by our contact with violence at elections, or, as he elegantly expressed it, that we had part of the fitch of bacon. Massachusetts thought she had part of the fitch when Banks was elected Speaker. All of the free States thought they had a part of the fitch of bacon when some decisive votes were given from Maryland in the Lecompton contest. The Republican party thought they had a part of the fitch of bacon when William Pennington ascended the Speaker's chair. Gentlemen of short memories cannot be allowed to forget these things when Maryland is taunted with her elections.

It is rather late to attempt to cast reflections on the elections in the city of Baltimore, now that their historic significance is written in the great events of the times, especially when I can point to the standing dome of this Capitol as a perpetual monument to attest the value of the triumph then achieved. It ill becomes any man of the Republican party to cast in my teeth, of all the men in the world, that I have a part of the "fitch of bacon."

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts is equally unfortunate in his sneer at the loyal mechanics of Baltimore, whom he styles "Plug Uglies." It is a sad proof of how much his association with our political enemies has corrupted his English. He borrows their slang to describe their enemies, whom they blacken because they failed to defeat them. The persons whom he sneers at as Plug Uglies are as respectable as the most respectable of his constituents, as firm in their patriotism, as consistent and fearless in their political convictions, as rich in services to their common country. It is the heart of the American mechanics that he thus slights. Plug Uglies! Why sir, many hundreds of them now sleep in soldiers' graves in the cause of the Republic. They constituted in great part that famous first Maryland regiment, which, under the heroic Kenly, arrested with their bayonets for hours ten times their number of rebel cavalry at Front Royal, and never yielded till they were literally ridden down and destroyed, that they might give the Massachusetts Banks time to save his army; and with their blood they bought his safety, which he, more grateful than the gentleman from Massachusetts, was prompt and eloquent in acknowledging!

The Plug Uglies of Maryland! One of them—Captain Gregory Barrett—has just been promoted by the conservative Governor of Maryland to be lieutenant colonel of his regiment. No man has shown more valor, none has been more heroic in his resolution, than this man now standing before the enemies of his country, while the gentleman from Massachusetts revives and spreads the Democratic epithets by which his enemies sought to injure him.

It was these men, whom our enemies designate by the name the gentleman from Massachusetts quotes from them, that formed the great, silent, irresistible power which palsied the traitors who on and after the 19th of April vainly strove to tear Maryland from the Union; and their associates and friends who fell victims to the weapons of their Irish enemies at the elections whose history I have briefly narrated, died on the same streets, by the same hands, for the same cause, with men of Massachusetts who fell on the 19th of April, and are entitled to be enrolled in history among the nameless dead who gave their lives for the Republic.

Now, sir, my mode of vindicating the Administration is this: I meet the charges when they are brought and as they are brought. I cannot accept maudlin lectures from the Democratic party, nor Puritan lectures from the gentleman from Massachusetts, which the people of Massachusetts would be the first to disavow. I do not deny the existence of the things which they denounce as a crime. When they impute to the Administration and the friends of the Administration revolutionary purposes to break down the Constitution and to prostrate republican institutions, I simply say that while we have the power we will enforce the Constitution as we think right; and when we will meet them before the people they must not expect that they will state their half of the case and that ours will not be stated or will be stated as the gentleman from Massachusetts states it. It will be stated by the men who have borne the heat and burden of the day, who have taken the responsibility and are willing to abide it, but will yield to no judgment but that of the American people.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. When I came here this morning, Mr. Speaker, nothing was further from my intention than to make an argument upon this case. In fact I was hardly prepared to present properly the proofs which are already before the House. I have a general recollection of the points upon which the committee decided and of the force and effect of the testimony, yet the proofs are not fresh enough in my memory to enable me to present them in detail. But the most remarkable speech which has just fallen from the lips of the gentleman from Maryland has changed my resolution on this subject, and almost forced me, as a member of the committee, to some reply.

The gentleman from Maryland seems to have gone over the history of the cases in which frauds have been committed upon the elective franchise, and has referred to Rynders and various other parties who have succeeded in such frauds; and yet, Mr. Speaker, instead of making use of those cases for the purpose of impressing upon this House the necessity of preventing, by strong example, the repetition of those frauds, he has the merit of being the first person who has ever cited such cases to this House as an excuse or encouragement for the repetition of like transactions.

Ay, Mr. Speaker, we know that through all times crimes have been committed. We know there has been a struggle through all time between those in favor of upholding the law and those who are in favor of violating it. Legislatures and judicial tribunals, and the whole machinery of Government have been constituted for the purpose of meeting and repressing all crimes, and especially that very class which that gentleman cites here to sustain the side he has espoused.

Still, in despite of all the efforts of the true and good, assassins lurk on your highways, robbers follow the steps of the unwary, and thieves take from industry its reward, the strong man succumbs to combined force and craft, and beautiful woman falls a prey to the lust of the seducer.

But what should you think of a judge or the advocate who would cite in justification of such outrages the fact that somewhere they occur every day? Is an outrage against the elective franchise, the pure exercise of which is necessary to the vitality of a democratic Government, to be an exception?

The gentleman undertakes to defend the interference of the military with the freedom of elections. He charges the chairman of the Committee of Elections almost with dishonesty because he deemed it his duty, as head of the Election Committee, to report against such system. Now, all this may be very pleasant for the gentleman just at this time; it may be well enough for him to find the protection and terror of bayonets thrown around him when he is a candidate for election; he may be pleased because through the interference of the military he wins a triumph over the defenseless citizens of his district. But let me remind him there is an even-handed justice which in history commends the contents of our poisoned chalice to our own lips.

The gentleman has spoken of Plug Uglies and Native Americans, and of the riots and bloodshed which have so often determined elections in Baltimore, and he has defended them; but shall I remind him, if rumor is to be depended on, that from the very same violence which he then evoked he afterwards became a fugitive, and was forced secretly to escape; that delightful as native Americanism appeared to him when attacking the persecuted Catholic, it bore a different aspect when threatening himself. It seems that Massachusetts, in electing Banks and other Native Americans years ago, struck out the hands of the people of that State to the Plug Uglies, and gave the sanction of law-abiding Massachusetts to those scenes of violence which then were a burning disgrace upon the American name; and need I remind the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Eliot] who has this morning, as the apologist for violence, stood side by side with the gentleman from Maryland, that in the even course of justice to the State, though not to the soldiers, their sixth Massachusetts regiment in the streets of Baltimore were inhumanly struck down by the same class of outlaws whose violence Massachusetts men had done so much to excuse? It is a most singular state of things, when we consider the history of these bloody days and the fate of those poor soldiers who fell in the streets of Baltimore, to find that Representatives from Massachusetts are ready to come forward in this House to apologize for a repetition upon others of that spirit of violence from which they and we all have suffered.

Now, sir, the same military which gives you to-day your election, the same military which to-day, incited by officers who are politicians and not soldiers, overawes the free expression of the people, that same military force may not to-morrow be on your side. And it is well for gentlemen who now apologize for these acts of violence, who now appeal to passion, who look up to the galleries to see if there is a soldier there whom they may excite to violence; I say it is well for those gentlemen to remember that even they may have cause hereafter to tremble before this very spirit which they are inciting. The bad passions which we summon to our assistance are fiends which will not down at our bidding. It is not forever that you can stop the access of truth and fact to the ear of the soldier. It is not forever that those who refuse to pay him fair wages, those who leave his family at home to beg, those who, when a proposition comes up from this side of the House to render him justice, reject it; it is not forever to be the fact that they can persuade the soldier that they are his friends. Yes, they are his friends, as the wolf is the friend of the lamb, as the vampire is the friend of the victim out of whose veins it intended to suck the blood! But remember that while now you can stop these truths from coming to the mind of the soldier, while now you can appeal to him to commit acts of violence against his true friends, the truth some time will reach him, and then I promise you that we Democrats, instead of inciting him to similar acts against you, will say the laws must be obeyed.

Even now we can almost hear the cannon of Grant as he thunders against the enemy; floating rumors, the advance couriers of victory, have already reached us. When Richmond is won, when the rebellion is crushed, and the Union restored, in spite of Jeff. Davis in the South and his radical allies in the North, is it not possible that Grant may be selected as the standard-bearer of the true friends as well of the soldier as of the Union and Constitution in the next presidential campaign? Is it not possible that the soldiers may then remember those cabals of the radicals which two years ago withheld McDowell and rescued Richmond from the hands of Union soldiers? Grant is a war Democrat, and his energy and will, his entire devotion to the country, and his sound judgment, illustrate Democratic patriotism. The only successful wars ever conducted by the Government have been under Democratic auspices. And when the gentleman denies the right of Democrats to challenge or discuss his conduct, as unworthy of his notice or annoying to his dignity, he not only throws down the glove as against Grant and nearly every successful general of the present war, but as against the mighty generals and exalted statesmen who in past days have imparted glory to the pages of American history. But Jackson and Jefferson and Madison, and the rest of these mighty dead, will hardly be disturbed in their graves by the contempt of the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, at the commencement of this session I illustrated my own devotion to the principle of free representation of the people in this House by voting to admit the gentleman from Maryland, although many on this side of the House thought I strained a nice point of law in order to be impartial. But impartiality in matters of this kind is necessary for national safety.

Congress may be corrupt to-day, and to-morrow the people will sweep it out of existence. It does but little harm, because the rodness is in the people's hands. But when you find the party in power endeavoring to repress the free choice of the people in sending their Representatives here, when you find them destroying the freedom of the ballot-box, when you find them making decisions in Congress by which men fairly elected are excluded and those not properly elected are received, then there is but one means of getting rid of a bad Administration, and that is by revolution; and if there is not virtue enough in the people, under these circumstances, to revolutionize, then there is not virtue enough among them to sustain free government. It is our duty here to see to it that this principle upon which Congress in all times past has acted, this principle of protecting to the last the right of the people to select their rulers by means of the ballot-box, is jealously guarded and maintained.

I propose now to point out very briefly the issue involved in this case for the purpose of showing that gentlemen have wandered away from anything that ought to come before the House in regard to it. In the first place, the act of Congress by which the right of contesting seats here is regulated, declares the principle that the two parties must make up their issue, and that the testimony taken must be for the purpose of sustaining that issue. They are excluded by the act of Congress from taking testimony which does not relate to the very issue which the parties have made.

Now, what issue has been made here? The contestant has set up, first, the exclusion of legal voters from the right of voting; second, unlawful interference by the military; and thirdly, violence actually practiced at the polls. I do not enumerate the details, but that is the general outline of the case which the contestant makes out.

The sitting member merely denies these facts. He sets up no new case against the contestant, except one upon which I believe he does not now rely at all. Then it is to that issue and that issue alone that the House should direct its attention.

First, then, who were entitled to vote? Because, for the purpose of ascertaining whether persons who were entitled to vote have been excluded from the polls, we must ascertain that fact. The Constitution of the United States declares that "the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors to the most numerous branch of the State Legislature." Thus the Constitution of the United States provides that the qualification of the electors is to be determined by the State constitution, and we must look to that for the purpose of ascertaining who are qualified to vote. We come, then, not to the original State constitution of Missouri, but to the proceedings of the convention which met and framed a new constitution with a view to the present state of the times, and to meet the very exigency in which Missouri was then placed. That convention passed the following ordinance:

"Sec. 1. No person shall vote at any election to be hereafter held in this State under or in pursuance of the constitution and laws thereof, whether State, county, township, or municipal, who shall not, in addition to possessing the qualifications already prescribed for electors, previously take an oath in form as follows, namely:

"I, _____, do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that I will support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of the State of Missouri against all enemies and opposers, whether domestic or foreign; that I will bear true faith, loyalty, and allegiance to the United States, and will not, directly or indirectly, give aid and comfort or countenance to the enemies or opposers thereof, or of the provisional government of the State of Missouri, any ordinance, law, or resolution of any State convention or Legislature, or any order or organization, secret or otherwise, to the contrary notwithstanding; and that I do this with a full and honest determination, pledge, and purpose, faithfully to keep and perform the same, without any mental reservation or evasion whatever. And I do further solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have not, since the 17th day of December, A. D. 1861, willfully taken up arms or levied war against the United States, or against the provisional government of the State of Missouri. So help me God."

It appears from the ordinance that the qualification of voters consisted, not in never having sympathized with the rebellion, but in the fact of not having since a certain time had any connection with the rebel operations, and in their pledging themselves hereafter to stand true to the Constitution of the United States and of the State of Missouri. That is the sole test, and when we hear this talk upon the other side about "rebel sympathizers," we hear talk about that which is outside of the case and which is not even presented by the parties in the issue they have made up for the purpose of determining their rights.

Then I come to Order No. 24. It seems that the military authorities, instead of yielding to that declaration by the convention of Missouri, undertook to prescribe that a certain class of persons should not vote. That whole class, amounting in one county to nearly eight hundred, was excluded from the polls. That some of them could not and would not have taken this oath prescribed by the convention I have no doubt, but that they were absolutely excluded from the chance of doing so is equally true.

I pass, then, to the next point. It is this: the effect of destroying certain poll lists, and interfering with the election at certain polls. There the gentleman from Maryland seems to have adopted a principle extremely convenient where it is convenient to have a row, but extremely dangerous to the liberties of the people. Suppose, for instance, that there was a precinct in Baltimore with a Democratic majority of two or three thousand, and suppose that the other precincts were the other way, and that riotous persons should break up the election and destroy the ballot-boxes at that particular precinct, leaving those in which the majority was the other way, and thereby give an apparent majority to a candidate who would otherwise be in the minority; in that case, according to the gentleman from Maryland, there should be no inquiry as to the general effect of breaking up of the ballot-boxes at the one precinct, or as to its effect in changing the result of the election, but that the one precinct alone would be rejected, leaving the majorities in the others undisturbed. This is to place it in the power of any one to interfere with election polls where his opponent is largely in the majority, and to carry the election with a minority of votes.

I insist that the question is this: whether, when you look at the entire election, when you look to all the votes thrown, you can say that this election in the seventh congressional district of Missouri represents the will of the majority of those who were entitled to vote and had an opportunity to vote within the district. If, from any circumstance, the free expression of choice on the part of the voters is interfered with; if, from any cause not under the control of the electors themselves, you cannot say that a majority of the people of the district have spoken in favor of the party claiming his seat, then I say there has been no election entitling such party to hold his seat. That proposition was advanced in the Louisiana cases, and supported by this House. It was stated likewise in the Virginia cases, and supported by this House. And what I say in relation to this particular election is that, taking into consideration all the facts proved in the case, the House cannot say that the sitting member had the expression of a majority of those entitled to vote at that election.

I will next refer to the nature and extent of testimony in such cases. I understand it is not necessary, as the gentleman from Maryland asserts, that you produce the very name of every person who by violence is excluded from the polls, where the charge is that there was general violence and a general terror. I understand that the proof of individual instances would not be proof of general violence and general terror. The proof must meet the charge. If the charge were that certain individuals were excluded from the polls, the proof should show that; but if the charge were that the whole body of the people were affected, any proof that looks to individual and not to general acts extending over the district would be improper. Here the proof sustains the allegation that there was this general feeling of terror, which in fact did prevent from voting a larger body of voters than were sufficient to have turned the scale. You have presented to you by the report the material parts of this proof, and it is not my intention to repeat it.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 11, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 138.

I have already, Mr. Speaker, taken up more time than I intended in this matter; but I wish to make one further remark on the general question. I say for myself that in passing on this testimony, so far as I was able by the strictest effort of will to divest myself of any partisan feeling, I have done so. I think the gentleman from Maryland himself, [Mr. DAVIS,] who recollects that he had my vote for his seat when it was proposed to reject him at the commencement of this session, will say that I have at least shown by my acts an intention to act impartially. And I appeal to gentlemen upon the other side of the House to preserve at least the right of the people to change the policy of the Government by here asserting the freedom of elections. I appeal to them to prevent the consequences which must follow from making a decision in a disputed election case turn upon a mere question of party politics. I know that in times past it has been a question of justice and not of party. Even conceding to the gentleman from Maryland that he has defended himself from the charge of coming in times past through acts of violence to this House, he will recollect that on at least one occasion he came with a majority of the House against him, when if they had seen fit to insist upon the rule which he desires to apply in this case he would not have been retained in his seat, even had he disproved those charges so frequently made against him and so universally believed.

But, as I said before, see in the triumphant man of to-day the defeated man of to-morrow. He who to-day tramples upon his prostrate enemy or grasps him by the throat, may to-morrow himself be prostrate and beg for that justice which to-day he refuses. Sir, let us have at least a single class of cases in this House which partisan politics shall not control. Let us see to it that if the people another year wish to change the character of this House, by making it more radical or the reverse, their right so to change it shall be respected. Again, I say that in encouraging violence we but give "Bloody instructions, which, being taught, return

To plague the inventor."

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I should not have considered it my duty to have interposed any remarks upon the question before the House, especially after the able argument of the chairman of the Committee of Elections, [Mr. DAVES,] followed by the clear exposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BROWN,] if it were not for the allusion which has been made by the member from Baltimore city [Mr. DAVIS] to the past elections in Maryland, and especially for the allusion made by him to one of my constituents, ex-Governor Thomas Watkins Ligon.

I cannot avoid saying, however, just here, that Massachusetts, whom the chairman of the Committee of Elections [Mr. DAVES] in part represents, has but little right to cast a slur upon Baltimore city for her Plug Ugly enormities—as long as the charge remains of Mount Benedict, look on Bunker Hill—so long as the memory of that crime shall remain, so long as the memory of her "Hiss" committee entitles her to the scorn and contempt of the world. While these exist, Massachusetts should be quiet; she should take care never to throw the first stone. In carrying out these outrages, however, she was but acting upon principles which the member from Baltimore city [Mr. DAVIS] was prominent in inaugurating in Maryland, and of which he reaped the personal benefit which it was calculated through force and violence to confer. But, sir, before I proceed further, allow me to ask the attention of the member from Baltimore city, if he will yield me his ear, upon what evidence he charges Thomas Watkins Ligon with being a traitor. You heard me, sir, well enough.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I did not hear the remark of the gentleman.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. You did not want to hear.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. That is false.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. Very well. I want to know if the member from Baltimore city will produce the evidence on which he has undertaken to pronounce Governor Ligon a traitor publicly upon this floor. Mr. Ligon is a resident of Maryland, is now in Howard county at large, and if the member from Baltimore city has any evidence to sustain the charge he has made against this constituent of mine, I would like to hear it. I wait for a reply.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I respectfully decline to make any reply to the "unworthy member" from Maryland.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. That is very convenient. I do not want the member's reply because of any opinion he may entertain of my worthiness or unworthiness; that should have nothing to do with it; but I want his reply as relating to justice or injustice to a citizen who is not here to defend himself. The member thus sees fit to avail himself of the impunity he enjoys here to charge against a constituent of mine the highest crime known to the law, but will not condescend to produce a particle of proof to sustain it. Now, sir, when a man makes such a charge and will not give any proof to sustain it when called on, when he avoids an answer to the demand for proof by equivocating upon another issue, I cannot and will not say that he is anything but a slanderer. I am ready to withdraw that charge whenever the member shall think proper to prove that Thomas Watkins Ligon is guilty of the charge he has made against him.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman makes that charge against his colleague he is out of order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. What charge?

The SPEAKER. That he is a slanderer; it is contrary to the rules of the House.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I think he was allowed to say that I was an "unworthy member." But I should like to know how to characterize the conduct of the member from Baltimore city. If it is not slander, what is it? I do not want to offend against the rules of order; but I have a right to infer, and do infer, from the course of that member that the charge is utterly false, and that the member has no proof whatever to sustain it.

Mr. L. MYERS rose.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I do not give way.

Mr. Speaker, the member from Baltimore city seems to enjoy a great opinion of himself. His whole hour was nearly consumed in giving the history—if statements so false can properly be called history—of the great and glorious achievements of himself and his Plug Uglies who enlisted under his banner. He would make us believe that the pillars of the Constitution rested upon his and their shoulders. He was the great defender of the rights of the people of his city, and worthy of, as he had received, their unbounded confidence. Sir, I assert it here that he never enjoyed any public trust or honor except by violence and fraud combined. Three times has he come to this House by the aid of the bludgeon and dagger of the Plug Uglies; and he now occupies his place here by favor of the bayonets of brutal tyrants. These are the honorable instances which he can point to as displaying the confidence of a free and untimid constituency.

But, Mr. Speaker, I commenced with saying that it was ungracious in Massachusetts to cast a slur at Maryland for practicing a crime of which she was herself part and parcel. True, Maryland should suffer a greater shame, for she had before her the example and guidance of the noble pilgrims who landed on the shores of St. Mary's, while degraded Massachusetts sucked in fanaticism and intolerance from the rock of Plymouth. Sir, the man who will be guilty of the blasphemy of persecuting and proscribing his fellow-men for his religious opinions, especially in this country where the Constitution guarantees their free exercise, is unworthy of a place on this footstool of God. It leads, necessarily, to resistance and bloodshed, and he who inaugurates such a system knows it, and is wickedly and basely willing to enjoy the emoluments and honors of this world, if honors they can be called, though stained by the blood of his fellow-man. Ah, sir, the very first blood that was shed upon earth flowed from this cause; and, sir, a brand as indelible as that imprinted by God upon the brow of Cain should be placed upon the brow of him who proscribes a brother because he worships the living God with a sacrifice which he thinks acceptable.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us animadvert a little further upon the elections in Maryland and the violence which has attended them. I have myself been a sufferer in that respect. In 1861 I was a candidate for Congress in my district, but I was then defeated by the calm, genteel, but effective tyranny of General John A. Dix, a renegade Democrat and a tyrant, [A voice, "Hit him again;"] a tyrant with a smooth exterior, a little worse, if possible, than those who look the bulldog and the cur. The same general with the bloodless sword effectually brought Maryland to the footstool of tyrannical power by insolent violence, arresting candidates for the Senate and driving the people from the polls, because he knew that an unmolested free election would have given the opponents of the Administration a majority in that body, and would thus have preserved the dignity, the rights, and interests of Maryland from the complete overthrow which they are now suffering. The subjugation of Maryland may be traced to the conduct of this infamous tyrant, for the inevitable majority in her Senate would have saved her the agony she is now enduring.

At the last election in which I was a candidate there was another attempt to thwart my success, but the people were too wise this time. They had become acquainted with the operations and movements of the tyrants, and determined to flank them. The Order No. 53 was issued by the commander of the middle department for the express purpose of affecting the result of the last fall's election in Maryland; and, sir, not only did I contend with the military tyrants, but even a Cabinet minister so far descended from the dignity of his position as to go into Montgomery county—a county in my district—with the pledge that there should be no military interference in their election if the people would only agree not to have my name printed on the ticket. Everything else should be free provided they were willing to make this sacrifice of one who undoubtedly had their confidence. What was the motive of this interference I cannot imagine, except that he hoped thereby to get an additional vote to aid Frank, as the President so affectionately calls him, in stepping into the chair you so effectively and impartially fill. Sufficient it is for me to say that I am here to-day somewhat proud that I have by the aid of my glorious constituents been able to overcome all those enemies of my rights and their rights. I beat the great commander of the middle department with his Order No. 53 and all his military aids, [laughter,] and I have the satisfaction of being his equal on this floor. I beat the Cabinet minister in Montgomery county triumphantly, [laughter,] and I am here to aid in sending orders to him; and I beat my two opponents with all their ingenious management; and I am in the enjoyment of health and spirits notwithstanding your censure. [Renewed laughter.]

Now, sir, I come more particularly to the election under consideration. What I have said has some bearing upon it because of late there seems to be a great sameness in all elections. I have not read the report of the committee, nor have I looked over the evidence accompanying it. My remarks will be based upon what has been asserted and conceded here. It is not denied that there was military interference to a great extent in this election. Not only was it actual, but threatened and dreaded to so great a degree as to keep a great number, an indefinite number, of the voters from the polls. I contend, under such circumstances, that unless the claimant of the seat can show by proof that he has a clear majority of all the voting population of the district he claims to represent, it is the duty of this House to decide against his claim and to send back both him and his contestant, and to continue to do so until the free and unfettered action of the people of the district had unequivocally declared who should be their servant and Representative. The principle I have announced shall regulate my vote, and if the claimant shall be able to make his facts conform to that principle, then I will support his right to his seat upon this floor. There can be no other intelligible mode of coming to a just and honorable conclusion. I shall presume, sir, that the claimant will thus undertake to establish his claim, because I will not presume that he would accept a seat procured by violence and not as a free gift of his people. The honor would be plucked from the place, and self-respect would cease to be his possession. Distant I hope is the day when many of our prominent and leading men shall be so selfish, so unpatriotic, so destitute of honorable sentiment, as to seek posts of trust and honor by the aid of the bludgeon and the club, or by an appeal from the "ballot to the bullet."

But, sir, notwithstanding his eloquent exhortation here in favor of free ballot, I was surprised to find the chairman of the Committee of Elections [Mr. Dawes] claim for the Executive of this country the tremendous power and right of interfering by military force or other contrivances with the elections in the States. I know there are some prominent gentlemen who will concede or contend for any power for the Executive, no matter how dangerous to the liberties and rights of the people, provided it will aid in advancing their ambitious prospects or in gratifying their mercenary hearts. I feel confident that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Dawes] takes counsel from no such motives, but I must meet his assertion of such a power as I have mentioned for the Executive with a most emphatic denial. He considers it the duty and right of the President to enter the States on election days with military power exhibited at the polls to see that a pure, fair, and honest result is obtained, and also to keep traitors from the ballot-box. Now, sir, though both of these things are extremely desirable in war and peace, yet, in my opinion, the Executive of the United States is the last agency that should be adopted to accomplish them. The remedy is worse than the disease, or rather would generate a new disease more dangerous than the one which it is attempted to cure. Sir, I deny his right to enter the States for any such purpose of interference, and whenever he does he is not only a traitor to the constitution of the State but a violator of the great principle which lays at the foundation of our common Government. Can any one suppose that our forefathers, as jealous as they were of executive power, would ever think of conferring upon the President a power so easily abused, and when abused so difficult of amendment and control? Never, sir, never! They designed to leave the entire management of elections with the State authorities; and with them, if the people of this country are wise, they will insist upon its being left.

But, sir, the President must see that traitors do not contaminate the polls with their presence.

Why is it that traitors are allowed to go at large until the day of election? This is an astonishing fact, or the "Order No. 53" from the headquarters of the Middle department, dated October 27, 1863, contains a falsehood. I read it:

"It is known that there are many evil-disposed persons now at large in the State of Maryland who have been engaged in rebellion against the lawful Government, or have given aid and comfort or encouragement to others so engaged, or who do not recognize their allegiance to the United States, and who may avail themselves of the indulgence of the authority which tolerates their presence, to embarrass the approaching election, or through it to foist enemies of the United States into power. It is therefore ordered:

"1. That all provost marshals and other military officers do arrest all such persons found at or hanging about or approaching any poll or place of election on the 4th of November, 1863, and report such arrest to these headquarters."

Why is it, I ask again, that known traitors are at large, and that, too, by the indulgence of the authority which tolerates their presence, and that all that indulgence is to be suddenly withdrawn on election day? Can traitors do no mischief to the country except in the matter of elections, and on that particular day? And why is it there are so many "traitors" arrested on the morning of election, before the polls are opened, and most unaccountably released after the election is over? This looks a little mysterious. Sir, it is all a false pretense; it is the trick of the tyrant, adopted in order to involve those who honestly differ with them in political opinions in the pretended net of suspicion, so that by arrests, by various annoyances which a tyrant knows so well how to manufacture, he may keep the honest voters from the polls, and thus secure the election of a brother conspirator. Thus it is that this great right of free ballot, which is the protector of all other rights, and that, too, when all other rights are nearly crushed to the earth, has been brutally assailed by brutal military tyranny.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would remind the gentleman from Maryland that he must address the Chair. He has not been doing so for some time past. [Mr. HARRIS stood immediately in front of the Chair, and had been speaking for several minutes with his back to the Speaker.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I am addressing the Chair, and hope the Chair has heard me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. He is addressing the Chair. He is not required to look at the Speaker all the time.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania raise that point of order?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. It is the Chair that makes the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair states that it is the usage for the person occupying the chair to remind gentlemen when they are addressing members of the House that it is their duty to address the Chair.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I hope the Chair will not come down again. It is a long lane that has no turning.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I do not yield to my friend from Pennsylvania; I can take care of myself. This is my business, and I object to any interruption. I did not intend offense to the Chair in turning my back, but it is very important, as I have a weak voice, that those whom I intend to have the benefit of my counsel shall hear me. [Laughter.] I do not intend any disrespect to the Chair; as I said before, I have never seen a more impartial presiding officer than the one who presides over this House. I should not have known to which side of the House he belonged politically from his action in the Chair. I say this in all sincerity and truth.

I was saying, sir, that the great privilege of freedom of elections and of the ballot is one which the people will not yield, and with which all executive interference must be withheld. The people have been suffering in every other respect, and much in this. Right after right has been taken from us; the temple of liberty has, as it were, been stripped. The shingles have been taken off at one time, the weatherboarding at another, and you have brought out your battering-rams to crush out the great foundation-stone in order to bring rafter, joist, and all the timbers of the noble edifice in irreparable ruin to the earth. I tell you, sir, we will not stand it much longer. The men who, by the exercise of assumed tyrannical power, shall further assail that great right, will see ere long the ballot-boxes baptized in blood—a baptism that may be necessary to wash away the foul stains of tyranny and oppression.

Mr. Speaker, the President himself, in his letter addressed to citizens of Springfield, Illinois, declared that "he who appeals from the ballot to the bullet shall lose his case and pay the costs;" and, sir, he is the first man who has a judgment for costs against him. He himself, by the instrumentality of his vicious tools, has violated the solemn pledge which he indicated in that letter, and this, too, upon the ridiculous and frivolous ground that treason may possibly contaminate the ballot-box. If a man is known to be a traitor, the place of election would, I think, be the last place at which he would make his personal appearance. He would know well that the risk he runs would not be compensated for by the privilege he sought. It is futile to talk to intelligent people about traitors being at large in justification of the President or any of his subordinates parading around the polls for purposes of intimidation with military array. It is done because they wish to thwart the free and honest expression of the people's will, when they have reason to apprehend that the result would be against their selfish and tyrannical schemes. Grant this power to the Executive, and he would be able to select your candidates and to secure their elections, and thus to pack this House with his tools. Grant him that power, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Dawes] would not be here to talk so eloquently about the freedom of the ballot, and to rebuke the tyranny by which it was struck down. His occupation and that of the committee of which he is the able chairman would be gone. Nothing more would be necessary than for the President to issue a proclamation (which of course could be obtained at any time by a squad of fanatical preachers) announcing who he considers entitled to the places on this floor. He could, too, and would secure, by effectual interference with elections of the members of the Legislatures of the different States, a full supply of cringing tools in the other branch of Congress. The process would produce the very definition of despotism.

The SPEAKER. The hour of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Brown] has expired.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I had nothing to do with the time to which the gentleman from Wisconsin was entitled.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair is mistaken. The present occupant of the chair was not in the Hall at the time.

Mr. SLOAN. I rise to a point of order. I am informed that the gentleman from Wisconsin did yield a portion of his time to the gentleman from Maryland. I call upon my colleague to say whether it was not so.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I can only say that I did not accept of any concession, if he made any, from my friend from Wisconsin. He had finished what he had to say, and I took the floor by my own independent right.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed an act for the settlement, subsistence, and support of the Navajo Indian captives on a reservation in the Territory of New Mexico.

MISSOURI TESTED ELECTION—AGAIN.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Sloan] raised the question of order that the time of the gentleman from Maryland had expired. The Chair is informed that although the gentleman from Wisconsin expressed his willingness to yield the remainder of his hour, the gentleman from Maryland took the floor without any concession and is now entitled to his full hour.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I do not intend to tax the patience of the House by consuming the entire time to which I am entitled. When interrupted (as I have so frequently been) I was carrying out my line of argument to show what the Executive of this country could do by the exercise of such a power as was claimed for him by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] and conceded by the member from Baltimore city, [Mr. DAVIS.] With this tremendous lever he might easily overturn the liberties of this country. As I said before, he could fill all the places of trust and honor with the willing tools of his power; men who, being willing slaves themselves, are fit instruments to make slaves of others. Even any "ism" might be voted up or voted down if advised by the preachers, through the operation of the power now claimed for him. Anti-slaveryism can be elected at any time, as by this process is now in reality being done in the States in which that institution exists. The forms of law may be preserved, while the fraudulent and oppressive realities of tyranny can be enforced. Sir, this pretended design of keeping treason from the polls is too transparent. Why is it that this crime, punishable at all times, is punished only on election day? It is that patriotic men, who differ with the Administration in its ruinous course, who have the highest regard for their constitutional and legal obligations, may be involved in the loss of their greatest privilege under the infamous pretense of preserving it. It is an easy thing, as we see, for a heated and selfish partisan to proclaim the charge of treason against a fellow-citizen; but when the charge is made, and is unsustained by proof, there can be no other name for the unjust accuser except the name of slanderer.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a question of order. The member from Maryland is contumaciously disobeying the Chair. He is not addressing the Chair; he is addressing the other part of the House. I call him to order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I hope I will not be interrupted. I will look at the Chair. The Chair will excuse me if in the warmth of debate I have transgressed the rule of order which the Chair has laid down.

Mr. NOBLE. I have listened with great care to the gentleman from Maryland, and since admonished by the Chair he has made no address to anybody else but the Chair. I do not think he is liable to the point of order made against him by the member from Ohio.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I think my honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] should not be so sensitive on this subject. I will not, however, call him my friend, for I do not know him, and am not sure that he would recognize the appellation. But, sir, I know I have seen him in the ecstasies and contortions of debate so far forget himself on this point as to bring him within the category of those who are not privileged to cast the first stone.

This charge of treason is a wide-spread net. It has entered the Halls of Congress and been used for the purpose of arresting free debate and stifling the warning voices which will reach the ears and warm the hearts of the American people. For the bold utterances of my political sentiments, this charge of treason has been called from the "vast deep" in order to proscribe me. I dare to avow them in this or any other presence, and the defiance refutes the charge. For the avowal of my approbation of the sentiment contained in the celebrated Crittenden resolution, (though in a somewhat different form,) which the gentleman [Mr. WASHBURN] who drew the resolution of expulsion approved of and voted for, it was declared here in his resolution that I had used "treasonable language and had been guilty of a gross contempt of this House," and should be expelled. As to the charge of gross contempt of the House, the recollection and reflection of the members who voted it must declare it false. Not a single rule of order or parliamentary decorum did I violate on that occasion, and the House will be ashamed when they review their own ruling on that point. But my language was "treasonable." This word is used in common parlance, free from the rigid rules of law. But I defy any man to find in American criminal law such a word as "treasonable." Treason needs no adjectives to define or construe its meaning. It has its definition written by the hands of our glorious fathers in the Constitution itself. It is an unqualified substantive, standing forth from the Constitution like a mountain, that all may view its dark outlines. This word, then, used with such hot haste and indorsed by a majority of this House with so little reflection, shows that they would construct a treason to suit what they might consider the demand of the times, without regard to the demands of the Constitution which they are sworn to support, and without regard to the just privilege of defense which they in my case ignored. It is pitiable when such acts are done that they should be hastily done, and inaugurated by that kind of ignorance which knows not the force of language. The rule which our fathers wrote in the Constitution saved me from your expulsion, and saved you from the stern and indignant rebuke which I would have brought back with me from my patriotic and whole-souled constituents.

But you did not stop here; your vengeance was not thus to be thwarted. Another resolution introduced by the member from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] and upon which he cut off all debate by the previous question, declared that I had used language "manifestly tending and intended to give aid and comfort to the enemies of this country, and that I was therefore an unworthy member and should receive its censure." The tendency which he considers so manifest is an absurdity. What a tendency it would have to give the aid and comfort which he speaks of, for one solitary member in this Hall with all others against him to show himself the friend of the enemy! It must cheer the heart of Jefferson Davis to the core to receive such great and efficient aid.

Mr. UPSON. I call the gentleman to order. He is not discussing the question before the House. The resolution of censure passed by the House on the gentleman has nothing to do with the pending question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not been able to hear what the gentleman from Maryland has been saying for the last fifteen minutes. If he has been referring to the censure passed on him by the House he is out of order.

Mr. SMITH. I hope that the gentleman will be allowed to take his own course and not be confined to the pending question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. The member from Maryland was accorded the privilege of referring to other subjects than the one under debate.

Mr. FENTON. I call for a decision on that motion.

Mr. SMITH. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] and others have alluded to matters not directly or strictly under consideration. I listened to their remarks with pleasure. I desire that the member from Maryland [Mr. HARRIS] shall be allowed to proceed in the same direction. If he gets so far out of order that it is necessary to call him to order, no one will be quicker to do it than myself; I do not mean in violation of the rules of the House, but without relevancy to the question under consideration.

Mr. UPSON. I object.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 37.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. It is not very agreeable to address those who are unwilling to hear me, although I have nothing to complain of as to the great attention they give me. I have said nothing that should offend them. I alluded to the fact that they had not been willing to give me the privilege of defense on the occasion referred to, and it seems they are not very willing to give me an opportunity of defense now. To show how insidious the charge of treason can be made and how willingly sustained is not in my estimation so irrelevant to the issue before the House as gentlemen might suppose. The charge is made in election cases to destroy the freedom of the ballot, and may be used here to abolish the freedom of debate. But, sir, to the other branch of the charge in the resolution of censure of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] It declares that my language was manifestly designed to give the aid and comfort spoken of to the enemies of the country. The member when he wrote that could not know it to be true, but I know it to be utterly false. But it would have been as absurd to utter language here under the circumstances, with such a design, as it would be to suppose the language uttered would have the tendency which the resolution charged. Designed! Such a thing never entered my mind. On that day I came into this House unexpectedly and found that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONG] had been assailed by a resolution of expulsion for the expression of his sentiments on this floor. The only feeling

I had and the only thought I had was that of indignation at the unwarranted attempt to arrest the freedom of discussion here. The language I used rushed from the indignant heart of a freeman when Freedom was assailed in its very temple. I not only intended to show that he had the full right he claimed, but I determined by going a bar's length ahead of him to test before the country the full strength of the great privilege you have assailed. I am thus far satisfied with the result. Still, talking of treason, sir, the only language that indicated a desire to perpetrate treason fell from the member from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] himself, when he declared that if he had the power he would send his colleague [Mr. LONG] across the lines; and what would he expect of him in the lines of the enemy except to give them aid and comfort? Ah, sir, perhaps by shouldering a musket and meeting the chivalrous gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] in battle, and by one disastrous shot possibly depriving the country of his valuable services. I say such acts are treason, whether done by the President of the United States or any of his subordinates. Instead of putting a traitor in jail to suffer the consequences of his act, you send him where his sympathies are, and voluntarily give the enemies of your country additional force for destroying your soldiers in the field. If you or I had done such acts and they were known to the late commander of the Middle department, we should have had the benefit of a room in Fort McHenry and a sentence of a drum-head court-martial. And are not these men to be held responsible for this crime, for which they would so readily punish their equals?

Sir, I wish to sift this thing called treason, these slang phrases, loyalty and disloyalty. The latter word, if it means anything, can only embrace the crime of treason, and the former can only mean conformity to legal and constitutional obligations, unless, indeed, may be added, as some construe it, the obligation to steal a negro. Sir, I contend all are loyal who are not traitors, according to the definition of that crime contained in the Constitution. The lines and boundaries of treason are and were intended to be well marked. He that steps within them is a criminal, but outside of those lines and on their very verge the American citizen looking over the vast field of his rights can defiantly exclaim:

"I am monarch of all I survey."

Mr. Speaker, the great event of a presidential election is advancing upon us. The designs and schemes which I have endeavored to expose may be again resorted to in order to defeat the choice of the people and force upon them a reign of terror for four years longer. I tell you, sir, it is the right of the people to carry arms, and it may be their duty to use them in order to preserve their liberties. If they could hear and heed my voice everywhere, from the snow-clad mountains of New Hampshire to the waters of the Potomac, from the Atlantic to the Pacific coasts, they will "arise, awake, before they are forever fallen." Let those heed my voice, too, who as in the past shall dare by threatened violence to interfere with that great fundamental right of the people, the very basis and foundation of all other rights which they hold as treasures. Mark me when I say that the people will arise and defend their rights although blood may flow in streams from their veins, but they will find that blood flows in other veins besides theirs, that their tyrants have some of that precious fluid. If interference shall be persisted in with the free expression of the people's choice at the ballot-box, that priceless right guaranteed to us by our beloved ancestors, I hope that blood will flow, and that traitors and tyrants will be trampled in the dust.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, the member from Maryland, who has just taken his seat, made some reference to me. I desire to have read what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Resolved, That BENJAMIN G. HARRIS, a Representative from the fifth district of the State of Maryland, having spoken words this day in debate manifestly tending and designed to encourage the existing rebellion and the enemies of this Union, is declared to be an unworthy member of this House, and is hereby severely censured."

"The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 93, nays 18; as follows:

"So the resolution was agreed to."

Mr. SCHENCK. That is all I desire. I wish that to follow the speech of the gentleman from Maryland in the official report.

Mr. L. MYERS obtained the floor.

TREATMENT OF UNION PRISONERS.

Mr. GOOCH. With the permission of my friend from Pennsylvania, I desire to submit a report from the joint committee on the conduct of the war relative to the cruelties inflicted upon our soldiers while in the hands of the enemy as prisoners of war. I move that the report be laid on the table and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GOOCH. I move now that forty thousand extra copies of the report be printed, and in submitting that motion I wish to say to the Committee on Printing that this report will make but some twenty or thirty pages of printed matter, and we are desirous that it shall be included in the same volume with the report in relation to the massacre at Fort Pillow.

The motion to print extra copies was referred, under the law, to the Joint Committee on Printing.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to ask indefinite leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. CLAY, whose family is exceedingly unwell.

Leave was granted.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask leave of absence for one week from to-morrow for my colleague, Mr. DENISON, and leave of absence for three days for my colleague, Mr. STROUSE, who is called home by sickness in his family.

Leave was granted.

Mr. FENTON. My colleague, Mr. MARVIN, has been called away from the city by important business, and before leaving he requested me to ask leave of absence for him for ten days. I ask that he have that leave.

Leave was granted.

MISSOURI CONTESTED ELECTION—AGAIN.

Mr. L. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, I have but a word or two to say on the question before the House. At this very moment we are rendering thanks to Almighty God for a great victory vouchsafed to our arms. The national heart is glad, but the individual hearts of the people are throbbing with anxiety to hear from the battle-field. Thousands of our wounded are on their way to this capital; thousands more—mangled as they are with traitors—lie dead upon the field, and yet with the memory of Fort Pillow and Plymouth fresh within us, while our returned prisoners, emaciated and faint, and dying from starvation at the hands of southern demons, piteously appeal to us against them; while the blood of that brave young colonel—Dahlgren—who gave first limb and then life to the cause of his country is scarcely dry upon southern sod; while by every hearthstone in the land there is a chair made vacant by this foul rebellion of slaveholders, here, in the American Congress, it is gravely proposed to eject from his seat one of its loyal members, not even to put in his place the contestant—who has not the shadow of a case—but to refer the election back to the people in order to see whether by taking away the military authorities from the polls sufficient rebel voters remain in this district, despite our victories, to send a member in his stead who shall side with rebellion and against the country. That is the question before us. Hereafter let no man complain that freedom of speech and latitude of debate are not allowed in these Halls. Fittingly, indeed, did the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HARRIS,] the apologist here of rebels and traitors, who has been declared an unworthy member of this House, rise to favor the resolution, and most unfitly does he, of all others, charge the sitting member [General Loan] with a want of self-respect in retaining his seat, when, contrary to usage and in violation of the wish of his more than peers, he himself remains where his presence is unbearable.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to the case. I listened attentively to the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BROWN,] anxious to learn what he had found in the testimony to justify the course he has taken, but I listened in vain for any such allusion. I heard his denunciations of the Administration. I heard his threats that the people would rise in revolution if this state of things continued, or they were not fit for freedom. I heard him misquote history in stating that Massachusetts troops were struck down in the streets of Baltimore by the same violence, as he terms it, that was used at the polls in Missouri to keep voters away, and I take leave to differ from him on all points. Especially do I say that the violence which struck down those noble Massachusetts and Pennsylvania men was secession violence, and that the men who were kept away from the polls in Missouri were secessionists. I heard the gentleman from Wisconsin assert that we were not the friends of the soldier. Let the soldiers, whose good sense he seems to doubt—to whose ears there have not yet come the good tidings that the Democratic party is their especial friend—let the soldiers, by the record of their votes in favor of General Loan, and in favor of Union candidates on all occasions, answer the slander.

Mr. Speaker, I gave close attention the other day to the talented member from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee of Elections, [Mr. DAWES.] I heard his sophistry and philosophy, but no facts to warrant, in my judgment, the conclusions to which he came. He made, however, one assertion in which I agree with him. He said he believed there was power in the Government to keep rebels away from the polls. Loyally as he always votes, loyal as he is, I should not have thought he so believed in this case from anything but that assertion. I, too, think the Government has such power, and so thinking I intend to vote that the member from the seventh congressional district of Missouri shall retain the seat to which the evidence shows him entitled.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who seems to have an intuition on this point, said he was sorry to see in the countenances of gentlemen on this side of the House a determination to vote for the sitting member, and that he was afraid they had not opened the books of the case which lay upon their desks. To have judged, sir, by his lack of reference to the testimony, I should have supposed the omission his own instead of theirs, and when his colleague, [Mr. ELIOT,] called up by his appeal to the good sense of their native State, was proceeding to demolish his argument from the evidence, he was very careful to stop the interruption.

I have looked through the testimony, and from it find that the only intimidation made use of in the seventh district of Missouri was to keep rebels and branded secession sympathizers away from the polls. I am in favor of intimidation of that kind. If it had not been practiced in districts like this, bordering upon rebellion, the Government of the United States would not have used its self-sustaining power.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. If the gentleman will allow me I will ask him whether there is any allegation in the defense set up by Mr. Loan to the effect that these men who were excluded from the polls were rebels and secession sympathizers.

Mr. L. MYERS. I answer the gentleman from Wisconsin that I care not whether it is so alleged or not. I look to the proof and mean to be guided by that, as I think the minority of the committee has been, and as I know this House will be. General Loan in his answer denies that qualified voters were kept from the polls. Such men were not qualified voters; but the evidence is the contestant's. General Loan offered none. Mr. Bruce must prove his case. All these facts came out on cross-examination of his own witnesses and he is bound by them. Let me take a specimen of the evidence upon this point. I will read a single question and answer from the testimony of Joseph B. Nickel, on page 91:

"Question 22. Does not the class of men who you think did not vote at said election, and who you think would, on a fair election, have voted for John P. Bruce, consist mainly of men who had returned from the rebel army, or had been arrested by military authority and imprisoned or put under bonds, or enrolled under Order No. 24, or were reputed to be secessionists or secession sympathizers?"

Answer 22. The men above referred to consist partly of men who uniformly call themselves Democrats, and many of whom have been arrested and imprisoned by the military authorities at some time since 1859; partly of men who had at one time been in the State or Confederate army, and some of whom are now under military bonds; and partly of those who are said to be enrolled under Order No. 24. Of the last, there were but few at Savannah, comparatively. All three of the above classes are, by the Republican party, called rebels and rebel sympathizers."

Now, sir, this is one of the witnesses for the contestant. A number of them testify to the same effect. I judge him by his own evidence; and I find by glancing over it that wherever General Loan attended himself or by counsel to cross-examine the witnesses, it was found that they came under one of the classes alluded to.

I will refer to several of them in support of the assertion. In the testimony of Benjamin C. Cunningham, page 43, I find the following:

"Question. You will please state whether or not you applauded the capture of Fort Sumter in the spring of 1861."

Answer. I don't think I did, sir.

"Question. You will please state whether or not you did not condemn the tearing down of the Confederate flag hoisted in the city of St. Joseph, Missouri, in the summer of 1861."

Answer. I did not either approve or disapprove of it."

Dr. A. Lamme, in his cross-examination (page 47) admits that he gave three groans on the occasion of raising a United States flag over the post-office at St. Joseph.

John W. Garr testifies (page 110) as follows:

"Question. Have you ever been a member of the militia of this county, and if not, for what reason?"

Answer. I have not. I got a certificate of exemption as a sympathizer with the rebellion."

I refer also to the testimony of a number of other witnesses to the same effect. Two of them, a clerk and judge of election, failed to take the loyal oath prescribed by the convention of Missouri. One of them falsified in his evidence, stating that he had been so sworn, but the contestant afterwards admitted what sort of an oath he did take, and it was not the oath prescribed by the convention. The evidence also shows that the contestant, Mr. Bruce, received a large number of rebel votes. James A. Matney admits that of the returned rebels, and those regularly enrolled under Order No. 24 as disloyal, a majority voted for Bruce; such votes for Loan, he says, "were few and far between." Thomas R. Bryan and others will be found conclusive upon the same point; so that if all such votes had been excluded, as I think they ought to have been, Mr. Loan's majority would have been larger than is returned. No doubt many were received, for we find Mr. Bruce (page 15) calling on General Hall, and protesting against the exclusion of those enrolled under Order No. 24.

Again, in the notice given by the contestant, in order to overcome the large majority of 2,000 votes given to General Loan, he states at random that he lost 800 votes in this county, 1,000 votes in that, and so on, by the course pursued against him. Now, let me give a single example of the way he proves his allegations. The witness, Matney, being referred to this allegation, swears up to the figure of 500, said to have been lost to Bruce in Buchanan county, but the test of a cross-examination dwindles the loss to nothing, as it does in every instance where this precaution was taken. He says he arrives at this difference of 800 votes and more by a comparison between the vote for President in 1860 and for Congress in 1862, and yet is forced to confess that before December, 1861, between three hundred and five hundred men had left Buchanan county to join Price's rebel army, and after that time and before the congressional election in 1862 several rebel regiments were recruited in that county. Their loss, to be sure, somewhat replaced (see page 29) by "a large number of persons who had been run out of Kansas into Buchanan county and came from other States to avoid the draft," but were not legal voters. A specimen, sir, for the whole.

This is the class of testimony, if any, which gentlemen on the other side, as well as the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who I regret has fallen into such an error, must refer to as their guide. It is the only kind that could be obtained to bolster up the contestant, or rather to show that the election shall be sent back to the people.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWN] declares that the sitting member has not proved his case. He was followed in this by the member from Maryland, [Mr. HARRIS,] on the same side. I will not refer to the latter again, further than to remark that the kindness of this House has permitted him to indulge in a course of conduct in this case which a sense of justice to the American people will not again tolerate. Not proved his case indeed! I learn for the first time that the burden of proof is upon an incumbent. He has his certificate of election, a prima facie case, which, until disproved in due form of law, gives him as strong a title to his seat as that of any member upon this floor. The contestant must overcome General Loan's majority of 2,000 votes, and show conclusively that thus many legal and qualified voters, who would have voted for himself, were excluded from their suffrages. Until that is done there is no case; and as it has not been done, I shall vote not only against the man who fails to prove his allegations, but against sending the sitting member back to the people to go through another election.

Mr. Speaker, this is one of the boldest attempts to oust a member from his seat that I ever heard of. Suppose we pass the majority resolution reported by the committee and send this election back, what shall we see? In the counties of the seventh Missouri district many remain who are still rebels and their abettors. Some authority must be invoked, civil or military, to keep these traitors from exercising the right of suffrage accorded to loyal citizens only. The scenes that have been described will be reenacted. If, however, rebels find Congress, with full knowledge of the facts, giving to them such privileges they will take care to nominate a candidate more objectionable to us than the contestant, who, I take pleasure in saying, has borne himself with great decorum throughout this debate, and may succeed in sending here a helpmate to the member from Maryland, [Mr. HARRIS,] who will sympathize with treason and give his voice and votes to embarrass our armies and the cause of the country.

To conclude, sir, it is clearly shown that General Loan is entitled to his seat. He has a certified majority of over 2,000. No one pretends that this majority has been overcome by the proof. The matter has been discussed very thoroughly, and I trust, after hearing the parties to this contest, we shall come to a vote, declare the incumbent to be rightfully the sitting member, and proceed to the more important business of the nation.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to ask at this stage of the discussion what effect the previous question would have?

The SPEAKER. It would cut off all debate except the debate agreed upon in reference to the contestant and the sitting member.

Mr. SMITH. Then I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The SPEAKER. The contestant is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BRUCE (contestant) took the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to make a suggestion to the House in reference to an evening session. I believe it was agreed to discontinue them until to-morrow evening. I am informed it is the pleasure of the House to have a session this evening to close the debate on this question, so that a vote can be taken in the morning. I therefore move that there be an evening session for the discussion of this question, with the understanding that no business is to be done.

Mr. LOAN. I desire to ask the House to allow this debate to go over until to-morrow, so far as I am concerned. I have been so unwell that I have been unable to remain in my seat and listen to what has been said. I do not think it will be possible for me to stand by my desk and say what I desire to say this evening. I ask the House to give me until to-morrow, instead of requiring me to go on to-night.

Mr. PENDLETON. In order to accommodate both the gentlemen, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw my motion.

INHUMANITY TO FEDERAL PRISONERS.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution, and upon it demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That forty thousand extra copies of the report of the joint select committee on the conduct of the war, on the subject of the condition of returned prisoners of war, and their treatment while in the hands of the rebel authorities, be printed for the use of this House; and that the same be bound with the report of the same committee relative to the massacre at Fort Pillow.

Mr. PENDLETON. Will the gentleman withdraw the previous question to allow me to move to reduce the number to ten thousand?

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I cannot.

Mr. PENDLETON. As I yielded the floor to the gentleman to introduce the resolution, I do not think this is a very fair return.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. PENDLETON, (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 10, 1864.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. COWAN presented a petition of agriculturists, miners, and manufacturers of Philadelphia, praying for the enactment of suitable laws for the encouragement of foreign immigration; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

He also presented three memorials of citizens of the boroughs of Glen Rock, Wrightsville, and Sunbury, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the extension of the Goodyear patent for the manufacture of vulcanized India rubber; which were referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of U. H. Peak and others, citizens of Fort Howard, Brown county, Wisconsin, praying for the establishment of a tri-weekly mail route from Fort Howard, at the northern terminus of the Northwestern railroad, to Siles, Wisconsin; which was

Mr. HARLAN presented the petition of H. O. Read, sister and executrix of the late Colonel Fanning, United States Army, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 252) to provide for the adjustment of claims of aliens against the United States since the commencement of the present rebellion, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 279) to facilitate trade on the Red river of the North; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HALE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 270) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish and equalize the grade of line officers of the United States Navy," approved July 16, 1862; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FOSTER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 271) relating to civil actions in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

VETERAN ENGINEERS.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up House bill No. 251, which I think will not occupy much time.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 251) to organize a regiment of veteran volunteer engineers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first section of the bill proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to enlist, out of any volunteer forces in the army of the Cumberland that have served, or are now serving, as pioneers, pontoniers, or engineers, a regiment to serve wherever required for three years, or during the war, to consist of ten companies, and to have the same organization, pay, and emoluments as are allowed to engineer soldiers under the provisions of the fourth section of the act providing for the better organization of the military establishment, approved August 3, 1861.

By the second section, the officers of the engineers thus authorized to be raised are to be appointed and commissioned by the President of the United States, on the recommendation of the commander of the army of the Cumberland, and to receive the same pay and allowances as engineer officers of similar grade in the regular Army.

The third section provides that all persons enlisting under the provisions of the act shall receive the bounties now paid to veteran volunteers, if they enlist within one month after its passage, and they shall be accredited to the subdivision of States in which they originally enlisted.

Mr. WILSON. As the time for paying the bounties mentioned in the third section has expired, I move to amend the bill by striking out that section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill be read a third time; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

PENSION TO WIDOW OF GENERAL WHIPPLE.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate postpone all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of Senate bill No. 2.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, at in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 2) granting a pension to Ellen M. Whipple, widow of the late Major General Amiel W. Whipple, of the United States Army, which had been reported adversely from the Committee on Pensions. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Ellen M. Whipple, widow of the late Major General Amiel W. Whipple, of the United States Army, on the pension roll, at the rate of fifty dollars a month, from the 7th of June, 1862, for and during her widowhood.

Mr. HALE. I will make a statement of the bill, but I do not mean to urge its consideration at this time if it is objected to. This is a bill granting a pension of fifty dollars a month to the widow of the late Major General Amiel W. Whipple, who was killed in the battle of Chancellorsville last year. There is a like bill granting a like pension to the widow of the late Major General Hiram G. Berry, and a like bill granting a like pension to the widow of the late Brigadier General Edward D. Baker, who were killed during this war. With a simple statement in regard to them, I shall move that at an early day the Senate consider the question which these cases present.

Of six general officers killed, three were General Smith, General Stevens, and I think General Kearney, for the benefit of whose widows bills were introduced precisely of this character, granting pensions of fifty dollars per month, and they were passed and became laws. The other three generals killed were General Whipple, General Berry, and General Baker, and a like pension is proposed for the relief of their widows. The Committee on Pensions that reported the bills last year which passed to the statute-book, have reported adversely upon the three bills which I have now mentioned. I do not wish to urge the consideration of the subject now; but as it is an important one, and as I confess it looks to my mind as if the public faith was involved, I will move, if there be no objection, that this bill and the two succeeding bills on the Calendar be made the special order for Monday next at one o'clock.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I made the reports from the committee in these several cases. I shall not oppose the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to have the subject considered; but I think when the Senate comes to look over this subject they will conclude that the question of pensions is so extensive that the Senate will be obliged to proceed on general rules, and to exclude altogether special bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to postpone the further consideration of the bill to, and make it the special order of the day for, Monday next at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

PREVENTION OF SMUGGLING.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 88.

Mr. MORRILL. Allow me to call attention to the fact that Senate bill No. 266 was made the special order for half past twelve o'clock to-day; and it is so near that time that I think it had better come up now. It wants but a single moment or two.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If it is a special order, I give way to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call up at this time by unanimous consent the special order for half past twelve o'clock, the time having nearly arrived. The bill (S. No. 266) to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the bill by striking out in line six of section two the words "Eastport, Maine, four."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. In section one, lines three and four, I move to strike out the words "the 1st day of August, A. D. 1864," and insert the words "passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. In section six, line seven-teen, I move to strike out "five hundred" and insert "one thousand," so as to read, "and shall also pay a fine of not less than $100 and not more than $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

PROCEEDINGS IN CRIMINAL CASES.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, the bill (S. No. 88) regulating proceedings in criminal cases and for other purposes was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suggest that the Clerk read only the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, which is a substitute for the original bill. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] has particular charge of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be pursued if there be no objection. The amendment is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert what will be read.

The Secretary read the words to be inserted, as follows:

That from the persons summoned and accepted as grand jurors in any district or circuit court of the United States, the court shall appoint the foreman, who shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations to witnesses appearing before the grand jury.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That when the offense charged be treason, or a capital offense, the defendant shall be entitled to twenty and the United States to five peremptory challenges. On a trial for any other offense the defendant shall be entitled to ten and the United States to two peremptory challenges. All challenges, whether to the array or panel, or to individual jurors for cause or favor, shall be tried by the court without the aid of triers.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That in every case where any person convicted of any offense against the United States shall be sentenced to imprisonment for a period longer than one year, it shall be lawful for the court by which the sentence is passed to order the same to be executed in any State prison or penitentiary within the district or State where such court is held, the use of which prison or penitentiary is allowed by the Legislature of such State for such purposes; and the expenses attendant upon the execution of such sentence shall be paid by the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That issues of fact in civil cases in any circuit court of the United States may be tried and determined by the court without the intervention of a jury, whenever the parties, or their attorneys of record, file a stipulation in writing with the clerk of the court waiving a jury. The finding of the court upon the facts, which finding may be either general or special, shall have the same effect as the verdict of a jury. The rulings of the court in the progress of the trial, when excepted to at the time, may be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States upon a writ of error, or upon appeal, provided the rulings be duly presented by a bill of exceptions. When the finding is special, the review may also extend to the determination of the sufficiency of the facts found to support the judgment.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect on the 1st day of June, 1864.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Is it in order now to move an amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order either to amend the amendment or the original bill to which it is an amendment.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I wish to propose an amendment in relation to the challenges. In section two of the substitute, line five, I propose to strike out the word "ten" and insert "five." I will read a portion of the second section:

And be it further enacted, That when the offense charged be treason, or a capital offense, the defendant shall be entitled to twenty and the United States to five peremptory challenges.

That applies to treason.

On a trial for any other offense the defendant shall be entitled to ten and the United States to two peremptory challenges.

That is the way it is reported by the committee. It proposes to give a defendant indicted for any of the minor inferior offenses a peremptory challenge of ten jurors, and the United States are limited to two. I think the number allowed to the defendant is entirely too great. Take the case of a man indicted for passing counterfeit money, or anything of that kind, it is entirely too great an advantage to give him ten peremptory challenges. Indeed, I do not know why he should have as many as five.

There is another reason, and that is this: in districts that are agricultural, or where the courts are not located in large cities, it will increase the expense of these district courts, and it is very desirable to limit them, and the Department of the Interior has for years past been endeavoring to limit the expenses of these courts. By giving this peremptory right of challenge to every defendant who is charged with an inferior offense, it will be necessary to keep a much larger number of jurors in attendance, and to be brought from a considerable distance too in agricultural districts.

These are the reasons why I propose to make the change by striking out the word "ten" and inserting the word "five," so that the number of peremptory challenges shall be limited to "five," and even that number I believe to be unnecessary, but I make the proposition as an improvement on that reported by the committee.

Mr. HALE. I think the bill is wrong in this respect. It is a new principle in jury trials to allow arbitrary challenges in minor offenses; at least, so far as my knowledge or practice goes it is entirely new and novel. I think if you give a prisoner an arbitrary challenge of two, the same as the Government has, it would be an abundance; all that justice requires, and more too. I hope the Senator from New Jersey will alter his amendment to "two" instead of "five."

Mr. TEN EYCK. I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire; but inasmuch as I thought several gentlemen on the committee preferred a larger number, and that if I were to adopt the number of five perhaps we should in a measure remove what I suppose to be an evil, and that would be more acceptable to the Senate, I proposed that number. I prefer that it should be limited to two; and would therefore make the motion in that shape.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey modifies his amendment so as to propose to strike out "ten" and insert "two."

Mr. JOHNSON. I think the honorable member from New Jersey misapprehends the effect of the amendment proposed by the committee. The law, as it stands now, gives in cases of treason a right to challenge peremptorily thirty-five. The first part of this amendment of the committee reduces that number to twenty, and it goes further and introduces a right which is not given by any existing law: it gives to the United States a right to challenge in the same way ten. As the law now stands, the United States have no right to challenge peremptorily at all. That part of the committee's amendment which the honorable member from New Jersey proposes to modify, I understand to apply only to cases in which there exists already a right on the part of the accused to a peremptory challenge of twenty, and the object of the committee was to reduce the number from twenty to ten, and to give in that case to the United States a right to challenge two. The two provisions which secure to the United States the right to challenge are altogether new, and it is for the Senate to say whether, as far as those two amendments are concerned, they will sanction them.

I speak from some experience, Mr. President, having acted both as prosecutor and more frequently as counsel for the accused, that frequently gross injustice has been done to the Government by the want of a right of peremptory challenge. The right to challenge for cause it is very often very difficult to make effective. Whether the cause assigned be or be not true in point of fact, in the first place is a matter not easy to ascertain, and whether it be sufficient in point of law is a matter about which differences of opinion have existed.

I agree with the honorable member from New Jersey that if the meaning of that part of the amendment to which his amendment is intended to apply covers cases of misdemeanor or any other cases than those in which a right to challenge exists under the existing law, it would be going too far. But that is not my understanding of the amendment. I suppose it to deal exclusively with cases in which there exists a right to challenge now twenty peremptorily, and that the whole effect of the amendment, therefore, is to reduce the number to ten.

Although it is not in order strictly, with the indulgence of the Chair and the Senate I will very briefly state—not meaning to address the Senate on the subject hereafter—how, in addition to the particulars to which I have just adverted, the bill as reported by the committee changes the existing law.

The want of uniformity which exists in the several courts of the United States in relation to the manner in which witnesses before a grand jury are to be sworn gave rise to the first amendment. There is no statute on the subject. In some circuits and in some districts in cases in which there is a grand jury the witnesses can only be sworn in open court by the judge; in others (existing altogether in practice) they may be sworn by the grand jury. But there being no statute which gives to the foreman of a grand jury expressly the right to swear a witness, it has been doubted whether an oath of that description, if violated, could be punished, because of the want, or the supposed or supposable want, of authority on the part of the foreman to administer the oath. The object of the first amendment, therefore, is to give that right to the foreman, and, of course, to furnish all the security that an oath properly administered can give that the truth will be told by the witness.

The second section is the one of which I have already spoken in part, except in this particular: challenges now for cause, with which the latter part of the amendment deals, are tried by what are called triers. Those triers, if the challenge is to the first of the jury called, are selected from other persons, from members of the bar, or anybody else. If there are a sufficient number of jurors sworn without objection, and a challenge is made to any of the rest of the jurors in succession, the validity of that challenge, both in fact and in law, is to be passed upon by three jurors already sworn. The committee thought—and I know such is the opinion of a good many of the judges of the present day, and was the opinion of many of those who have passed from us—that in all such cases it is much better to leave that question to be passed upon by the court. The committee, therefore, provide that challenges of that description shall be tried by the court without the aid of triers, making the court the judge both of the fact alleged as cause of exception to the juror and of the sufficiency of the cause, if true in point of fact.

The third section corrects a mischief which is found to be rather a mischief in expense than anything else. It provides:

That in every case where any person convicted of any offense against the United States shall be sentenced to imprisonment for a period longer than one year, it shall be lawful for the court by which the sentence is passed to order the same to be executed in any State prison or penitentiary within the district or State where such court is held, the use of which prison or penitentiary is allowed by the Legislature of such State for such purposes; and the expenses attendant upon the execution of such sentence shall be paid by the United States.

To that I suppose there can be no objection.

The fourth section is intended, and I think calculated, while securing justice to the party, to save a good deal of expense in the administration of criminal jurisprudence. The Constitution of the United States secures to a party accused trial by jury. It has always been held that that was a privilege given to the accused, but that he might waive it if he thought proper. The object of the fourth section is to give him the privilege of waiving it. It provides:

That issues of fact in civil cases in any circuit court of the United States may be tried and determined by the court without the intervention of a jury, whenever the parties or their attorneys of record file a stipulation in writing with the clerk of the court waiving a jury.

That is, both parties. We have that provision in Maryland with reference to our State court, and it has been found to act very beneficially. Juries are expensive, and the mode of trial in most cases is very dilatory. In all cases under $100, the cases are tried before our court, unless either party insists upon a jury; and in all other cases, if the parties think proper to waive a trial by jury, the court try them. We apply it to criminal cases, not capital. In all criminal cases, if the party accused thinks proper to waive his right to a trial by jury, he does so and the court try the case. We could not well get along in Maryland with the court system we have there—for we have only one court particularly in the city of Baltimore to administer the whole criminal justice in that city—without a provision of that description; and the committee thought that while it could do no possible harm to anybody, it might expedite the administration of criminal justice on the part of the United States.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I will add but a word to what I have said already. I approve of the general character of the bill; the Senator has explained it very fully and undoubtedly shown the importance of the Senate enacting it; but the amendment which I propose is solely confined to the second section; and if I understand that section aright it includes within its scope the allowance of challenges in all criminal cases triable in the United States courts. The section, in the first part of it, proposes to change the law relating to peremptory challenges in the case of treason and other capital offenses, and to restrict the number; and in the second branch of the section the right to peremptory challenges in all other cases without exception is clearly given as I think. It is very short, and it will be better understood by reading it than in any other way:

And be it further enacted. That when the offense charged be treason or a capital offense, the defendant shall be entitled to twenty and the United States to five peremptory challenges.

That is in the case of a trial for treason or any other capital offense.

On a trial for any other offense, the defendant shall be entitled to ten and the United States to two peremptory challenges.

That includes all other cases. The Senator from Maryland says that he does not propose that the section shall apply to all other cases so as to include all minor offenses, but that it was meant to apply to such other cases than cases of treason and capital offenses, in which there is now existing by law a peremptory right of challenge, and he understands that the second branch of this section is to restrict the number of challenges in those cases. In that view of the case such would be the effect; but I do not understand that to be the effect and scope and meaning of the section. If the object is to limit and restrict the number of peremptory challenges in cases other than capital offenses and felonies, and there are peremptory challenges in such cases to a larger number than is thought proper, we can by an additional amendment correct that and lessen the number of challenges in those cases, as well as in all other cases, and I suggest that the amendment would have that effect if it read in this way:

On a trial for any other offense, where by existing laws peremptory challenges are now allowed, and in all other cases—

Mr. JOHNSON. Strike out "in all other cases." If the honorable member will permit me a moment, I will state that the statute of 1790 gives in cases of treason a right to challenge peremptorily thirty-five, and it goes on: "And if any person or persons be indicted for any other of the offenses hereinbefore set forth," which does not include misdemeanors, he has the right to challenge peremptorily twenty, and I am sure the meaning of the committee was merely to reduce the number which, under the law as it now stands, a party would have a right to challenge both with reference to offenses other than treason as well as in cases of treason. I would propose, therefore, to amend it, with the permission of the Senator, by inserting after the words "other offense," in the fourth line of the second section, the words "in which a right of peremptory challenge now exists," and then we can settle the number afterwards. I move this before the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is acted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey may modify his amendment.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I will agree to that.

Mr. JOHNSON. With the permission of the Senator and the consent of the Chair, I move to amend by inserting after the word "offense," in the fourth line of the second section, these words: "in which a right of peremptory challenge now exists." As far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, to insert "five" instead of "ten."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey so modify his amendment?

Mr. TEN EYCK. Yes, sir. I believe there is no objection now to fixing the number at five.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment, as modified, will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

On a trial for any other offense, in which the right of peremptory challenge now exists, the defendant shall be entitled to five and the United States to two peremptory challenges.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not think there is very much importance in it. I think it is just as well to leave it at ten; and I see no reason for limiting it to cases where challenges are now allowed. The practice in my State is, in all criminal cases where a defendant is upon trial, to allow him a certain number of peremptory challenges. Whether it should be ten or two is a matter of some importance perhaps to the defendant. If he has ten, there is no difficulty in getting a jury. I feel disposed to be liberal myself in that respect.

Mr. TEN EYCK. It increases the expense.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It does not increase the expense a dollar in my State according to our practice, for we have two panels of jurors present, and a challenge of ten leaves enough for a jury, and they are the same expense whether they are sitting in the jury-box or waiting to be impaneled. It makes no difference to us, and I cannot see how it could increase the expense anywhere. I do not think there is importance in it, but I do not see why you should deny a peremptory challenge in any case. Why deny it in one criminal case, although the punishment may be simply imprisonment in the penitentiary, and it is not a capital offense? Why not allow it? I think there is a propriety in allowing a man a peremptory challenge. There may be prejudice in the mind of a person summoned as a juror that would not disqualify him from sitting, so that he could not be challenged for cause; and yet the party on trial may know that there is existing a feeling that would not permit the juror to give him a fair trial. I would be liberal in the matter, and I should prefer that it stood as the committee reported it.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say a few words on this bill—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must interrupt the Senator and call up the special order.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to that.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 395) to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. COLLAMER, to insert after the word "deposits," in the ninth line of the thirty-first section, the following words:

And one fourth of the coin received by each association from the Treasury for interest on its bonds, shall by such association be kept, held, and sequestered as a part of the amount of money required so to be kept on hand, until the full amount is composed of coin, which shall so remain until specie payments shall be resumed.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to say a very few words in closing the debate on this amendment. If I understand aright the argument of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN], it is that inasmuch as the individuals who now hold these bonds are entitled to have the interest upon them and use it as they please, therefore the same right ought to exist in relation to the banks when they own the bonds. It is true that a man owning United States bonds is entitled to receive his six per cent. on his bonds, and it is his property. It is also true, as I before remarked, that the bonds themselves are property for many purposes. They are choses in action against the Government, and they are the means by which a man may borrow money. He can borrow money pledging the bonds, they being security for the loan. But when we undertake to make them into bank capital, and authorize the associations to issue currency upon the strength of them, and bank upon them, that is entirely a new privilege. That is the privilege of loaning money on them, not borrowing money on them; and for that new privilege of using these bonds as a banking capital, the Government has a right of course to annex to the grant of that new privilege such conditions as it may think proper, and it has annexed a great many conditions in this bill. The idea that the banks have a right to this money received as interest, and to keep it as their own peculiar property, because they own the bonds, when if they did nothing else but own the bonds they could have the money and keep it, is certainly inapplicable to this case, and it is no answer to my proposition.

But, Mr. President, I observe that in the speech of Mr. HOOPER, of the other House, who has been, I believe, the principal engineer of this bill, the main friend and advocate and supporter of it, he says that these banks are an instrumentality, and perhaps an absolutely necessary instrumentality, to enable the Government to return to specie payments. He hardly can perceive how without some such agency the Government itself could ever return to a specie currency. He attempts to answer the question which he says is frequently put to him, why it is that you should have these banks made to issue paper instead of having the Treasury issue its own notes. The case is put thus: "You merely hire the banks, by paying interest on your bonds, to issue a paper currency;" and the question is put, "Why do that when you can issue your own currency and pay no interest for it?" Among the various answers which he makes or attempts to make to that natural inquiry, is this one:

"The restoration of the currency and the resumption of specie payments does not seem to me so far off as others appear to think it; and believing that the resumption of specie payments is desirable and not impossible within no very distant period, it seems to me it may be necessary, when that time comes, to withdraw the Government notes from circulation, so that specie may again be the only 'lawful money' of the country.

"I see no way in which Government notes could be redeemed in specie; and I fear that any other legal tender than coin could not well exist with specie payments. Therefore, to confine the right of issuing paper for currency to the Treasury Department would seem to be a permanent arrangement for an irredeemable currency. When the act was passed authorizing the issue of the legal-tender notes, no one advocated it as a permanent measure, but only as a temporary expedient to meet the emergency that existed after the banks had suspended specie payments at the close of the year 1861."

You will observe, Mr. President, the theory is that these agencies are necessary to be put in operation as a means of ultimately enabling the Government to return to specie payments. If that be true, if these very banks are to be the essential instruments in the hands of the Government, the machinery for enabling it to return to specie payments, does it not at once occur to the mind that they cannot do it unless they have some specie to do it with, unless they have something to begin with? I fancy that it will be found exceedingly difficult for any man to imagine how that instrumentality can be used unless by enabling them to have some specie to begin it with. My proposition, as now amended, is nothing more than that of the gold which they receive from the Government they shall be required to keep one fourth of it, as they receive it from time to time, toward their surplus fund, which they are required by the bill to keep always on hand. In that way, in the course of some sixteen years, they would get in coin the whole of their reserve fund.

I do not know but that the anticipations of men of an immediate return to specie payments may be true; but I do know that the Bank of England did not return to specie payments till nine or ten years after the close of the war because of which specie payments were suspended.

Mr. SHERMAN. Specie payments were resumed on the 1st of January, 1823.

Mr. COLLAMER. And the war closed in 1815, so that it was eight years before they returned to specie payments with all their ability and strength. It seems to me a plain matter of common prudence to have these banks make their reserve fund gradually out of this coin, a fund which they must keep and keep without using. The Senator from Ohio says they may use this reserve fund. How? Can they redeem their currency that they put out, with it? No, not according to the provisions of the bill, for the bill says that they shall at all times have the reserve fund on hand. Of course if they must keep it on hand at all times they cannot use it for their redemptions. If the reserve fund consists of Treasury notes, greenbacks, the effect of my proposition will be that just as much gold as they put into the reserve fund will relieve a similar amount of greenbacks, and enable them to redeem their currency with them. I think it is doing them no hurt, and is a preparation for doing a little good. I ask for the yeas and nays on the proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cardile, Collamer, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Henderson, Johnson, Nesmith, Powell, Saulsbury, Trumbull, and Wiley—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Conness, Hale, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomerooy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Cowan,

Fessenden, Harding, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, McDougall, Morrill, Richardson, Riddle, and Wright—14.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have another amendment which I wish to propose as an additional section:

And he it further enacted, That the amount of Treasury notes in any form now authorized to be issued shall not be increased, and that such amount shall be diminished to the same amount that bills of national currency are issued to associations.

The Secretary of the Treasury in his last report gave us pretty distinctly to understand that he thought the full amount of Treasury notes had then been issued that should be issued. I repeat that as I understand the report made to us last December by the Secretary, in his opinion the amount of Treasury notes or currency which had been issued was all that ought to be issued. It would naturally occur to the mind, how came there any more to be issued? I am sensible that in many parts of the country, and especially in New York, the papers constantly represent that the Secretary of the Treasury has put a large amount of greenbacks into circulation this winter and has also issued and put into circulation a large amount of the five per cent. legal-tender notes with a view and intent to so reduce the price of the currency that people would be willing to fund it in his ten-forty five per cent. bonds, and much complaint has been made about it. I think it no more than justice when a question of this kind comes up that the truth should be told about it. The fact is, as I understand, that the Secretary of the Treasury from last December forward had no desire to issue any more Treasury notes, nor has he of his own accord done it for any amount; but Congress voted, for instance, to pay bounties to a very large amount—I merely mention that as sufficient to cover it—which constrained and compelled him to issue them, not of his own accord, not of his fault, and for no such purpose and with no such motive as I see frequently charged upon him in the papers.

Sir, necessity has compelled the issue; and it is not to be disguised that that issue has inflated the currency, and thus caused depreciation. There is no doubt about it. Every man knows it. The difficulty is a great deal aggravated by the impression upon the community that we know not where this is to stop; we know not whether there is ever to be any end to it. That is the condition in which we are, and it is desired, if it be possible, to reduce that circulation, not to increase it. There are but two ways in which currency of this kind when enlarged and too much inflated can be taken up: one way is by taxes; the other way is by funding, loaning it to the people, saying to them, if you will take up some of these notes, say $100 or $1,000, and return them to the Treasury, we will give you a Government note running for twenty years or forty years on interest, and pay the interest in gold. There are but these two ways of getting up your paper.

I do not propose to enter into a large discussion of the manner in which these two modes should be exercised. In taking them up by taxes there is one of those applications of the doctrine of compensation that comes in question; and that is, the more you issue and the more they depreciate the easier it is to pay taxes with them. I do not know of any other blessing or good that can come out of that to anybody. The tax-payer will pay his taxes easier when they are made very plenty and are much depreciated. As to funding, we had a pretty good experience about that. So long as we gave out bonds at six per cent. they were funded fast enough. They are funding very considerably now at five per cent.; but that is because of the increased issue and the increased depreciation. The fact is, the Government gain very little or nothing in that one per cent. If you depreciate your currency so that, if you please, you can fund it at four per cent., you will have to give a great deal more for your supplies for the Government and for the Army, and for everything else, and what we shall gain in the per cent. of the funding we lose ten times over in the price.

I desire in some way, if we can, to do a little to relieve the public mind and public apprehension on the subject of the amount of these issues. If the issues are to go on as large from the Government and continue to increase, and these banks put theirs out too, certain it is that will not allay the public apprehensions in the least. If I had my own way about it to do what I believed would be best, I would this day pass a distinct resolution, or incorporate it in this bill, that there should be no more issued beyond what is now out. That would settle the difficulty in the public mind in a great degree. But, sir, I despair of being enabled to do that, and therefore I wish now to do another thing, which, I believe, would be exceedingly acceptable to the Treasury and be of some relief to the people. I wish to say to the community there shall not be any more issued than is now authorized by law to be issued. I cannot tell exactly what the limit of that authority is; perhaps the Senator from Ohio can tell.

Mr. SHERMAN. Nine hundred million dollars. In a certain contingency he was authorized to issue $400,000,000 of that amount in five per cent. legal-tender notes. The Senator will admit with me it is but just to say that the Secretary of the Treasury has always opposed and resisted the issuing of any of these notes until he was compelled to do so by the legislation of Congress.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have said that as strongly as I could.

Mr. SHERMAN. But power was given him by Congress to issue a very large sum; I think about nine hundred million dollars.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have said as plainly as I could say, if gentlemen think that coming from me it is of any sort of use, that this great issue of Treasury notes is not agreeable to the Secretary's views, but entirely otherwise. We have forced him to issue them. We said, for instance, that those bounties to volunteers should be paid, and he had to pay them. The Secretary told us last December pretty plainly that in his opinion all were out that ought to be, the limit had been reached, and depreciation would follow any further increase. I wish it to be distinctly understood that since that time we have passed laws requiring those bounties to be paid to the amount of I do not know how many millions.

Mr. SHERMAN. One hundred and ten million dollars.

Mr. COLLAMER. More than one hundred million dollars, and he had no mode of paying it but to issue Treasury notes. We compelled him to issue them.

Mr. GRIMES. With his assent.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not know how much assent he gave to it; but certain it is, it was not his voluntary act. Therefore, it is not true, as I have before said, that he issued that currency in order to enable him to float five per cent. bonds. It is due to him to say that this very imperative course of ours compelled him to make this large issue; but I believe he has not issued a dollar but what he was obliged to issue in payment of debts. He has issued these notes; but what is the effect? Precisely what he told us it would be last December. I blame nobody about it. The necessities of the case occasioned it. We could not help it.

The issuing of these notes has increased the currency so that there has been depreciation, as I before remarked. If we could take it upon us to say that there should be no greater amount issued than is now issued, that the Secretary might re-issue it as it comes in, but should not increase the volume beyond what it now is, I should be very glad of it, and I believe it would be of great public good; but despairing of being able to do that, I have presented my amendment simply to provide that the amount now authorized by law to be issued shall not be increased. I do not say "the amount which has been issued;" I suppose I could not get that; but I say that the amount now authorized to be issued shall not be increased.

There is one other thing contained in my amendment which I think will be worth something to the community if they pay attention to it, as moneyed men always will, and it is this: suppose, for instance, the present amount authorized to be issued consists of several million more than has now been issued; I say that that shall not be increased. Then I propose further to add that as much of this national bank paper, which is to be issued from the Treasury to the associations for them to circulate, as is delivered out from the Treasury to these associations, by that amount the gross amount of Treasury notes authorized to be issued shall be diminished. For instance, suppose that $12,000,000 are authorized to be issued in all, and $6,000,000 have already been issued. Then my amendment would provide that there shall not be issued any more than the $12,000,000, and that that $12,000,000 shall be reduced by the amount of paper which is delivered out by the Treasury to these banks for them to issue; that it shall not be duplicated and be in both forms at the same time. That is the substance of my amendment. I think its adoption will be worth something. I think it will tend, in some degree, to give the public to understand that there is some limit to this thing beyond which it will not go.

Mr. SHERMAN. As the proposition of the Senator from Vermont is a very important one, I think I can state very briefly some reasons why it ought not to be adopted. I will ask the Secretary to read the first clause of the amendment.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the amount of Treasury notes in any form now authorized to be issued shall not be increased.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is sufficient. It provides that the amount of Treasury notes now authorized shall not be increased. The first reply is, that the amount cannot be increased without an act of Congress. It is proposed now to say that the amount now authorized by law shall not be increased. What is the use of passing this negative proposition when no increase can be made except by an act of Congress? It amounts simply to this: that we will now say that we will not in any future time pass an act of Congress increasing the amount of the Treasury notes. That is the position we are asked to assume. I am opposed to an increase of any more Treasury notes, and I have always resisted the large amount already granted; but I ask if the proposition of the Senator is anything more than a simple promise by Congress that they will not authorize the increase of any more Treasury notes? How can we tell? It is a simple declaration. It has not the force of law. It does not bind us at the next session, and it does not bind the next Congress. It is a simple declaration of opinion; and that is proposed to be put on the bank bill. It seems to me that is a sufficient objection to the amendment.

But that is not all. By the present law, and the Senator is probably aware of that, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue $400,000,000 of five per cent. legal-tender Treasury notes, of which he has issued only $200,000,000. He may go on and issue $200,000,000 more, and this amendment would not restrain him from issuing them; it would not limit the operation of the existing law. It is only a kind of indirect promise that Congress will not pass any more such acts. In the first place, it is idle to make such a promise, because at the next session we may change our minds.

But, sir, in addition to that, we know that the Secretary of the Treasury has resisted the issuing of these Treasury notes. He stated in his report in December last that he thought the maximum of legal tenders had been reached, and he said he would not, unless compelled to do so by the necessities of the country, issue any more, although he was authorized by law to issue them. But when the bounty system was established he was compelled to do it. He resisted in the first instance. He wrote a letter here and resisted it; but it was finally adjudged by Congress that the public faith was pledged to the payment of those bounties; that we could not avoid making provision for their payment. The Secretary of War, it is true, estimated the amount only at $20,000,000; but we all knew that that was an erroneous estimate, and Congress, yielding to the pressure of popular opinion in all the States and among the people to pay to the soldiers large bounties, finally authorized by law the payment of those large bounties. What could the Secretary do? He had resisted it. He had said that more Treasury notes ought not to be issued. He said, in fact, that he would not be compelled to issue any more Treasury notes, but Congress did compel him to do it. Congress adopted and sanctioned the position taken by the Secretary of War, and passed a law authorizing the continuance of those bounties, and required the Secretary of the Treasury to pay them.

Mr. COWAN. He indorsed it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know he indorsed it finally on compulsion, just as we did. He finally yielded an assent to it; and he did wrong, in my judgment, and I think we all did wrong, in finally yielding to it. I believe that at the very time this Senate agreed to that enactment not one third of the Senators approved it; and yet we yielded to it because by the act of the Administration pledges had been made, men had been induced to enlist, the money had been promised, and there was no way to pay that money except by issuing Treasury notes. At that time the Secretary was borrowing money at the rate of about two million dollars a day, which was absorbed in the current expenses of the country, and there was no way to meet this additional payment except by issuing these notes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Those bounties ought to have been paid.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think they ought not to have been paid. The act of the Administration in October last in promising these bounties was not sanctioned by law, and we, at the beginning of the session, ought to have put a stop to it; but it was deemed hard upon the soldiers who had enlisted, hard upon the Governors who had issued proclamations, and hard upon the people who had been promised large bounties, and we were compelled by a sort of duress to yield, and the Secretary of the Treasury was compelled to issue this additional amount of Treasury notes.

But he has resisted (and the Senator from Vermont properly gives him credit for it) every issue of these Treasury notes, and he will not now issue one dollar more if he can help it. As he has recently told us in a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Finance, he is now reducing these Treasury notes. When the interest-bearing legal tenders are paid into the Treasury in the ordinary course of the collection of taxes, they are not reissued, but are canceled; and his desire is to keep down the issue. Everybody knows that the large amount of Treasury notes now in the market inflating the currency of the country tends to derange prices; the inevitable effect is to tend to derange prices. He, having the charge of the Treasury Department, naturally desires to retire this money, and the purpose of passing this bill is to furnish a kind of money which somebody will be compelled to redeem. The peculiarity of our Treasury notes is that those that are on time nobody is bound to redeem until they are due. There is no way to redeem the greenbacks except by funding. But by the issue of national currency you provide somebody, private individuals and private banks, whose duty it is to redeem these bills at various places. I say, therefore, in regard to the first portion of the amendment, that it is simply an idle promise which it is scarcely worth while for us to make. I will ask the Secretary to read the second clause of the amendment:

The Secretary read it, as follows:

And that such amount shall be diminished to the same amount that bills of national currency are issued to associations.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt that the amount of outstanding currency will be reduced even more rapidly—and that is the desire of the Secretary—than the channels of circulation are filled by these new bank bills. But I ask whether it is reasonable or proper to make a requirement of this kind, which may create embarrassment. How can they tell? To-day, under the law, they may issue to a banking association $100,000 of this new paper money. Would you require on that same day the same amount of greenbacks to be retired?

Mr. COLLAMER. The Senator misunderstands the amendment. It is not that there shall be the same amount of circulation taken out. It is that that shall be deducted from the amount which they are authorized by law to issue, and not from that which they have issued. Suppose, for instance, that the Secretary is authorized to issue $12,000,000 of Treasury notes, and he has issued half of it. Now, under my proposition, the paper given to these banks for circulation is to be taken out of the $12,000,000 which is authorized to be issued, but which has not been issued.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is even more ineffective than the other proposition, for the Secretary is authorized to issue $200,000,000 now by law, which he has not issued, and which he will not issue unless he is compelled to issue it. Now you require him to open a book in which he is to put down that $200,000,000, and whenever any notes are issued to a national bank you require him to offset that amount.

Mr. COLLAMER. How much is he authorized to issue beyond the amount already issued?

Mr. SHERMAN. Two hundred million dollars, in round numbers. The law which I have before me, the loan act of 1863, authorized him to issue $400,000,000 of legal-tender interest-bearing Treasury notes. He has issued about two hundred millions—not quite that amount. He has the power to issue $200,000,000 more.

Mr. COLLAMER. He is authorized to issue Treasury notes.

Mr. SHERMAN. These are the only Treasury notes he is authorized by law to issue which have not been issued. All the reserves, I believe, have been reached, except these $200,000,000. When we know that these Treasury notes will not be issued, unless there is some great public exigency to require it, or Congress by some new legislation should require it, what is the use of requiring him to keep this account between the amount he is now authorized to issue and what he has issued under this act? It seems to me the amendment is totally ineffective, and will only create embarrassment without doing any good whatever.

I desire to accomplish the object of the Senator from Vermont; and that is, to reduce our inflated paper money. From the beginning of the war I have done all I could to restrain the issue of this paper money as much as any one, and have opposed it so far as I could. I know very well, however, that the exigencies of the war compelled us to issue it; but every time we have been compelled to increase the amount I have resisted it as much as any Senator on this floor. I desire yet to resist it; but we are compelled by the pressure of the war from time to time to issue paper money when we have not got anything else to pay with. If, therefore, the Senator really desires to make the point before the Senate that no more Treasury notes shall be issued, why not introduce a bill to repeal the act I have now before me, which would take away from the Secretary of the Treasury the power to issue any more paper money? If such a proposition were made in the proper place and in proper form we might discuss it, although I think it would be wiser to leave the power discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury, especially when we know that he will never exercise that power unless compelled to do so by the force of circumstances. This amendment is not appropriate to a bank bill. One half of it, perhaps, might be appropriate to a bank bill, but on the whole it amounts to nothing. I think, however, if adopted at all, it would come in much better in another place; but, in my opinion, it would be totally ineffective; it would be idle, and give trouble and embarrassment without doing any good. That is the impression it has made on my mind.

Mr. COLLAMER. The gentleman, in speaking of the first clause of my amendment, does not put the estimate that I do upon it. He agrees with me that prices are much disturbed, and that the amount of circulation is too large, if we could have our way about it. Certainly, it has been enlarged by all that has been issued since last December. I am perfectly sensible that the first clause of the amendment, providing that the amount now authorized to be issued shall not be increased, can be repealed. I presume the gentleman did not suppose I thought otherwise. I am sensible that it is within the power of Congress to repeal the laws that we pass. But, sir, I said before, and now say again, that if we will say to the community in a law passed by the two Houses of Congress that there shall not be any greater issue of paper money, I believe it will quiet the public mind. If we say to them that the amount now authorized to be issued, which is $200,000,000 more than there is out now, shall not be exceeded, I think that would in itself have an excellent healing effect. Even though they knew as well as we do that Congress might repeal it, yet they would believe that there must be some imperative necessity existing which would cause its repeal. I am therefore desirous that that should be inserted in the bill. The answer which the gentleman makes, that it could be repealed, to me is no answer at all. It was not a matter out of my mind that it could be repealed; nor did I suppose it would be out of any Senator's mind.

In the next place, as to the second clause of the amendment, how much paper money the Secretary will have occasion to issue to these banks for circulation, and how soon, I do not know; but this I know: the limitation inserted in the bill is that it shall not exceed $300,000,000, and I know there are not $100,000,000 yet called for; and I believe not more than half of it. Therefore there will be no occasion for him to be distressed about keeping his accounts. The whole account to be kept under this amendment would be the simplest thing in the world. He is authorized to issue such an amount clearly and plainly by the law. He has already issued such an amount, which is all kept an account of. What is sent out to these associations is recorded in the Treasury. He knows exactly what is sent out. Therefore he says, "If I have issued to them $1,000,000 of circulation the amount I am authorized to issue in greenbacks is $1,000,000 less." That is all there is of it. There is no embarrassment about it. It is perfectly simple and perfectly easy.

Mr. President, I do not like to have the conclusion drawn which will probably be drawn from the record we have made by the vote on the last amendment. It will be understood that we do not want any gold in these banks at all. We voted against their keeping any. In the next place, if this amendment is rejected, it will be understood that we do not want to have the people understand that there is not to be a bottomless pit of this issue. We do not want to give any intimation to the community that there is to be some limit somewhere to the amount of paper issues. I think we had better not do that. I think we had better adopt this amendment. I think it will have some healing effect. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 14, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Hale, Henderson, Johnson, Powell, Richardson, Trumbull, and Willey—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Fessenden, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Carlile, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, and Wright.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have one more amendment to offer. I believe it to be the general impression that the amount of the capital of these banks is not to exceed $300,000,000; but there is no such limitation as that contained in the bill. Indeed, there is not any limitation in it, unless it may be found in this: the bill contains a provision that one third of the capital of all the banks organized under it shall be United States stocks, and it provides that the amount of money, that is, bills, which may be delivered to them for issue shall not exceed $300,000,000. But that is no limitation upon the amount for which banks may be organized. Banks may be organized under this bill at any rate to three times the amount of money that is issued. One third of their capital is required to be in the bonds of the United States on which they procure these notes. Then with $300,000,000 which they can receive in paper they could make on that limitation $2,100,000,000 of bank capital under this bill as it stands now. Even if they take their bonds to the Treasury and take up the currency for their bonds to the amount that is authorized to be given them, $300,000,000, they still could have a banking capital three times that amount, at least, because they are not required to take a third of their capital in bonds at all. Therefore you may say in effect there is no limitation to it. I desire to limit the amount of capital in the banks that may be organized under this bill, and for that purpose I move to amend the bill in section twenty-two, line two, after the word "issued," by inserting the words "or the amount of capital stock of the associations organized;" so that it will read:

That the entire amount of notes for circulation to be issued or the amount of capital stock of the associations organized under this act shall not exceed $300,000,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to know what difference it makes whether the banks have $300, 000,000 or $3,000,000,000. They cannot issue any bills on them. It is the circulating medium that we wish to limit. If they had $3,000,000,000 in our bonds and used them for banking capital, I should think we should be the gainers by it.

Mr. COLLAMER. I think otherwise.

Mr. CHANDLER. I can see no occasion for that limitation, and I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER, (to Mr. SHERMAN.) Have you any objection to it?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to the Senator from Michigan that I have not the slightest objection to this amendment, for this reason: the only object of organizing a corporation under this law except in the large cities would be to obtain the circulation, and therefore the limitation on the circulation is substantially a limitation on the capital. I look upon them as equivalent. But to meet the point made by the Senator, I have no objection to limiting it to $300,000,000. I do not think that sum will be exceeded.

Mr. CHANDLER. Neither do I; but it looks to me like a useless and needless limitation.

The amendment was agreed to—yeas nineteen, noes not counted.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I move to insert in the twenty-seventh line of the thirty-first section, after the word "Albany" the word "Leavenworth." There is no point west of the Missouri river and east of the Rocky mountains named, and I am very desirous to have such a point named in the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not intend to resist this amendment except to give fair notice to the Senator from Kansas that in my opinion he is mistaken if he thinks it will be a privilege prized by the banks in Leavenworth to redeem in the city of New York at one fifth of one per cent. premium. That will be the effect of his amendment, while if Leavenworth is left out of this section they will be required to redeem at St. Louis at par. I wish him to understand simply the fact. If he is willing to take it, very well.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. We want some point where we can get drafts on New York. Our business is with New York. Leavenworth is a center of trade as much as New York is. The business of New Mexico, the business of Colorado is done there, and I want our people to have the power of getting eastern exchange. I hope the Senate will grant it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish now to call up the amendment I offered yesterday, in order to have it disposed of. The amendment lies on our table and is printed. I wish to modify it by striking out "one fifth" and inserting "one quarter."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read as modified.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Strike out from lines one, two, three, four, and five, of section thirty-two, the following words: "That each association shall select, subject to the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, an association in either of the cities named in the preceding section at which it will redeem its circulating notes at par," and insert in lieu thereof:

That each association organized in any of the cities named in the foregoing section shall select, subject to the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, an association in the city of New York at which it will redeem its circulating notes, at a rate of exchange for all cities west of the Alleghany mountains not exceeding one quarter of one per cent, and for all cities east of the Alleghany mountains at par. And each of such associations may keep three fifths of its lawful money reserve in cash deposits in the city of New York. And each association not organized within the cities named in the preceding section shall select, subject to the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, an association in either of the cities named in the preceding section at which it will redeem its circulating notes at par.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If that amendment is to be considered as adhered to, I shall wish to strike out the city of Portland, which is named as one of the points of redemption in the preceding section. I move, therefore, to strike out "Portland, Maine," from the list of places of redemption in the thirty-first section. It cannot be very advantageous to them to redeem in New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves to amend the bill in section thirty-one, line twenty-seven, after the word "Boston," by striking out "Portland, Maine."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to move an amendment, that "Providence, Rhode Island," may be inserted in the twenty-eighth line of the thirty-first section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. In section ten of this bill I notice provisions for the election of directors, but I find no provision in it which is in almost all bills regulating banks in the States, that in case the directors fail to fix a meeting for that purpose the stockholders may. There are cases that the committee can imagine certainly where the directors may be obnoxious to the stockholders, and yet by obtaining possession of the original organization of these banks they may, under this provision, continue. I would therefore submit to the consideration of the committee the propriety of inserting this proviso at the end of section ten:

Provided, That if the directors fail to fix the day as aforesaid, the shareholders representing two thirds of the shares may.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit to the Senator that that is already provided for. In lines thirteen, fourteen, fifteen, sixteen, and seventeen, are these words: "If from any cause an election of directors shall not be made at the time appointed," in the law, which is the first Monday of January, in case no other time is specified, "the association shall not for that cause be dissolved, but an election may be held on any subsequent day, thirty days' notice thereof in all cases having been given in a newspaper published in the city, town, or county in which the association is located." I think that covers the case.

Mr. SPRAGUE. But the directors are to appoint the meeting; suppose they fail to do so.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the case is not provided for, I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. SPRAGUE. It is not provided for as I understand.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. In section nineteen of this bill, which provides for the transfer of bonds by the banking associations to the Treasurer, there is no provision made that the associations are to receive anything for the bonds they transfer. In our economical, frugal business transactions, securities are very seldom transferred to any party, the Treasurer of the United States or any other party, unless the bank or its officers have something to show on paper for the transaction. I submit an amendment in section nineteen after the word "association" in line twelve, to insert "a receipt therefor to be given to said association."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POWELL. I move to amend the twenty-first section by inserting after the word "value" in the seventh line the words "in gold or silver coin." And also in the tenth line after the word "thereof" "in gold or silver coin;" so as to make the section read:

That upon the transfer and delivery of bonds to the Treasurer, as provided in the foregoing section, the association making the same shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes of different denominations, in blank, registered and countersigned as hereinafter provided, equal in amount to ninety per cent. of the current market value in gold or silver coin of the United States bonds so transferred and delivered, but not exceeding ninety per cent. of the amount of said bonds at the par value thereof, in gold or silver coin, if bearing interest at a rate not less than five per cent. per annum.

The object of the amendment that I propose is to lessen the issues of these banks and to secure the bill-holders. Under this section of the bill if any association deposit bonds of the United States required by the act with the Comptroller of the Currency, he is required to issue to them bank bills of various denominations to the amount of ninety per cent. of the par value of those bonds. The par value of the bonds, according to the meaning of the section as it now stands, is their value in greenbacks, "lawful money of the United States," as it is called. I desire that they shall not issue more than ninety per cent. of the value of the bonds in gold and silver coin; that is, that the value of the bonds shall be measured by gold and silver coin instead of by the greenbacks.

There is another section of this bill that requires each one of these banking associations to keep twenty-five per cent. of their issues on hand in "lawful money of the United States," that is, greenback money. When they retain that amount of money, there is no sufficient security for the bill-holder for this reason: the bond is now at about forty-five per cent. discount. Take, then, the twenty-five per cent. of greenbacks required to be kept on hand, and the ten per cent. value of the bond in excess of the issues of the bank, and it would make thirty-five per cent. You will observe at once that the bill-holder is not sufficiently protected or secured. The whole value of the bond and the value of the per cent. in greenbacks required to be kept on hand would not redeem the notes issued in coin or in its equivalent. It is certainly manifestly unjust to the bill-holder to allow any system of banking that would not require the bank to keep values for the purpose of redemption at least equal to the issues. That this bill does not do. But if you require them to issue within ninety per cent. of the value of the bond, when measured by the gold standard, the bond will always be sufficient to meet the bills that are issued. It is not my purpose to make any long speech on the subject, but if you desire the bill-holders to be protected by this banking law, you must adopt such an amendment. The object is to restrict the issues to a point that will protect the bill-holders. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 11, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckle, Carle, Cowan, Davis, Henderson, Lane of Kansas, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Trumbull—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Grimes, Hale, Howe, Morgan, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Comess, Foster, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wright.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. POWELL. In the thirty-first section, third line, I move to strike out the words "lawful money of the United States" and insert "gold or silver coin;" so that the clause will read:

That every association in the cities hereafter named shall, at all times, have on hand, in gold or silver coin, an amount equal to at least twenty-five per cent. of the aggregate amount of its notes in circulation and its deposits, &c.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. POWELL. I move, in the sixth and seventh lines of the same section, to strike out the words "lawful money of the United States" and insert "gold or silver coin."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. POWELL. In the forty-first section, line twenty-one, I move to strike out the words "in lieu of all other taxes."

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit that is not in order. This is an amendment to an amendment already amended and adopted; it is an amendment of the committee already adopted, and it is not now amendable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio is right. The amendment is not in order, that amendment having been adopted in those words. The proper time would have been to move to amend it before the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. COWAN. I move to amend the bill in the fiftieth section in the eighth line after the word "collect," by inserting:

An amount from each shareholder equal to the amount of stock held by such stockholder in such association, and.

So that the clause will read:

That on becoming satisfied, as specified in this act, that any association has refused to pay its circulating notes as therein mentioned, and is in default, the Comptroller of the Currency may forthwith appoint a receiver, and require of him such bond and security as he shall deem proper, who, under the direction of the Comptroller, shall take possession of the books, records, and assets of every description of such association, collect an amount from each shareholder equal to the amount of stock held by such stockholder in such association, and all debts, dues, and claims belonging to such association, &c.

I will merely remark that this is to add a still further security to the remedial provisions of the bill. It is provided in the twelfth section that

The shareholders of each association formed under the provisions of this act, and of each existing bank or banking association that may accept the provisions of this act, shall be held individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all contracts, debts, and engagements of such association to the extent of the amount of their stock therein at the par value thereof, in addition to the amount invested in such shares.

From that it will appear that each shareholder is liable not only for the amount of stock which he has invested in the association, but in case of its failure or insolvency he is liable for an amount equal to that stock, over and above the original investment; but there is no adequate provision in my opinion by which that liability could be available as assets in case the association became insolvent; and in order to remedy that, I propose to insert that the receiver who shall be appointed by the Comptroller when the bank fails, among other things shall be authorized to collect from each shareholder an amount equal to the stock held by him in the association, and that that amount when so collected shall go into and become part of the assets of the association for the payment of its creditors. I think there can be no objection to that. It furnishes a remedy which perhaps the creditor would not otherwise have.

Mr. SHERMAN. The language of the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania does not conform to the exceptions made in the bill as to individual liability; but I submit to him an amendment which I think will accomplish his object, and I desire to see it accomplished. If what I have drawn up is satisfactory to him, I hope he will accept it as a substitute for his amendment. There are exceptions and qualifications of the individual liability in section twelve, which would not be covered by his amendment. I move this amendment to come in at line thirteen, section fifty, after the word "direct:"

And may, if necessary to pay the debts of such association, enforce the individual liability of the stockholder provided for by the twelfth section of this act.

Mr. COWAN. I am fearful that will not accomplish what I design, because it leaves the difficulty precisely where we find it, and that is as to how shall this individual liability be enforced.

Mr. SHERMAN. By suit.

Mr. COWAN. If by suit, what shall be recovered? It will be observed that the shareholder is bound to pay to the amount of the stock he has subscribed, in addition to that stock, but equally and ratably, and not one for another. He is not surety for his fellows; he is only to pay his share of the loss. Unless the receiver shall have authority to collect this, it will be almost utterly impossible for the creditors of the association to achieve anything out of that remedy, and I desire by my amendment to give the receiver authority to collect upon the individual responsibility obligation of the shareholder at the same time that he commences to collect the other part of the assets of the bank, and in that way he will have them all together. If the institution turns out to be solvent, of course the shareholder will get his money back. If it turns out that only a portion of the money will be required to meet the liability, he will get the residue back. But if there is anybody to have the advantage of it, the creditor will have the advantage, and the creditor ought to have the advantage, because the default is on the part of the stockholder and the institution of which he is a shareholder. But to say that the receiver shall go on and collect all other debts and dues belonging to the association, and then distribute them, and afterwards proceed against the stockholders upon the individual liability clause, is, to my mind, to fritter away the remedy so as to make it worthless.

I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment I have proposed, which is fair, and which is but just to the creditor. These creditors should have a remedy, and they should have it directly and without any delay whatever. This debt which is due from the stockholder on his individual responsibility obligation is just as much a part of the assets of the association as that stock which is paid in, and it ought to be as promptly forthcoming to meet claims against the association as that which is paid in, and I therefore hope that the receiver will have authority, the moment he is appointed, to go on and collect it. If it is needed, it will be there ready for the creditor; if it is not needed, the shareholder will get it back again when the association is wound up.

Mr. SHERMAN. The statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania shows that he either misconceives the provision of the bill or wishes to make this proceeding unreasonably harsh. This individual liability is a contingent liability to make good all deficiencies, if any occur, in the payment of the debts of the association. Under his amendment it will be the duty of the receiver first of all to collect from the stockholders an amount equivalent to their stock, instead of proceeding to collect the assets of the association and the debts due to it. It may happen that when those debts and assets are collected there will be ample to pay all demands. That may be apparent on the face of the statement of the bank at the time of its failure. There would then be no necessity for making a collection from the stockholders. But the Senator says that if the money is collected it can be refunded to the stockholders when it is found not to be needed. That is a roundabout and unreasonable way of enforcing an individual liability.

The amendment I offer will give the receiver, whenever he ascertains that it is necessary to enforce this individual liability, the right to enforce it by suit. It seems to me, therefore, that the amendment I propose will carry out the purpose of the bill, to enable the receiver at any time, whenever it becomes necessary, to enforce the individual liability; and in case it is not necessary, if the other assets are sufficient, he will not enforce this contingent liability, which is intended as an ultimate security of the creditors of the bank.

Mr. JOHNSON. The provision in question is to be found in a great many charters; but never heretofore, in any instance that I am aware of, has it been held that the personal liability of the stockholder is to be enforced until it is ascertained that the assets of the bank or association are not sufficient to meet the demands upon it. In other words, the responsibility of the stockholder for the amount of his stock, or, as is sometimes the case, the absolute responsibility of the stockholder for the amount of the debt, is a responsibility contingent upon the failure of the assets of the bank or the association to meet the demands upon it, and is never enforced until that fact is ascertained, and it is done by a bill in chancery. The proposition of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania would subject these stockholders to a suit at once, and each man may be compelled and will be compelled to pay, according to his amendment, an amount equal to the amount of the par value of his stock, and that will be enforced by suit, and it may turn out in the end that there was no necessity to bring suit. The only security to the bill-holder or the creditors of the bank that the amendment offered by the member from Pennsylvania will give is the chance that the stockholders are more able to pay at once than they will be able to pay after the actual sufficiency or insufficiency of the assets of the bank shall have been ascertained. It appears to me, however, rather an unnecessary hardship on the stockholders, and without really giving any additional substantial security to the creditors.

Mr. COWAN. With all deference I differ as to the character of the liability. It is said to be a contingent liability, and only to be resorted to in the event that the other assets of the bank are not sufficient to meet the claims upon it. I think on the other hand that it is a direct liability, and that the amount involved in it is as much liable to the payment of the claims of the just creditors of the bank as any other portion of the assets of that bank. But if we suppose for one moment that all other debts and dues and assets of the bank are collected and distributed to and among the creditors, then I should like to know what this individual liability clause is worth in the shape in which it stands here? The stockholder is not a surety for his costockholder; he is only bound equally and ratably for his proportion. How could it be enforced by even a bill in chancery? How many judgments would there be against him? What would be the amount of these several judgments? Here are ten thousand note-holders, if you please. He is equally and ratably bound to pay to each one of them his share of the indebtedness of the association to them. If there are a thousand stockholders, and the holder of a five dollar note is a claimant, he would only be bound, supposing each stockholder to have one share, to pay that fellow half a cent. Then that one is to have judgment for half a cent against him, and another one for another half cent, and so on.

Mr. President, I do not know what the experience of the honorable Senator from Maryland may be in enforcing an individual liability clause of this kind; but if he has ever known any one of them enforced, and if he has ever known any fruit to be derived from a remedy of this kind, he has known more than I have. Put in here, they are a snare and a delusion; but with such an amendment as I offer they will become valid and binding on the shareholders, and the moment the bank fails every shareholder knows that in addition to the stock he has already paid in he is bound to pay up a similar amount. It is not necessary that he shall be sued. He need not sustain an action if he chooses. All he has to do is to continue his position as shareholder or stakeholder, if you please, because the money he puts in is merely in pledge that the assets shall redeem the liabilities of the bank. If the money is not wanted he will get it back again. If a portion of it is wanted he will get the residue back; and there is nothing unjust in it.

But if there is to be no individual liability, no responsibility on the part of the shareholder, or if that responsibility is not to be enforced by the proper remedy, let the bill remain as it is, or leave it to the remedy proposed by the Senator from Ohio, which, in my opinion, is no remedy at all, just leaving it where it was. Require the shareholder honestly and fairly, for the benefit of those who have trusted this association, who have dealt with it upon the faith of this clause, to put up his money, and after the debts are paid, if there is any over he will get it back, and if the debts are not paid he will not get it back. That is the fair meaning of it. I hope the amendment may be agreed to.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

MR. COWAN called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

MR. ANTHONY. Let the amendment to the amendment be reported.

The Secretary read the amendment of MR. COWAN and the amendment of MR. SHERMAN.

MR. COWAN. I submit that the proposition of the Senator from Ohio is not an amendment to my amendment.

MR. SHERMAN. If my amendment be adopted, of course it will dispense with the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and therefore it is a substitute for it.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the amendments are to different parts of the section; each would, therefore, more properly be a separate amendment of itself, but one can be treated as a substitute for the other by general understanding.

MR. COWAN. Then I ask that the vote may be taken on my amendment first, if that be in order.

MR. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that course. I will only repeat that the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania would substantially require this contingent liability to be enforced first; that is, before the debts due to the bank were collected the receiver must collect the amount from the stockholders for which they might be liable in a contingency, leaving the debts to be collected afterwards.

MR. COWAN. That is a non sequitur; it does not necessarily follow. The receiver is to have authority to collect not only all the debts due to the bank but also to collect that which would be due from the stockholders on their individual liability clause. He may do it first if he chooses, or he may do it last. Something must be left to his discretion and that of the Comptroller in endeavoring to enforce the remedy. He will not be likely to do it if it is unnecessary.

MR. ANTHONY. Do I understand that the whole contingent liability of the stockholders is to be collected in the first instance, whether it be found necessary to resort to that or not, and then if it shall not be found necessary to resort to that, or it shall only be found necessary to resort to part of that, to return the balance? Are we to go through the expense of collecting and returning it without ascertaining whether it is necessary?

MR. SHERMAN. That is the precise difference between the two. My amendment provides for enforcing the contingent liability as soon as it is ascertained that it is necessary.

MR. COWAN. It is not exactly as stated by the honorable Senator from Rhode Island. The receiver will have the authority to do what he alleges is contemplated in the amendment, but it will not be obligatory on him to do it. He may resort to the collection of this fund immediately on accepting the appointment of receiver, or he may wait and bide his time until he ascertains whether it will be necessary to resort to that or not. He is to have the authority by the amendment that I offer.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be on substituting the amendment of the Senator from Ohio for that proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania. That will be the question before the Senate.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Collamer, Connors, Dixon, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Foot, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, and Salisbury—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Harding, Harris, Hendricks, Hlicks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, and Wright.

So the amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

MR. COWAN. I have another amendment to submit. I propose to strike out all of the thirteenth section after the word "that," in the first line, down to the word "association," in the fifteenth line.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

It shall be lawful for any association formed under this act, by its articles of association, to provide for an increase of its capital from time to time as may be deemed expedient, subject to the limitations of this act: Provided, That the maximum of such increase in the articles of association shall be determined by the Comptroller of the Currency, and no increase of the capital beyond the maximum so determined shall thereafter be made without the consent of the Comptroller; and no increase of capital shall be valid until the whole amount of such increase shall be paid in, and notice thereof shall have been transmitted to the Comptroller of the Currency, and his certificate obtained specifying the amount of such increase of capital stock, with his approval thereof, and that it has been duly paid in as part of the capital of such association.

MR. COWAN. I will merely remark, in support of this amendment, that by allowing the capital of these banks to be increased at the pleasure of the Comptroller, some very curious results might be brought about in a very short time. If we suppose a bank established, with a capital of $300,000 originally, and the capital stock all paid in, and bonds of the United States deposited—and I may remark that the whole capital stock of a bank may be in the bonds of the United States and deposited with the Treasurer—the bank would be entitled to receive $270,000 of notes for circulation. With these notes it might immediately purchase ten-forty bonds, now in the market, and which are to be purchased for these notes. By the provisions of this bill these ten-forty bonds might be raised to five-twenties, or, in other words, they might be made equivalent to six per cent. bonds; and immediately upon doing so application might be made to the Comptroller to increase the capital stock of the bank to the amount of those bonds. That would be $225,000; and upon that being done the bank would then receive $202,500 of currency for circulation in return. With that currency it might turn round immediately and buy other ten-forty bonds; and this, I may remark, may be done in a day, may all be done in an hour; it may be done instantaneously for that matter, by an understanding with the Comptroller on the part of the bank. There need no money pass, or bonds either. This can all be done without any manual delivery of the one or the other back or forth. But after having received this second batch of circulation, it may be invested in ten-forty bonds. Application may be made to the Comptroller to increase the capital of the bank again, and it may be allowed, and the same process go on over and over again, until I have made a calculation here which results in this: after involving the original sum of $300,000 nine times in this way, the bank, upon an actual capital of $300,000, would have loaned to the Government $1,267,231, would be receiving from the Government an annual interest in gold of $66,363, or in our currency, considering the dollar at sixty cents, $110,671. It is true that fifteen per cent. of the amount in circulation would always have to be kept on hand as a reserve fund in the vaults of the bank to meet its liabilities. It is also true that one per cent. annually would be paid on this circulation to the Government. The interest on the reserve fund kept on hand would be $8,996 76.

The tax which the Government would realize in consideration of these privileges would amount to $9,830. Deduct these drawbacks from the amount of interest, and it would leave the bank receiving from the Government in its own currency which it is bound to redeem dollar for dollar in gold eventually sometime or other, if it keeps its faith, $91,875.

Certainly no friend of this measure would desire that this result should be brought about; and it is not likely it would be ever brought about to such an extent as I have carried it in this calculation if the Comptroller were an honest man; but we are not secure from the contingency of having at some future time a Comptroller who may have his friends engaged in this business of banking, and to whom he could extend these facilities without any possible check on the part of any of his superior officers, because the mischief might result naturally under the fair operation of the law.

I propose by striking out a portion of the thirteenth section to prevent any of these banks from increasing their capital at the will of the Comptroller. I would have these banks, so far as that is concerned, put on a footing with other banks all over the Union when they desire an increase of their capital. It is for the sovereign power, or in other words Congress in this instance, to determine whether a further franchise shall be extended to them, because this is one of the gifts of high prerogative; this is a franchise which belongs to no banker naturally, and which ought only to be at the disposal of the sovereign power of the nation. I therefore desire that it may be limited, and that after a bank determines, on making its application, what the amount of its capital shall be, there shall be no increase of that capital, of that franchise, other than by an act of Congress, just as everybody all over the States to-day when they desire an extension of these special corporate privileges go to the Legislature in order to have them granted.

MR. SHERMAN. The right of the banks to increase their capital stock is so much restrained and limited by the bill that I think it would be very unwise to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania. By the terms of the bill the bank must express its desire to increase its capital at the time of making the original application. That desire and that limitation must be approved by the Comptroller. For instance, a bank is started to-day with a capital of $100,000. It is required by this law to be paid in very promptly, one half cash in hand and ten per cent. every thirty days, I think—very rapidly at any rate; within six months, at least, all must be paid up. But at the time of making its application it may give notice that it will desire an increase of capital stock. That increase must be approved by the Comptroller, and the Comptroller may limit it.

MR. COWAN. The Senator will allow me to correct him. I think he has misread a portion of the bill which I desire to strike out. It is true that on the original application the Comptroller determines the maximum of the capital stock of a bank; but there is a clause which follows subsequently, which by fair implication will allow him to increase it beyond that maximum. I will read it:

That the maximum of such increase in the articles of association shall be determined by the Comptroller of the Currency, and no increase of the capital beyond the maximum so determined—

Not up to the maximum but beyond the maximum—shall thereafter be made without the consent of the Comptroller.

Now, I say that a fair construction of that clause allows the maximum to be exceeded afterwards by the consent of the Comptroller.

MR. SHERMAN. In that section that the Senator proposes to strike out there is this clause:

That it shall be lawful for any association formed under this act, by its articles of association—

That is, the original first paper provided for—to provide for an increase of its capital from time to time as may be deemed expedient, subject to the limitations of this act.

It is not only subject to the general limitations, of its articles of association, but subject to all the limitations of the act. One of the limitations of the act is to limit the aggregate capital stock of all these banks to $300,000,000.

Mr. COWAN. That is the limit on the circulation.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have amended the bill so as to apply that limitation to the capital stock.

Mr. COWAN. Suppose that is done, it does not meet the objection here.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Vermont moved to apply the limitation to the capital stock, and that amendment was adopted; so that the capital stock of these banks cannot exceed $300,000,000; and not only that, but the limit to some extent is fixed by the articles of association, and it must be approved by the Comptroller, and beyond that they cannot go without the consent of the Comptroller. It may be that those organizing a bank in a town or city may look to the necessity of a future increase of banking capital, and rather than organize a new bank when that increase becomes necessary, they may prefer to increase the capital stock of the old bank. If you strike out this provision, there will be no way by which an existing bank can increase its capital stock; but if additional banking stock is required in any place there must be a new institution. It seems to me that it is right to allow these banks to increase their capital stock, subject to the supervisory power of the Comptroller of the Currency, and all the restraints and limitations of this act.

Mr. COWAN. I, of course, admit the general limitation of the act—that is $300,000,000. For all the time that the law has been in operation heretofore but about fifty millions have been taken. What I complain of, however, is that within the limit of $200,000,000 this mischief may take place. Two hundred and fifty millions of bank capital yet left forms a very large margin, within which the consent of the Comptroller would have great room to play in adjusting his favors among his friends, and that is the mischief. The honorable Senator says a bank may want to increase its capital. Suppose it does; how have banks heretofore increased their capital? By the will of a single man, sitting here at the center, the seat of Government, holding the reins over the capital of the whole country, moving at his will the finances of the nation in any direction which he chooses to give them? No, sir. In order to increase the capital stock of a corporation, in order to enlarge its franchise, in order to give it privileges which it would not have had otherwise by the law, it is necessary and proper that it should appeal to the sovereign, to Congress, in order that it may be determined whether it is fit and proper that it should be intrusted any further with these prerogatives. Then, I say, there is no hardship here. Let the bank at its outstart declare in its articles of association, if you please, the maximum of its capital, and afterwards let that be a fixed fact, unless Congress should declare otherwise.

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps I can suggest an amendment which will satisfy the Senator, as I desire to meet every practical objection. The Senator objects to the power of the Comptroller to authorize an increase beyond the amount applied for by the original articles of association, and thinks that power may be abused in the hands of the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. COWAN. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is possible that may be abused. A corrupt Comptroller might possibly allow a bank which had not indicated its purpose or desire to increase its capital stock to increase it unreasonably. I have no objection, therefore, personally, although I am not authorized to accept this amendment by the action of the committee, to strike out, in lines eight and nine, the words "without consent of the Comptroller;" so that the bank can only increase its capital stock to the extent and amount of its original notice, with the assent of the Comptroller. That will meet all the objection of the Senator.

Mr. COWAN. I would agree to this modification: strike out, after the word "currency" in the seventh line, the words "and no increase of the capital beyond the maximum so determined shall thereafter be made without the consent of the Comptroller."

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the same thing. I have no objection to striking out that clause.

Mr. COWAN. Then I will so modify the amendment as to strike out from line seven, after the word "currency," down to line nine, ending with the word "Comptroller."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words now proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The Secretary read them, as follows:

And no increase of the capital beyond the maximum so determined shall thereafter be made without the consent of the Comptroller.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to amend the bill by striking out in lines fourteen and fifteen of the twenty-sixth section the words "amount of the circulation issued for the same," and inserting in lieu of these words "value they bore at the time of said deposits;" so as to make the clause read:

Whenever the market or cash value of any bonds deposited with the Treasurer of the United States as aforesaid shall be reduced below the value they bore at the time of said deposit, the Comptroller of the Currency is hereby authorized to demand and receive the amount of said depreciation in other United States bonds, &c.

The twenty-first section of the bill provides that upon the transfer and delivery of bonds to the Treasurer, the association making the transfer shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller circulating notes equal in amount to ninety per cent. of the current market value of the bonds so transferred and delivered. The section that I now propose to amend provides for keeping the relative value of the bonds and the circulating notes the same; and it provides that whenever the market or cash value of the bonds shall be reduced below the amount of the circulation issued for the same, the Comptroller shall require the depreciation to be made up in other bonds. It will be observed, however, that the bonds may depreciate ten per cent. in value, and yet the bank not be required to deposit any additional bonds. It is only when the bonds fall more than ten per cent. that any further deposit is required.

I have many amendments that I desire to offer, but I think this amendment should be adopted by the friends of the bill. I believe it has been usual in all banking systems of this kind to keep up the relative value of the bonds compared with the circulation, the same as was originally required upon the drawing of the circulation from the Comptroller. That has been the case, I believe, in all stock systems of banking. It was the case in the western system, and it ought certainly to be the case here. I see no reason why there should be a difference of ten per cent. made unless we intend to maintain that difference of ten per cent. If the Government in the end is to be responsible for these circulating notes, it is surely to the benefit of the Government that the banks issuing the notes shall be required to keep an ample fund on hand to protect the Government against any loss, because the notes that they may take from individuals in different sections of the country will be entirely under their control and the Government cannot realize anything from them.

For the protection of the Government I think this amendment ought to be made. I offer it in good faith, and not with a view to cripple the bill, as some gentlemen may suppose in regard to my amendments. I am opposed to the bill, as the Senate knows, and I am honest enough to say that I would cripple it in any way; but I think this amendment ought to be adopted. It is one that protects the Government and protects the note-holder, because the expenses of the sale of the bonds would be a considerable item, and we ought not to leave the bill in such a shape that the amount of the bonds shall be the same at any time as the amount of the circulating notes. Whenever the bonds fall below the standard value required at the time of their deposit, we ought to compel the banks to increase the deposit.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator's amendment would operate very unjustly. This bill requires a greater security from stock banks than any bank charter I have ever seen. The usual way is to limit the amount of circulation to the amount of the bonds and their par value; but this bill only allows them to issue within ten per cent. of the market or par value of the bonds. It requires this margin of ten per cent. at the beginning; but the Senator would require this margin of ten per cent. always to be kept on hand without regard to the slight fluctuations that will always occur in the value of bonds. The Government of the United States never can be insecure as long as the market value in the city of New York of the bonds deposited with it as security is equal to the amount of outstanding notes in circulation. If it falls below that the bill provides that a call shall be made at once on the bank to make it good. Therefore, the provision is wholly unnecessary. It would only be burdensome, and require these calls to be made when the fluctuation amounts to one or two per cent.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bucklew, Canlie, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Grimes, Henderson, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Salisbury, and Wilson—12.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Fessenden, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ranney, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wiley—24.

ABSENT.—Messrs. Brown, Collamer, Foot, Harding, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Nesmith, Trumbull, and Wright.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to amend the bill further by striking out the word "thirty," in line seven, section sixteen, and inserting "fifty;" so that it will read:

That every association, after having complied with the provisions of this act, preliminary to the commencement of banking business under its provisions, and before it shall be authorized to commence business, shall transfer and deliver to the Treasurer of the United States any United States registered bonds bearing interest to an amount not less than $50,000, &c.

It will be observed that this amendment is only to require the deposit of these banks to be a little larger, to require a deposit of $50,000 instead of $30,000 before commencing business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator is mistaken. This bill expressly provides that no bank with a capital of less than $50,000 shall be organized under the act; but the provision to which he now refers is that they shall not proceed to do any business until they invest $30,000 of the capital in United States bonds, while a larger bank need only invest one third of its capital stock. This section does not relate to the amount of capital stock.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was not speaking of that. Let me ask the Senator if this does not provide that the bank may commence with $30,000 of bonds? A bank of $50,000 capital may be established under this law. Can it not then commence with one half of its capital stock paid in, $25,000?

Mr. SHERMAN. Thirty thousand dollars must be invested in United States bonds, and the whole of it must be paid in.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then by depositing $25,000 here with the Treasurer I apprehend that the bank can get the amount of notes to which it would be entitled and commence banking under it.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; this limitation expressly says that no bank shall commence business under the act unless it buys United States stocks to the amount of $30,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is just what I want to prevent. I do not want it to commence banking with so small an amount. Section seven of the bill provides:

That no association shall be organized under this act with a less capital than $100,000, nor, in a city whose population exceeds fifty thousand persons, with a less capital than $200,000: Provided, That banks with a capital of not less than $50,000 may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, be organized in any place the population of which does not exceed six thousand inhabitants.

Then a bank with $50,000 of capital may commence business by paying in one half of its capital stock, and, as I understand it, can obtain notes. Then it will receive $25,000 of circulating notes, less ten per cent., which would be $22,500, and go to work as a banking institution, under this law, issuing paper.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the leave of the Senator I will try again to explain it to him. Section sixteen has nothing whatever to do with the capital stock. The capital stock of the bank must be not less than $50,000, and that is only in small towns; and it must all be paid in in lawful money of the United States. Section sixteen has nothing to do with the amount of capital stock or the amount that must be paid in to commence business. It relates to a distinct subject-matter; it fixes the amount that each bank shall invest in the bonds of the United States. A small bank must invest not less than $30,000. A large bank need not buy bonds to the extent of more than one third of its capital stock. The law in this respect makes a discrimination against the small banks. The Senate will perceive that there is no kind of connection between the amount of the capital stock and the amount of bonds owned. A large bank need invest only one third of its capital stock in bonds, and can only draw circulation to the amount of ninety per cent. of the bonds so deposited, but a small bank must invest $30,000 of its capital in bonds of the United States; and all the capital stock in any event must be paid in.

Mr. HENDERSON. I disagree with the Senator's construction; but with his explanation, taking the law altogether to be what he says, I withdraw the amendment, and move to strike out the proviso in section seven, which will accomplish my purpose if he be correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri now proposes to strike out the words which will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Provided, That banks with a capital of not less than $50,000 may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, be organized in any place the population of which does not exceed six thousand inhabitants.

Mr. SHERMAN. Individually I would much prefer that the amount of capital stock should never be less than $100,000; but this proviso was put in after a good deal of discussion in the House of Representatives by a very decided vote of the House. Unless Senators really desire to make a point on this matter, as the members of the House of Representatives represent the local districts who will be more benefited by these local banks, I trust they will not adopt the amendment. If I had my own way and had the drafting of the bill, I would have left out the small banks; but that was the action of the House of Representatives. This proviso was inserted there after debate by a very decided vote, with a view to help remote and thinly populated sections of the country and smaller towns.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I hope the Senate will not strike out this proviso. So far as my State is concerned, we expect to organize banks with not larger capital than that; but if the proviso be stricken out, our people will not be able to do it. In the town where I live it is contemplated to establish a bank, but they cannot do it if the capital is put at over $50,000.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I call for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I desire to say that I vote for this amendment principally to remove from the Secretary of the Treasury this discretionary power, in order to establish if possible in this bill the principle that banks shall be established under uniform rules, and that there shall be no discretion left to him to favor one locality over another.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know how it will stand if the amendment be adopted. What will be the limit?

Mr. SHERMAN. One hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. GRIMES. That is satisfactory to me.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Carlile, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Foot, Grimes, Henderson, Morgan, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, and Wilson—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Fessenden, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Willey—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Harding, Harris, Hendricks, McDougall, Nesmith, and Wright.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have one other amendment to offer, and then I will quit. I move to strike out section forty-five of the bill, with a view of disconnecting the Government as far as we possibly can from all banking institutions. I think the independent Treasury system which we adopted many years ago has proved to be, perhaps, the best institution ever adopted by the Government of the United States. It was adopted after we had been connected for a long series of years with banking institutions by which the Government lost immense sums of money, and I now desire to offer this amendment with a view of disconnecting the Federal Government from these institutions. I believe the connection will be found to work badly. In fact if this section be retained, we do not want any longer the independent Treasury system except at some of the larger ports of entry in the United States. We shall have to keep the independent Treasury system there in order to keep the gold received for duties separate from this paper. But it really seems to me that for all purposes in connection with the public money, the independent Treasury system is infinitely better than this. The Secretary of the Treasury may use the Assistant Treasurers in the various parts of the United States as financial agents of the Government just as well as he can use these banks. He can require of them to do anything and everything that may be advantageous for the interest of the Government as well as these banks can do it. I do not wish to do away with the independent Treasury system. I believe it is a good one, and this is tantamount to destroying it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The Secretary read section forty-five as follows:

SEC. 45. And be it further enacted, That all associations under this act, when designated for that purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be depositories of public money, except receipts from customs, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary; and they may also be employed as financial agents of the Government; and they shall perform all such reasonable duties, as depositories of public moneys and financial agents of the Government, as may be required of them. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall require of the associations thus designated satisfactory security, by the deposit of United States bonds and otherwise, for the safe-keeping and prompt payment of the public money deposited with them, and for the faithful performance of their duties as financial agents of the Government: Provided, That every association which shall be selected and designated as receiver or depository of the public money shall take and receive at par all of the national currency bills which have been paid in to the Government for internal revenue or for loans or stocks.

Mr. SHERMAN. As long as our entire revenues consisted in customs duties collected at the ports of entry there was no occasion for public deposits; but now we are collecting money in every district of the United States, these banks are very useful and convenient for exchange agencies, the only purpose for which they are used and will be used.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POWELL. I desire to state that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NESMITH] is absent from the Senate in consequence of sickness.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 11, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Trumbull—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Chandler, Harding, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, McDougall, Nesmith, Wilkinson, and Wright.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move to amend section twenty-four, by inserting after "United States," in line fourteen, the words "one by the association." This section provides for destroying the mutilated and worn-out bills, and it provides that three persons shall oversee the burning of the bills, one appointed by the Comptroller of the Currency, one appointed by the Treasurer of the United States, and one by the Secretary of the Treasury. I propose that there shall be one appointed by the association itself.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now the words "three persons," in that section, should be changed to "four persons."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move to insert at the end of section twenty-five the words "and a duplicate signed by the Treasurer shall be retained by the association." This section provides for an examination of the bonds placed on deposit, and I wish to have a duplicate of the certificate of the amount retained by the association.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move the following amendment to come in at the end of section sixty-three:

Provided, That savings banks regularly chartered by State authority, owning stock in any of the aforesaid associations, shall not be liable over and above the value of the stock owned by them.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move to amend the bill by striking out in lines ten and eleven of the twenty-second section the words, "one dollar, two dollars, three dollars;" so as to read:

Circulating notes in blank of the denomination of five dollars, ten dollars, twenty dollars, fifty dollars, &c.

This amendment will make the provisions of this section conform to what was the law of my own State, which did not permit banks to issue notes of a denomination less than five dollars. I ask for the yeas and nays upon this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 8, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Doolittle, Henderson, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, and Saulsbury—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wilson—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Chandler, Davis, Fessenden, Harding, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Howard, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomeroy, and Wright.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I offer the following amendment as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That any person, banker, or banking association, or banking corporation, which shall not within one year from and after the passage of this act reduce and thereafter retain the amount of its notes, bills, or certificates in circulation as money below the amount of its cash capital actually paid in according to law and fifty per cent. added thereto, or to the amount of its circulation actually secured by pledge of the stocks of the United States, or of the State where the bank or banking office is situated, pursuant to the laws of the United States or of the said State, shall not be entitled to make the Treasury notes of the United States a legal tender in payment of any demand against the same, and shall pay to the United States upon any excess over and above what is herein provided a tax of one half per cent. per month.

I shall not discuss the amendment. The whole effect is to operate upon the banks where their circulation is not secured by stocks of the United States or of the States where they are located, and the effect is to compel them to reduce that circulation within one year from this time down to their cash capital actually paid in, and not to exceed fifty per cent. added thereto.

Mr. JOHNSON. How is it to be enforced?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is to be enforced by declaring that those banks which do not do so shall not be entitled to the privilege of making the Treasury notes of the United States a legal tender in payment of demands against them, and further that upon the excess over and above what is there mentioned, that is, the capital actually paid in, and fifty per cent. in addition thereto, they shall pay a tax of one half per cent. a month.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. POWELL. I move to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and insert the following as a substitute for it:

That the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States stocks," approved February 25, 1863, is hereby repealed.

It is not my purpose to make a speech on this question. I will simply say that I think this whole system of banking is wrong, and it cannot and will not result in anything but great injury to the country. I am aware that if this amendment be adopted a supplemental bill will be required for winding up these banks. I offer the amendment to show my views of propriety, and I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 6, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Henderson, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, and Saulsbury—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wilson—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Cowan, Davis, Harding, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, McDougall, Nesmith, Wade, and Wright.

So the amendment was rejected.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time; and on the question, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. WILSON and Mr. POWELL called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 30, nays 9; as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Grimes, Henderson, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, and Sausbury—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Harding, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, McDougall, Nesmith, Wade, and Wright.

So the bill was passed.

OPERATIONS OF GENERAL BUTLER.

Mr. WILSON (during the day) sent the following dispatch to the desk, which was read:

HEADQUARTERS IN THE FIELD,
NEAR BERNUDA LANDING, May 9, 1864.

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War:

Our operations may be summed up in a few words. With seventeen hundred cavalry we have advanced up the Peninsula, forced the Chickahominy, and have safely brought them to our present position. These were colored cavalry, and are now holding our advanced pickets toward Richmond. General Kautz, with three thousand cavalry from Suffolk, on the same day with our movement up James river, forced the Blackwater, burned the railroad bridge at Stony creek below Petersburg, cutting in two Beauregard's forces at that point, and is now operating against Hicksford and Weldon. We have landed here, intrenched ourselves, destroyed many miles of railroad, and got a position which with proper supplies we can hold out against the whole of Lee's army. I have ordered up the supplies. Beauregard with a large portion of his command was left South by the cutting of the railroad by Kautz. That portion which reached Petersburg under Hill I have whipped to-day, killing and wounding many, and taking many prisoners, after a severe and well-contested fight. General Grant will not be troubled with any further reinforcements to Lee from Beauregard's forces.

BENJAMIN F. BUTLER,
Major General.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 172) concerning the disposition of convicts in the courts of the United States, for the subsisting of persons confined in jails charged with violating the laws of the United States, and for diminishing the expenses in relation thereto.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the resolution of the Senate for the appointment of a select joint committee to examine into the present mode of lighting, heating, and ventilating the Senate Chamber and the Hall of the House of Representatives, and had appointed Mr. JUSTIN S. MORRILL of Vermont, Mr. N. B. SMITHERS of Delaware, and Mr. JAMES E. ENGLISH of Connecticut, the committee on its part.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. BUCKALEW, Mr. HOWARD, and Mr. HENDERSON to constitute the committee on the part of the Senate.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed on the 6th instant the following act and joint resolution:

An act (H. R. No. 119) to regulate the admeasurement of tonnage of ships and vessels of the United States; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 69) for the payment of volunteers called out for not less than one hundred days.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

which recently participated in the rebel attack on Plymouth; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

VENTILATION OF THE HALL, ETC.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a concurrent resolution of the Senate for the appointment of a joint select committee in relation to the heating, ventilation, &c., of the Senate Chamber and the Hall of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the House concur, and that the Speaker be authorized to appoint a committee of three upon the part of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER subsequently appointed Mr. MORRILL, Mr. SMITHERS, and Mr. ENGLISH as such committee on the part of the House.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary a bill (S. No. 172) concerning the disposition of convicts in the courts of the United States, for subsisting of persons confined in jails charged with violating the laws of the United States, and for diminishing the expenses in relation thereto; which was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF DISTRICT POLICE.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill requiring the city authorities of the cities of Washington and Georgetown to levy a tax sufficient to increase the pay of the metropolitan police of said cities to eighty dollars per month.

BRANCH MINT AT SAN FRANCISCO.

On motion of Mr. SHANNON, by unanimous consent, bill of the Senate No. 176, authorizing the erection of buildings for the branch mint at San Francisco, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

MISSOURI CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I now demand the regular order of business.

The House resumed, as the regular order of business, the consideration of the contested-election case from the seventh congressional district of Missouri of Bruce vs. Loan.

Mr. BRUCE, (contestant.) Having been in the House from the commencement of the session, I am fully aware of the great amount of public business yet to be transacted; and I am also well aware of the great anxiety of members to complete it, and their desire to get home. For my part, I proposed to the sitting member that we should submit the case on the report of the committee. He did not see fit to do that, and declined the offer. I do not cast any censure upon him, because he thought it his duty in view of the report of the majority of the committee that he should be heard. I am as anxious as any gentleman on this floor that but little time shall be taken up in the consideration of this case, and I do not feel that I am at all responsible for the consumption of time; and I hope the House will not have any feeling of prejudice against this contested-election case, either against myself or the sitting member, on account of the time that has been consumed in the discussion.

Mr. Speaker, I am not here with any idle claim. I am not here—in the language of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. L. MYERS]—"with the baldest claim that ever came before this House." I have seen a similar statement published almost verbatim made by a newspaper correspondent from this city. I am satisfied that there is an incorrect impression upon the part of the House in reference to this case. I am satisfied that when gentlemen here come to hear me, and when they examine all the facts in connection with the case, they will be far from coming to the conclusion the gentleman from Pennsylvania did, that this is an effort to dislodge a loyal man from his seat and put in his place by another election a disloyal man. When they shall have heard of the relative positions of the gentleman and myself during all these troubles, they will arrive at a far different conclusion.

Mr. Speaker, I am here to assert a right and to ask the American Congress to redress a great wrong. According to the forms of our Government other wrongs can be redressed in the courts of the country, but the only redress that I have in this case is in the Congress of the United States, and I trust that the House will bring to the consideration of the case that degree of candor, fairness, and impartiality that their high position demands of them. I say to you that the arguments that have been used here, the ad captandum vulgum that has been employed on the part of members of this House, would not do before a justice's court in my section of the country. Gentlemen have endeavored to evade the real issue and to determine the whole case upon a point which was at the very start a pretext that these military gentlemen availed themselves of in order to place themselves in power. This House owes it not only to my district but to the loyal State of Missouri that whatever wrong is shown to have been done shall be redressed. You are the sole tribunal that can do it. The Committee of Elections was the first committee ever organized under this Government. It stands at the head of the committees of this House. I have no other place in which to seek redress. If I shall come before an American Congress composed of loyal men and fail to obtain that redress it will weaken the confidence of my State in your fairness and justice. I tell you that the election, conducted as it was, was a great outrage on the elective franchise. I never doubted that an impartial Congress, as I believed this body would be, would furnish me redress. You owe it to Missouri, a loyal State which has proved her loyalty, to redress this wrong.

At the outbreak of this rebellion Missouri had a traitorous Governor and a traitorous Legislature. The Legislature called a convention, which convention met, and it was the only convention convened during all these troubles that kept a State in the Union; and to-day Missouri can well be proud of the services she has rendered to the Union; divided as her community was and distracted by different interests, she stood firmly by the Union; she has furnished sixty thousand soldiers to the volunteer army of the United States, besides eighty regiments of militia. I tell you, gentlemen, that your decision in this case will have great influence in the State of Missouri.

There is a remarkable fact connected with this case. While the minority of the Committee of Elections have been remarkably particular in all they have said in reference to my non-conformity with the strict rules as laid down in the act of 1851, while they hold me to the strict rules of evidence, yet, sir, the very gentlemen who made that report have themselves gone off on an issue based upon testimony taken outside of the act of 1851, and in violation of the rules of evidence and of law. The act of Congress of 1851 in reference to taking testimony in a contested-election case, states "that the testimony shall be confined to the proof and disproof of the allegations in the notice of the contestant and in the answer of the sitting member." I gave the sitting member notice, and stated the grounds of my complaint, and in his answer he denied all of my allegations, and proposed no new ground except in regard to the oath. I have shown that I took the oath according to law, and yet the sitting member has never proved that he took the oath prescribed by the ordinance of the convention. I know that several gentlemen who have spoken on this matter have stated that the officers at the court-house election precinct did not comply with the ordinance by taking the oath prescribed by the convention. The testimony shows that I took the oath, yet the sitting member has not yet shown that he took the oath. The Secretary of State and Attorney General have stated that it is not necessary for members of Congress to take the oath. Whether the sitting member has taken it or not, it is in the testimony that I took the oath prescribed by the convention.

The sitting member in his answer did not state that rebel sympathizers voted for me, but it is alleged that all those who were driven from the polls were rebel sympathizers. Yet the whole case is made to turn on the testimony taken outside of the rules of law and of evidence; and I am satisfied that it will have more influence on the whole case than anything else. It is alleged that those who were excluded were rebel sympathizers who were not entitled to vote.

In the State of Missouri the convention which assembled in 1862 fixed additional qualifications for voters, and I will beglad if the Clerk will read the oath.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"I, _____, do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that I will support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of the State of Missouri against all enemies and opposers, whether domestic or foreign; that I will bear true faith, loyalty, and allegiance to the United States, and will not, directly or indirectly, give aid and comfort or countenance to the enemies or opposers thereof, or of the provisional government of the State of Missouri, any ordinance, law, or resolution of any State convention or Legislature, or any order or organization, secret or otherwise, to the contrary notwithstanding; and that I do this with a full and honest determination, pledge, and purpose, faithfully to keep and perform the same, without any mental reservation or evasion whatever. And I do further solemnly swear (or affirm) that I have not, since the 17th day of December, A. D. 1861, willfully taken up arms or levied war against the United States or against the provisional government of the State of Missouri. So help me God."

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. Speaker, I am not here to argue anything to this House in reference to the fact of disloyal votes. During the canvass I addressed myself to the loyal men of the district. I stated distinctly, in all my speeches, that the rebellion was causeless and unprovoked by any oppression on the part of the General Government, and denounced secession. I know that the impression is sought to be produced here that I was supported by the votes of disloyal men, but I will show that the contrary is the case.

Let us look at what has been the practice in the other States. We know very well that it was deemed necessary, or at least it was done, that the general in command issued orders in reference to the elections in several States last year, in addition to the rules prescribed by law. In Kentucky General Burnside issued an order that disloyal persons should not vote, and nobody questions the right of the members from that State sitting here under that election. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. SCHRECK], then in command of the department of which Maryland is a part, issued an order in reference to the election in that State. I am not here to inquire into the propriety or impropriety of these orders. A like order was issued by General Schofield in Missouri.

The following were orders issued previous to the congressional election in 1862 in Missouri:

[General Orders, No. 15.]

HEADQUARTERS STATE OF MISSOURI,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
ST. LOUIS, October 23, 1862.

1. A general election is to take place throughout the State the first Tuesday in November next.

This is the first attempt of the people to choose their officers since the war of the rebellion commenced. It will be an occasion when angry passions, excited by the war, might produce strife, and prevent the full expression of the popular will in the selection of officers.

The convention has provided by ordinance that every voter shall, before voting, take a prescribed oath, and that no vote shall be counted in favor of any candidate for a State or county office, unless he shall have taken an oath prescribed for candidates. The ordinance of the convention fixes heavy penalties upon those who take the oath falsely. These are the safeguards which the convention has judged necessary to keep faithful and disloyal persons from exercising power in the State. They are sufficient. No person must be allowed to interfere with the freedom of those qualified to vote under this ordinance.

The enrolled militia being citizens of the State, and very nearly all entitled by age to vote, will doubtless be generally at places of voting. They are a body organized for the purpose of preventing violations of the law of the State, and they all know that it is essential to the maintenance of our Government that all qualified voters shall be allowed, without molestation of any kind, to cast their votes as they please.

II. It is required of all officers and men of the enrolled militia that they keep perfect order at the polls on the day of election, and that they see that no person is either kept from the polls by intimidation, or in any way interfered with in voting at the polls for whatever candidate he may choose.

III. If any officer or private shall either interfere with the rights of voters, or countenance such interference by others, it will be treated as a high military offense, and punished with the utmost rigor.

IV. Whenever there is any reason to apprehend any interference with the election on the part of bands of guerrillas, the commanding officer of the nearest regiment will detail a sufficient force to prevent any such interference, and station it where there is apprehended danger.

V. In case of disturbance arising which cannot be arrested by the civil authorities, any commissioned officer present is hereby ordered, at the request of any judge, sheriff, or justice of the peace, to use the necessary military force to suppress it.

VI. Commanding officers of the enrolled Missouri militia are hereby directed to see that the foregoing orders are strictly obeyed.

By order of the commander-in-chief:

WILLIAM D. WOOD,
Acting Adjutant General Missouri.

[General Orders, No. 33.]

HEADQUARTERS SEVENTH MILITARY DISTRICT,
ST. JOSEPH, MISSOURI, November 1, 1862.

The attention of all officers and soldiers of the militia of this district is called to General Order No. 45, dated "Headquarters State of Missouri, Adjutant General's office, St. Louis, October 23, 1862," with reference to the election on Tuesday next. The military should bear in mind that they are not the judges of the qualifications of voters. That duty is devolved by law on the judge of the election. If these officers either admit improper persons to vote, or exclude proper persons from voting, the statutes of this State provide an ample remedy. The militia will carefully abstain from all acts calculated to interfere with the freedom of election. All officers who interfere with the rights of voters will be reported to the commander-in-chief, to be dealt with as he may decide. All soldiers guilty of the same offense will be punished as a court-martial shall determine.

By order of Brigadier General Willard P. Hall:

ELWOOD KIRBY,
Assistant Adjutant General.

The commanders issued these orders, and in my case the soldiers did, in violation of these orders, undertake to decide who should vote and who should not.

There was an attempt to carry this case by storm, by making a false issue, and by using the military force. The military officers, who were candidates themselves, in all the counties used their power to defeat me. These military men, who had been in the service but three months and had never seen an enemy, were anxious to get a reward for their prowess, though they had never fleshed their swords or seen the enemy, and from my knowledge of these candidates they never will be in a fight. The whole election was carried by military control, and in violation of the orders of the department commander. I ask the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHRECK] if he would have allowed his military orders to be disobeyed as General Schofield's were in my district? I am satisfied he would not have permitted it, and I know the sense of justice of this House will allow to Missouri and to her department commander the same right to determine who was and who was not a voter. I tell you, gentlemen, you who are in a majority here, that you are committed to a principle which you have voted this session; to let men vote who repent and take the oath. I will have the Clerk read what you have committed yourselves to. I refer to the bill introduced by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS], and which you voted for the other day.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That so soon as the military resistance to the United States shall have been suppressed in any such State, and the people thereof shall have sufficiently returned to their obedience to the Constitution and the laws of the United States, the provisional governor shall direct the marshal of the United States, as speedily as may be, to name a sufficient number of deputies, and to enroll all white male citizens of the United States resident in the State in their respective counties, and to request each one to take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and in his enrollment to designate those who take and those who refuse to take that oath, which rolls shall be forthwith returned to the provisional governor; and if the persons taking that oath shall amount to a majority of the persons enrolled in the State he shall, by proclamation, invite the loyal people of the State to elect delegates to a convention charged to declare the will of the people of the State relative to the reestablishment of a State government, subject to and in conformity with the Constitution of the United States."

Mr. BRUCE. I confess that I have failed to address the Speaker, as I should have done. I have been addressing gentlemen upon this side of the House; for gentlemen upon the other side, belonging to the old historical party which I have fought for thirty long years, are all right upon this question. The Saviour said He "came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance;" hence I am addressing the Republican side of the House, who have the power.

Mr. GRINNELL. Does the gentleman say all the sinners are upon this side?

Mr. BRUCE. Well, I think they need some preaching to. I want to carry enough of you gentlemen on this side to join the gentlemen on the other side to put the sitting member out of this House.

Mr. GRINNELL. Are they all right over on that side?

Mr. BRUCE. From manifestations I have seen they are all right. But I appeal to no party here, and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means knows that I am smart enough to know just how this matter stands. [Laughter.] Tooust the sitting member I must get some Republican votes. I have read to you the bill by which you have committed yourselves to allow men to vote who repent and take the oath of allegiance. The oath of the convention is that they have neither given aid nor comfort to the enemy.

There have been a great many prominent men in my State who have, during the troubles, expressed sentiments of disloyalty, and for the edification of the House I desire to say that some of those gentlemen now say they are as radical as any in the country. One of the most distinguished men of that class is ex-Governor Stewart, of Missouri, and I desire to read his sentiments here, because during the canvass I wronged him. No man now stands higher as a radical than Governor Stewart. I ask the Clerk to read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"It is meet, too, that these northern fanatics, who have no sympathies for anything but African slaves, and who have substituted for morals and religion a vile system of negrophilia, which culminates in all the crimes and horrors of amalgamation, should remember 'the pit from which they have been dug,' and the sins that still cling to their skirts. The sale of their slaves originally furnished capital to start manufactories, and the labor of these slaves or their descendants still keeps their spindles turning. While they shed tears of hypocritical sorrow over the fancied sufferings of the slaves on the cotton and sugar plantations, they seize with a miser's greed upon the products of their labor, and 'roll the sweet morsel under their tongues.' They move heaven and earth to rescue a fugitive from the hands of his rightful owner, and fit out and man three-fourths of all the slave-ships that prowl about the African coast."

Mr. BRUCE. These are the sentiments of Governor Stewart, as set forth in his farewell message to the Legislature of Missouri. Now, during all these troubles I have never known North or South, East or West, but have gone for my whole country.

I also give an extract from the speech of Hon. JOHN B. HENDERSON, now a Senator of the United States, and the mover of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery in the United States. It was made in the Missouri State convention on the 12th of March, 1861:

"But we are told that property is insecure in this country. Just one word in regard to that, if you please. I am willing to admit, and I do admit, and not only do I admit but I now take occasion to say, that for many years in the northern States a dangerous feeling has been growing up antagonistic to the institutions of the South. The Republican party has been supported by men who have enunciated heresies dangerous to the rights of the South, and the Republican party must get rid of that class of men. They must divest themselves of them forever and ever, or else, in my honest judgment, if their views are carried out, we may not be asked to resort to secession as a constitutional remedy, but may be compelled to resort to the more dangerous doctrine of revolution.

"I am not afraid, sir, to announce the proposition that, if the doctrines of Wendell Phillips and Lloyd Garrison are to be the doctrines of this country, and the slave population of the southern States should be turned loose by Federal enactments, I do not hesitate to say, nor do I suppose the people of the State of Missouri would hesitate a moment to say, that in that case it would be better to resort to the revolutionary right—the last resort of injured man—and fight themselves at the point of the bayonet."

By such sentiments as these have the people been mistaught and led astray.

I will now read the language of the sitting

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS. PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, MAY 12, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 139.

member, used in a speech in August last, near St. Joseph, Missouri:

"But what is the excuse for calling out these enrolled militia?" * * * "You are no doubt surprised to see that these militia are kept standing guard over negro property."

"But, fellow-citizens, let me speak further on this subject. Why does the Governor demand the removal of all Federal soldiers out of his borders? Why does he say, 'Remove them and I will call out loyal men of the State, if you will allow me to do as I wish?' Now what was his object? He desired to see the property of his dear friends taken care of, and he knew if the Federal soldiers were here he could not do it. But he has taxed you $3,000,000 for the privilege of removing them, supplying their place with the militia, and putting you under martial law. The Federal soldiers would not be negro-catchers."

In that very speech the sitting member declared that there was no necessity for calling out the militia of Missouri, and that the only purpose for which that militia was called out was to stand guard over the negroes of rebels and rebel sympathizers.

And now I wish to show the inconsistency of the gentleman. As a brigadier general in the State, he used all his efforts to prevent the removal of two negroes from the State by an Illinois regiment, who had come there to aid in our defense. He was at that time a brigadier general in our State without a command—"a brigadier without a brigade"—and he attempted to take the negroes of rebels from a loyal regiment. He went to the commander of the post at St. Joseph and told him that the negroes were not to be taken away, and that if he would not give them up, he would call out all the force under his command, give them battle, and seize the negroes. And yet he complains of Governor Gamble for calling out troops to stand guard over the negroes of rebels. True, he says that he was acting under the orders of General Halleck. I doubt whether General Halleck ever issued any order that authorized such a construction. But the gentleman was not in command there, and it was not his duty to do it. He must have felt a good deal that way, or he would not have gone into the business so ardently.

I know that the gentleman has objected to the presence of Federal troops in our State. I know that the gentleman did not like that they should come there. The gentleman and myself occupied different attitudes in 1861. When the rebellion commenced in 1860, shortly after it was ascertained that Mr. Lincoln was elected President of the United States, I was the editor of a leading Bell-Everett paper in that State, that was regarded as the organ of that party in the State, and as soon as it was ascertained that Mr. Lincoln was elected I sought to place myself on the record for the Union, and during that week I, with others, got up a call for a public meeting in favor of the Union, to be held at the court-house on the 23d of November, 1860. That call was signed by almost every prominent man in that section, but the name of the sitting member does not appear upon that call; he did not sign it. We held that meeting, and passed resolutions that would go through this House now. I was chairman of the committee that reported those resolutions, and although the speeches made might have been heard both at the office and at the house of the sitting member, he was not there participating in the proceedings at all.

I, as the conductor of a newspaper, looked round in those perilous times to see who would stand by me, and I looked for that gentleman and other distinguished gentlemen who had been associated with me in the old Whig party, but he and other old friends avoided me as if I had been a viper. I can appeal, not only to the people of Missouri who know me, but to distinguished gentlemen from that State who are now in this city who will bear testimony to the fact that while others may have been faithless I have always been faithful and true. There is not a blot upon my patriotism or upon my escutcheon. I made various Union speeches, and was the editor of a daily paper at the time, and had to speak out six days in the week, and if I had faltered in any one respect the gentleman would have hunted up my record. He did hunt up my record, and he found that I had attended a meeting for general deliberation at which several gentlemen made secession speeches, and all he could find was that I said there that Union men should not be ignored. I had the boldness and temerity to get up at that meeting, and when I did so hisses sounded all over the hall, and it was only at the intercession of gentlemen that I was allowed to speak at all, and the first words I used were: "Gentlemen, as long as I have a voice Union men shall not be ignored." A secessionist, at another time, informed me one Sunday morning that they were going to raise a secession flag over my office, and advised me to submit to it quietly. I told him if it was put up it would have to be over my dead body. The rebel rag did not wave over the Journal office, and did not go up.

I tell you, gentlemen, that when you want to test the loyalty of men in our State you must try the men who stood from November, 1860, to November, 1861, struggling for the Union in those perilous times. There are many in our State who can be loyal now, like the sitting member, who never exhibited his loyalty until after the arrival of Federal troops, and when it was clear to all men of common sense that the rebels would never have control of the State again. The first time I saw any manifestation of loyalty from him was after the arrival of the sixteenth Illinois and second Kansas regiments in St. Joseph.

At a Union meeting that was called the evening these troops arrived in St. Joseph, where I was chairman, he was called out, and came forward and made a speech. I was glad to welcome him. True, he was an eleventh-hour man, but, unlike the eleventh-hour man mentioned in the parable, who got the same wages as those who came in the first hour, he got more than those who had been always true and loyal. Before a month passed he asked and received the commission of brigadier general, and in that position he was soon at work endeavoring to catch secession niggers and take them away from Federal soldiers. I stood true to the flag in times that tried men's souls in my State. When I came here to the extra session in 1861 every loyal member gave me his hand and recognized my loyalty and services; and now I come here again, after a great wrong committed against me, and find members of this House willing to reject my just claim to a seat here and to give it to a man who did not exhibit any loyalty when there was a necessity for its avowal. I never doubted that at heart the sitting member was a good, loyal, Union man, because his father-in-law was a good Union man.

I find in a correspondence from this city, published in a St. Joseph paper that has the gentleman's name at its head as candidate for Governor, the following reference is made to this case:

"General Loan has four out of the six Union members of the Committee of Elections in his favor, and if the Union side of the House are not swayed by executive influence he will retain his seat."

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that the President of the United States is a personal friend of mine, although I am not his political friend. I enjoyed his acquaintance and friendship before he was a candidate for the Presidency. I am prepared to say to this House that if he has endeavored to influence any gentleman on this floor in my favor it has been without asking on my part. I am sure that he would not do it. The writer had no other reason for this suspicion of Mr. Lincoln but the hostility of the sitting member to the President. And I can say to the Republican side of the House that no man in Missouri more persistently opposed the Administration than the sitting member; nor is there any member on the Democratic side of this House more bitter in his feelings to Mr. Lincoln now than General Loan is. He was a candidate for a seat in the Senate of the United States and canvassed the congressional district throughout; but when his claim came before the Legislature of Missouri he got but 7 votes, and every one of these supporters of his voted against a resolution indorsing the Administration. Out of the 19 members from that congressional district, 16 of them anti-slavery men and but 3 regarded as conservative, he was only able to get one vote. And to-day, among the original Republicans in the district, the men who sowed the seed and built up the party there, I could beat him ten to one. I could get the votes of the Administration men and of all the Republicans who voted for Mr. Lincoln except the Germans. I doubt whether the sitting member could even get the German vote now, for he has deserted Frémont since he came here, and has gone over to Mr. Chase, [laughter,] through the seductive influence of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Davis.]

Much objection here is urged against rebel sympathizers voting. With the radicals it is all right when this class vote their ticket, but they drive them from the polls and all others who oppose them when they attempt to vote against them. The St. Joseph Tribune, the organ of General Loan, just the other day used the following language in an invitation to all to vote the radical ticket:

"But if success attends any of these men hereafter, they must come now and be immersed in the pure waters of radicalism. It has virtue to wash away the sins of a rebel, and if it is possible for an honest man to become crimsoned with treason his sins can be made white as snow."

[Laughter.]

He tells the rebel sympathizers to come in with them and that radicalism would wash them from their sins as white as snow. [Laughter.] When they vote for Bruce it is all wrong, but it is all right when they vote for the sitting member, [General Loan.] Is not this a bid for rebel voters? The sitting member's name is at the head of that paper for Governor, and this is an invitation to rebel sympathizers to vote for him. [Laughter.]

I am under obligation to the two gentlemen who spoke yesterday [Messrs. Eliot and Davis] for their uniform courtesy toward me. But the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Eliot] says he has always been in the habit of voting for the report of the committee, taking it for granted it is all right. It appears, however, since that gentleman has been in Congress, most of the decisions of Congress have been in favor of his political friends, and in such cases he votes for the report of the committee without examination. The report in this case, however, is against a political friend, and he then for the first time looks into the case. Is not the gentleman from Massachusetts a little apprehensive that critical people may indulge the suspicion that he might be actuated by a principle of devotion to party, rather than justice and fairness in his action on contested-election cases, by his course in this case?

Four years ago there was a contested-election case in which the grounds set forth are identical with those set out here. That was the case of Blair vs. Barrett, and the House voted Barrett out and Blair in. The identical principle of that case is involved in this, and when I came here I made out a list of gentlemen upon this floor, some fifteen of them, who voted for Blair, and at the head of it I put the Speaker of this House. I expected I would find all those gentlemen my friends—if they regarded consistency—and I went first to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. Stevens,] he being a bright and shining light in his party—and very deservedly so—but I did not meet with much success in that quarter, and therefore I did not call upon the lesser stars among the remaining fifteen. [Laughter.]

It has been said here that this side of the House cannot spare the vote of the sitting member, and that gentlemen might be excused for straining a point. I do not say that gentlemen did wrong four years ago, but if they did wrong then there was some excuse for it, because the vote was very close, 92 to 91, and the party wanted to retain the power. But here you have a large majority and you can afford to be liberal. [Laughter.] We in Missouri have to vote again in November, and we shall be back again on the first Monday in December, and you will only lose a Representative for about one month, as this session is near its close. You can afford to be fair now without any loss.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] took the right view of this matter. It was that interference in an election vitiates it. I had the same idea myself, and I made out my tables upon that principle, excluding the counties where there was interference and counting only the counties where there was a fair election, and I beat the sitting member over 1,000 votes. The principle is a correct one, and I am surprised that a gentleman who has as high a reputation as the gentleman from Maryland, who voted for putting out Barrett and putting in Blair, should yet vote to retain the sitting member in his seat.

Look at the testimony. Colonel Branch was the Republican candidate, and was recognized as the emancipation candidate. Neither the sitting member nor myself avowed ourselves as in favor of it. In the counties where there was no interference Branch's majority over the sitting member was 477. Branch received over 2,600 votes in the race, 2,500 of them in the undisturbed counties, and only about 100 in the counties where the military interfered. Allusion has been made to Governor Hall as having voted for the sitting member. He was a leading and a shining light of the Democratic party. The gentleman [Mr. Loan] knew his power and influence; and two weeks before the election he wrote to Governor Hall, saying to him that the abolitionists were troubling him more than the secessionists. The contents of that letter was doubtless circulated throughout the whole district, and it had the effect, as the sitting member intended, to cause General Hall and others to vote for him, when I thought previously that he would vote for me. This letter had an influence on him, as he was opposed both to secessionists and abolitionists.

Mr. LOAN. Mr. Speaker, to-day I speak for and on behalf of the loyal men of northwest Missouri and not for myself. It is their cause and not mine that I plead. It is their conduct that is impeached, and it is my duty to defend them against the wrongs alleged against them. The propriety of my conduct has not been questioned; malice itself has not even dared to breathe a suspicion against it; and in this I deem myself most fortunate, as it the better enables me to vindicate my friends from the gross outrages which have been so wantonly inflicted upon them. The very able, eloquent, and exhaustive arguments that have been made in this case have rendered unnecessary much that I otherwise would have said. But for the purpose of effecting the objects I have in view I deem it necessary that a brief reference should be made to the merits of this case; and I respectfully ask the attention of the House while I allude to them. Properly speaking this is not a contested-election case. But it is a public prosecution instituted by a self-appointed agent for purposes of his own. He has no authority from the public to prosecute on their behalf, and he has no rights of his own to vindicate. And while the precedents authorize such a prosecution, yet the House has never disfranchised a district, as is sought to be done in this case, except where it was necessary to be done to preserve the freedom and purity of the ballot-box, and then only upon evidence the most definite, clear, and conclusive.

The rule of action in such cases has become fixed and is well defined. It is necessary in a case like the present for the prosecutor to show such a disturbance at the polls as to prevent the majority from voting on the day of the election. Anything short of this is insufficient; otherwise the majority would ever be at the mercy of the minority. And such disturbance must actually exist at the polls on the day of the election; the anticipation of trouble, disturbance, or difficulty is insufficient. It is the duty of voters to attend there on the day of the election, and if they fail to discharge this duty it is no cause of complaint that their votes are not recorded. No one can say that they would not have been permitted to vote had they offered to do so; should a different rule prevail the minority at any time could prevent an election by inducing a few fist-fights at some of the precincts, or by putting in circulation a few days in advance of the time fixed for an election a rumor that there would be a disturbance at the polls.

I have said that the contestant appears before this House in the character of a volunteer prosecutor for the public good. There is no pretense that he is entitled to a seat on this floor. He comes to vindicate the rights, as he says, of a majority of the loyal people of the seventh congressional district in Missouri. Prima facie the case is against him. The officers whose duty it was to conduct the election and ascertain the result were satisfied with the fairness of the election, and have, under the broad seal of the State, sent a member here to represent that district in this Congress; and unless the contestant by his allegations and proofs can overturn this case, he must fail in his prosecution. By the law he was required in his notice of contest to state specifically the matters of which he complained. This he failed to do, and could not have done because no facts existed which vitiated the election, and hence it was impossible to specify them. An attempt to have done so would have only exposed the weakness of his case, and it was supposed that his entire disregard of the provisions of the statute would have been considered by the committee as equally fatal. Hence, to the general averments of unfairness in the election contained in the notice of contest is objected only the like general denials in the answer. Without any definite issues being made in the notice of contest and the answer, there is no limit to the range of evidence, and as the contestant continued taking his depositions until last November, it was utterly impossible to anticipate or rebut his testimony. No specific issues have been made, and the only case that is now before the House for consideration is the one supposed to be founded on the evidence. The committee being unable to find any case stated in the notice, have considered it proper for them to look into the testimony as printed to see if they could find one there, and after looking through that heterogeneous mass of incongruities, the majority of the committee cannot say that by the evidence it is affirmatively made manifest to their minds that the election was a fair one, therefore they report against it. In their report they say:

"It is impossible to determine either the precise extent of the interference complained of or to ascertain definitely the number of legal voters who were prevented from voting by the violence and threats of the armed militia and others."

The burden of proof is on the contestant to show these facts, and his failure to do so destroys his case; but the majority of the committee presume, in the absence of evidence showing the contrary, that the interference was such as to invalidate the election. The conclusion does not seem to be a very logical one. But it is denied that this statement of the majority of the committee is true in fact. It was not only possible but very easy to have ascertained every voter in the county, and learned from him whether he had been prevented from voting. The contestant had the whole year in which to procure this evidence. His depositions taken last November are on file without exception. He had ample time and opportunity to ascertain the names of all the voters in Buchanan county, and no one can doubt his industry. The truth is he has them all in the record, and they are less than twenty in number.

Before pursuing further the course of the majority of the committee in their search for facts which might invalidate the election in the seventh congressional district in Missouri, it is proper, for the purpose of ascertaining the relative value of the facts, to consider them in relation to the condition of the country. For more than eighteen months prior to the election civil war had raged among the people there with unusual violence. At the beginning the people were nearly equally divided; communities and even families were separated by the most relentless hatred. Prior thereto and up to the time of the election large numbers of the citizens had joined the rebel armies and were beyond the limits of the State, and other large numbers had entered the volunteer service of the Federal Government. In the summer of 1862 the disloyal citizens remaining within the State organized in guerrilla bands in such force as to threaten the destruction of the provisional government, in consequence of which all the loyal militia of the State were organized for the defense of the State. Some seventy-five or eighty regiments were organized, clothed, and equipped.

As the guerrillas were suppressed these men were relieved from active service, until at the time of the election, in November, 1862, some entire regiments were relieved, as in St. Louis and elsewhere. In other localities a battalion was retained in service, and in others only a company. Those who were not retained in active service were permitted to return to their usual avocations; and as all business in the country had been broken up and destroyed by the war, and in consequence material for clothing and means with which to purchase it were difficult to be obtained, the militiamen found themselves under the necessity of wearing their military clothing when attending to their ordinary labor and business. Hence the witnesses speak of the militia being seen around the polls, when it was only the voters who were there as citizens, but who wore as usual their military clothing, because they had no other. They were not there in the character of soldiers, but as citizens. They were not in the military service, nor were they under the control of any officers.

By Order No. 24 the disloyal portion of the population were prohibited from entering the military service of the State. All citizens were allowed to declare their own status; those who declared themselves loyal were organized as the militia of the State, and those who declared their sympathies to be with the rebellion were enrolled under Order No. 24 as disloyal, and on condition that they surrendered their arms they were permitted to remain quietly at home, so long as they behaved themselves, as will appear by the following extracts from said order:

"General Order No. 23, from these headquarters, dated July 28, 1862, is hereby revoked.

"All the loyal men of Missouri subject to military duty will be organized into companies, regiments, and brigades, as ordered in General Orders No. 10, from these headquarters, dated July 23, 1862.

"All disloyal men, and those who have at any time sympathized with the rebellion, are required to report at the nearest military post, or other enrolling station, be enrolled, surrender their arms, and return to their homes or ordinary places of business, where they will be permitted to remain so long as they shall continue quietly attending to their ordinary and legitimate business, and in no way give aid or comfort to the enemy. Disloyal persons or sympathizers with the rebellion will not be organized into companies, nor required nor permitted to do duty in the Missouri militia."

The evidence shows (see Abell's evidence, Miscellaneous Document, page 44) that this list in St. Joseph contained some nine hundred names. Gentlemen who voluntarily enrolled themselves as being disloyal in their sentiments, to escape entering the military service for the defense of the State, are certainly not the proper persons to ask this House to disfranchise the district in which they reside, because it does not appear that they were counted on the poll-books. To their credit be it said that much the largest, and certainly the most respectable, part of them never offered to vote, not being willing perhaps to take the oath prescribed in the convention ordinance, and no doubt deeming its terms inconsistent with their then recent declarations of sympathy with the rebellion. But a few of the more abandoned ones, men who are sunk so low in treason and infamy that all sense of common decency and propriety is lost, attempted to vote, and to share in directing the policy of a State, that they were unwilling to defend. Such men as Abell, the brother-in-law of the notorious guerrilla, bandit, and thief, Jeff. Thompson; Dr. Lamme, who called for and gave three groans for the United States soldiers who raised the flag over the post office in St. Joseph in 1861; and Orton Loomis, who raised and flew a rebel flag on his premises during the summer of 1861, and who was arrested and confined by military authority for his treason, were of the number; and two of these three voted at the election in 1862. That loyal men should feel outraged at such a desecration of the elective franchise is but natural, and some disturbance at the polls was the consequence of such outrages; but that it was of such a character as to invalidate the election I deny.

The disturbance at the polls of which the most serious complaint is made was in the city of St. Joseph. A reference to the facts, as shown by the evidence, will show that nothing was done there which prevented a full vote. There were six precincts in the town, at which any voter could have polled his vote. At three of them the election proceeded quietly during the day without any disturbance whatever. At another one, the Allen House, no one was prevented from voting who offered to vote. It is true that the evidence shows there was a personal difficulty between old man Cowie and another man, but it was after Mr. Cowie had voted.

There was some difficulty at the market-house precinct, and I think it probable some two or three persons may have been prevented from voting, but it is not certain that all of these voters would have voted for the contestant. Mr. Ensworth, one of them, swears that he intended to have voted for the contestee.

At the precinct at the court-house I think the evidence shows that the poll-books were torn up, and it also shows that no legal election was held there; in this, that the judges and clerks failed and neglected to take the oath prescribed by the convention ordinance, which required them to swear "that they would not record, nor permit to be recorded, the name of any voter who had not first taken the oath required to be taken by the first section of this ordinance."

Two sets of judges and clerks were appointed to hold the election at this precinct, yet not one of them could be prevailed on to qualify according to law, and this omission may account for the number of the contestant's friends who voted at that precinct. The only wonder is that the people who were so outraged remained so quiet as did the loyal people on that day.

But it is a sufficient and to my mind a conclusive answer to all that is alleged to have occurred in St. Joseph on that day to refer to the military orders issued by the Governor of the State and by General Hall, who was then in command of the district. These orders read as follows:

[General Orders, No. 45.]

HEADQUARTERS STATE OF MISSOURI,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
ST. LOUIS, October 23, 1862.

I. A general election is to take place throughout the State the first Tuesday in November next.

This is the first attempt of the people to choose their officers since the war of the rebellion commenced. It will be an occasion when angry passion, excited by the war, might produce strife, and prevent the full expression of the popular will in the selection of officers.

The convention has provided, by ordinance, that every voter shall, before voting, take a prescribed oath, and that no vote shall be counted in favor of any candidate for a State or county office unless he shall have taken an oath prescribed for candidates. The ordinance of the convention fixes heavy penalties upon those who take the oath falsely.

These are the safeguards which the convention judged necessary to keep unfaithful and disloyal persons from exercising power in the State. They are sufficient. No person must be allowed to interfere with the freedom of those qualified to vote under this ordinance.

The enrolled militia, being citizens of the State, and very nearly all entitled by age to vote, will doubtless be generally at places of voting.

They are a body organized for the purpose of preventing violations of the law of the State, and they all know that it is essential to the maintenance of our Government that all qualified voters should be allowed, without molestation of any kind, to cast their votes as they please.

It is required of all officers and men of the enrolled militia that they keep perfect order at the polls on the day of election, and that they see that no person is either kept from the polls by intimidation, or in any way interfered with in voting at the polls for whatever candidate he may choose.

If, if any officer or private shall either interfere with the rights of voters, or countenance such interference by others, it will be treated as a high military offense, and punished with the utmost rigor.

IV. Whenever there is any reason to apprehend any interference with the election on the part of bands of guerrillas, the commanding officer of the nearest regiment will detail a sufficient force to prevent any such interference, and station it where there is any apprehended danger.

V. In case of disturbance arising which cannot be arrested by the civil authorities, any commissioned officer present is hereby ordered, at the request of any judge, sheriff, or justice of the peace, to use the necessary military force to suppress it.

VI. Commanding officers of the enrolled Missouri militia are hereby directed to see that the foregoing orders are strictly obeyed.

By order of the commander-in-chief:

WILLIAM D. WOOD,
Acting Adjutant General, Missouri.

[General Orders, No. 33.]

HEADQUARTERS SEVENTH MILITARY DISTRICT,
ST. JOSEPH, MISSOURI, November 1, 1862.

The attention of all officers and soldiers of the militia of this district is called to General Order No. 45, dated "Headquarters State of Missouri, Adjutant General's Office, St. Louis, October 23, 1862," with reference to the election on Tuesday next. The military should bear in mind that they are not the judges of the qualifications of voters. That duty is devolved by law on the judge of the election. If these officers either admit improper persons to vote, or exclude proper persons from voting, the statutes of this State provide an ample remedy. The militia will carefully abstain from all acts calculated to interfere with the freedom of election. All officers who interfere with the rights of voters will be reported to the commander-in-chief, to be dealt with as he may decide. All soldiers guilty of the same offense will be punished as a court-martial shall determine.

By order of Brigadier General Willard P. Hall:

ELWOOD KIRBY,
Assistant Adjutant General.

By these orders the military force of the State was placed at the disposal of the civil authorities to keep the peace and to preserve order at the polls, and to see that all legal voters who desired to do so were permitted to vote, and penalties were denounced against any officer or soldier who should in any way interfere with the freedom of the election. And when the further facts are considered, that General Hall, now acting Governor of the State, was in St. Joseph on the day of the election with an ample force at his command to enforce his orders and protect the polls; that he was on duty that day and gave his personal attention to the election; that all guards stationed at the polls in the city on that day were placed at the request of contestant and were selected from the contestant's political friends, who voted for him; that General Hall was satisfied with the fairness of the election; that no officer or soldier, as such, did anything to disturb the quiet of the election; that the contestant did not nor did any other person make any demand that any officer or soldier be punished under the provisions of Order No. 33 for disturbing the election, they ought to be conclusive that there had been no violation of the order and that the election was a fair one. In addition, every State officer elected on that day was allowed to hold his office without any contest, with but a single exception. Colonel Severance's election as State senator was contested, but the contestant abandoned the case without pressing it to a decision.

Again, all the controversy that arose in that election grew out of the contest between the candidates for State and county officers. Two weeks previous to the election a county convention was called to nominate an unconditional Union ticket for county officers, and on this ticket was placed the name of Colonel Severance for State senator, Major Bittenger and Captain Brierly for the State Legislature, Enos Craig for sheriff, &c. The meeting that made these nominations did not nominate nor in anywise indorse me as their candidate, so far as I am advised. I had been an independent candidate for some two weeks when this meeting was held. I had left the district about the 1st of August, 1862, and did not return to it until about the 1st of March, 1863. I never wrote or published any circular or address to the voters of the district, nor was there any concert of action between me and any of the candidates. And while the county officers were elected by small majorities, perhaps not exceeding 100, my majority in the county was nearly 1,000. All the excitement on that day related to the local election; there was no controversy about the congressional race; in the excitement the contestant's name was not even mentioned; and while the voters were excited and divided on the candidates for the local offices, a large majority of them were for me, and voted accordingly.

At Chillicothe Lieutenant Colonel Jacobson interfered with the election for a short time. He was there in the interest of Colonel Branch, who was also a candidate for Congress. Within the hour a telegram from Governor Gamble removed Jacobson, and the voting proceeded quietly during the remainder of the day. The contestant received at that precinct 173 votes, to 55 for me. This, I aver, was the only place within the district where there was any interference to prevent voters from voting by military authority; and I now challenge the gentleman who will conclude this debate to refer to the evidence that will show any interference by military authority at any other place, and the evidence fails to show that any one was prevented from voting at this precinct.

In Andrew county there was no disturbance at the polls other than the usual jam when an exciting election was going on. Lieutenant Colonel Nash, in command of the militia there, said that he was ready to furnish a guard for the protection of the polls when one was properly demanded by the civil officers, but the judges and clerks of the election did not deem a guard necessary. There is no evidence whatever tending to show that there was any disturbance at the polls in Holt or Atchison county; the statement of Mr. Puryear of what was told him is no evidence. In point of fact there was no disturbance there, and Mr. Puryear knew it.

In De Kalb county, not more than four men were from any cause prevented from voting, admitting the strongest case that can be claimed under the evidence.

Before concluding it is perhaps necessary to reply to some things that have been said on the side of the majority report. As the statements made by the contestant have no connection with the record, and are wholly unwarranted by the truth, I know the House will excuse me if I omit to take any further notice of them.

The majority report in this case, instead of being a comprehensive, intelligent statement of the case, as a report of this kind should be, is like the ingenious argument of a pettifogging attorney who seeks to gain a cause that he knows to be unjust; specious sophistries are advanced and are attempted to be supported by partial extracts from the evidence that only serve to pervert the truth.

The report is worthy of its author, and the author is worthily reflected in the report, and the opening speech in this case is worthy of both. When speaking of guards being placed at the polls, and that the only avenue to the ballot-box was over crossed bayonets, the gentleman had not the fairness to say that the guards were placed there at the request of the contestant, and that they were, so far as the evidence shows, his political friends, and that they voted for him. When he spoke of Mr. Ensworth, the sheriff, and a candidate for reelection, as a friend of mine, he did not find it necessary to say that he was the candidate on the Union or Bruce ticket—if there was any such in the race—and was running in opposition to the candidate on the unconditional Union ticket which was nominated by a county convention, and on which Colonel Severance, Major Bittenger, and Captain Brierly were candidates, but he was careful to tell you that they were on the ticket with the sitting member, and insinuated that he and they were acting in concert. The gentleman did not state it directly because he knew it was not true. He had the testimony of the witness Abell read to show that there was a list of nine hundred names of persons who were prohibited from voting as he stated. Such was not the case; there was no prohibition against any one voting whom the judges of the election declared entitled to vote, and the gentleman knew such to be the case. The same witness swears that General Hall, who was in command, promised and gave protection to the voters. The gentleman further stated that many of the citizens had been subject to arrest improperly and had had their property improperly seized, and that in consequence there was great fear and terror among the citizens. There is no evidence that will authorize such a statement, nor is it true in fact. The statement in the report in relation to the evidence of Mr. Samuel is a perversion of his testimony, and when I asked the gentleman to read from the record what Mr. Samuel did say, he had not the candor to do it, but declined this act of justice with a sneer.

But I have wasted sufficient time on a subject of such little merit or importance, and must proceed to other matters. A few words in relation to the honorable chairman of the Committee of Elections is next in order; and I regret to see that his seat is vacant at this time.

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman from Missouri will permit me to say that I have no doubt my colleague [Mr. Dawes] would have been in his seat to-day if he had not been called home on business, business assigned for attention before this case came on.

Mr. LOAN. Without questioning or inquiring into the cause, I nevertheless cannot but regret that his seat is vacant.

The chairman of the Committee of Elections was unequal to the task of making a report in this case. His fine legal acquirements and clear, logical mind satisfied him that any adverse report must disregard all pretense to honesty or fairness, and consequently he transferred the task to other hands. It is unfortunate for him that his prudence did not prevent him from participating in this debate. I make no doubt it would have done so had he not become alarmed for the result. He has said that he did not intend to participate in the debate on the merits of the case, and he only changed his mind when it became necessary to use his character and influence to sustain the majority report. Becoming satisfied, as the debate progressed, that the majority in the House was against the report, he entered the contest and determined to win at any cost. In his zeal and recklessness he made statements unwarranted by the facts and entirely at variance with the evidence. He dealt in general assertions, and entirely ignored the record in the case, repudiated the evidence and all rules by which evidence is established, and triumphantly asked if this House would restrict itself to the rules of evidence which limit a justice of the peace at a cross-roads in the trial of a twenty-shilling case. How much worse than idle is it for Congress to pass laws prescribing the manner in which evidence shall be taken in such cases if such laws are not binding; and if the members of this House can innocently disregard the obligations of such laws, they become a positive fraud on the people.

If there is no evidence here to show that any disturbance occurred at the polls at the election in 1862 in the seventh district of Missouri, I ask the gentleman how he knows anything about it. I am sure he was not there in person, and I ask him by what authority, in the absence of all evidence, he can as an honest man cast his vote to disfranchise the district, notwithstanding it is represented here by a member whose right to his seat is evidenced and confirmed by the broad seal of the State. It is true that the gentleman, who is possessed of a lively and brilliant imagination, drew on it for a statement of facts that would have excused him to some extent if the statement had been true, but, like all imaginary sketches, it had no foundation in fact. He made the statement knowing it was false so far as it related to the matter under consideration, and trusted to his hitherto good character to give it currency and weight in the consideration of the case; and I challenge the gentleman or any friend of his to show any evidence or facts that will authorize or justify the statements he has made. He conceded there was none such when he declared that this was a new case and must be disposed of under new rules; when he declared his independence of all rules of evidence, and when he invoked the House to avail themselves of the opportunity which this case offered of spiking the enemy's guns on the charges they were making against the Administration that it was using the military power of the country to carry the elections and secure its party in power; when he declared that this House might be losing the opportunity of removing from the shoulders of the Administration a load that was bearing it down, &c., &c.

Here the motive for the course the gentleman has seen fit to take appears. The enemies of the Administration are making charges against it, that it has been using the military power of the country to carry the elections, and thereby secure its party in power; and these charges are a load on the shoulders of the Administration that is weighing it down, and the members of this House are called to the relief of the Administration, and are urged by the chairman of the Committee of Elections to disregard all law, all the rules of evidence, all the facts in the case, all the obligation resting on the consciences of the members as honest men, to avail themselves of this opportunity to spike the guns of the enemies of the Administration and to remove from its shoulders the load that is weighing it down. If the Administration can be saved, in his opinion it matters little at what sacrifice of honor, truth, or justice its salvation is purchased. I can tell the gentleman that no usurpations at the ballot-boxes in half the congressional districts in the Republic could inflict so great an injury on the freedom of elections as would the disfranchisement, by the action of this House, of a single district where a valid election had been held, that thereby the Administration might spike its enemies' guns or relieve its shoulders of a load that was weighing it down. No, sir; let the validity of the election in this case be tested by the law as applicable to the facts, and let it be honestly decided without considering the effect it will have on the prospects of the Administration. The gentleman said he had forgotten how the sitting member would vote in his consideration of the case; it is to be regretted that he did not forget the interests of the Administration at the same time and also as well the charges its enemies were making against it.

To divert attention from the facts in this case, and as a pretense for the course of action the gentleman has seen proper to take in it, he indulged in a fancy sketch, which he drew in vivid colors, of the disturbed condition of a rebellious district, of the terror that enveloped the awe-stricken inhabitants, of the troops of armed soldiery and of the bristling bayonets, and then, in a rage of righteous indignation assumed for the occasion, he declared that to dignify with the name of an election proceedings had under such surroundings was to blaspheme before the Republic. His whole statement was gratuitous; nothing of the kind stated by him characterized the election in the seventh district in Missouri in 1862.

But I have no time to follow the gentleman further in his speech. It must suffice for me to say that I do not now remember that any statement made by the gentleman, that has an important bearing on the case in hearing, was true in fact. The Administration had no soldiers stationed in the seventh district in Missouri at the time of the election in 1862, and the gentleman knew it. There was no military authority, State or Federal, which authorized any one to exercise a censorship over the polls or over the action of the voters. The only military force that was in the district was under State authority, and was by an order (No. 45) of the Governor, issued two weeks prior to the election, subordinated to the civil officers, and it was prohibited from any interference in any way with the election, unless called on by the civil officers to aid them in enforcing the laws.

State senators, members of the Legislature, sheriffs, and other officers under the laws of the State were elected at the same election which was held for the election of members to Congress. No one has ever doubted the fairness of the election of these officers or questioned their right to discharge the duties of their office.

The chairman of the Committee of Elections made a reply to a question asked him by the gentleman from West Virginia, which demands especial attention from me. When asked by the gentleman from West Virginia if the sitting member did not receive a majority of more than 2,000 votes, the chairman of the Committee of Elections replied in substance that the sitting member might have counted up just as many votes as he pleased, and instead of having only a majority of 2,000 votes he wondered it was not 4,000.

It will be remembered that I had left the district in August, did not become a candidate for Congress until October, and did not return to the district until long after the election in November; that I made the race as an independent candidate; that I did not act in concert with any other candidate; and when it is further understood that it is not even pretended that any one vote of that majority had not been properly cast by a qualified voter, one can begin to comprehend what a stupendous calumny and foul slander the gentleman has recklessly, wantonly, and wickedly inflicted upon one whose moral character has ever been preserved as pure and unsullied as has that of any gentleman on this floor or elsewhere. The only deserving or proper reply that could be made to the statement of the gentleman is the epithet that Colonel Benton once applied to Pettit of Indiana;* but as I am inclined to think the language would not, as a general rule, be parliamentary, I will not use it; but if any gentleman will furnish me with a parliamentary phrase that will express the same idea I will thank him for the suggestion. A political guerrilla who flies a friendly flag that thereby he may the more safely and surely strike a fatal blow. The gentleman has fairly earned and no doubt will receive the scorn and contempt of every honest man; and here I leave this unpleasant subject.

Now, in conclusion, the contestant has been allowed a year to collect and take his evidence. No obstructions have been interposed. It is in vain for him to say that it was unsafe for him to visit certain localities in the district to take testimony. It only shows the detestation in which he is conscious the loyal people hold him and his disloyal sentiments, but it is no evidence that they would interfere with him. He could have taken evidence in any part of the district, at any time, in perfect safety, but there being no evidence to take, it suited his purpose to pretend that it could not have been taken. The statements by the witnesses that they believed the evidence could not have been taken, only show their credulity and cowardice, if nothing worse. In point of fact, at the judicial election last November, the time referred to by some of the witnesses, the military force on duty in the seventh congressional district was composed of disloyal men and officers, with rare exceptions, many of whom had served in the rebel armies, or as guerrillas and bushwhackers.

With the most untiring energy and industry the contestant has been unable to show by anything approaching legitimate evidence that fifty legal voters of the district who offered to vote for a Representative in Congress were from any cause prevented from doing so, and I challenge the gentleman who will close this argument to show the names of any voters beyond that number who offered to vote and were refused permission to do so, and it is evident that the gentleman who drew the majority report was painfully conscious of the fact and felt the necessity of avoiding its force, therefore he attempted it by a series of comparisons of the numbers of the votes polled in 1860 with those polled in 1862, and thereby has endeavored inferentially to show that a considerable number of voters were prevented by force from voting. The discrepancy is admitted; it amounted to more than seventy thousand in the State; but the inference that the discrepancy was occasioned by reason of any disturbance at the polls is denied.

I would ask the gentleman why he left out of the account any estimate of those who had entered the rebel army and of those who had entered the Federal service but did not vote, of those who had been killed, and of those who had removed from the State on account of the disturbed condition of the country, or of those who within the previous three months had enrolled themselves as sympathizers with the rebellion, and who were not willing so soon to commit perjury, as they would have done if they had taken the convention oath so as to qualify themselves for voting. These causes will account for any discrepancies in the votes of the two years as readily and as plausibly as the supposition that the voters were prevented from voting by force; but they would not answer the purposes of the gentleman quite so well, hence they were not considered or estimated in the comparison. I would further ask my mathematical friend, who has the skill of combining figures so ingeniously as to make them show any result he may desire, to account for the deficiency in the State of 70,000 votes at the election of 1862 out of 155,000 polled in 1860. There is no pretense that there was any disturbance at the polls in six of the nine districts in the State at the election of 1862, yet the vote is less in every other district in the State than it was in the seventh district, and in this district the relative deficiency was less by fifty per cent. than it was in any other district excepting that of Mr. Blow's, and after the cause of this deficiency in these districts has been ascertained I would respectfully ask him to put the proper credit to the seventh district to which it is entitled from the same cause, and I make no doubt but the balance then shown by the figures to be the number who were prevented from voting by violence will precisely coincide with the number as shown by the evidence, and in the aggregate will be less than fifty votes in either case.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, I had some thought of addressing the House on this subject, but the previous question having been sustained I cannot do so now. I desire to send to the Clerk's desk and have read an abstract of the vote in my own city at three different elections, for President in 1860, for Governor in 1861, and again for Governor in 1863, when there was no pretext of military invasion or interference with elections.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BRUCE, (contestant.) I trust my friend from Wisconsin will not object.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I will take the responsibility. I raise the question of order that there is no connection between the subject before the House and the vote given in a city in Ohio. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] sends to the Clerk's desk to be read a statement of the vote in his district, which has nothing to do with the subject before the House. I object to it as out of order.

Mr. LOAN. I ask that it be read as part of my speech.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the report of the majority of the Committee of Elections opens a wide range of discussion. The gentleman from Wisconsin is correct in saying that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] would not have a right to have the paper read. But the Chair thinks that the gentleman himself [Mr. Loan] would have a right to read almost anything bearing on elections. While the Chair sustains the point of order as against the gentleman from Ohio, he thinks the sitting member would have a right to read anything relating to elections bearing on the case.

Mr. ASHLEY. Does the Chair decide that I have not a right to read that paper myself?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the gentleman from Ohio is not entitled to the floor. The sitting member cannot yield, because, by order of the House, the sitting member is to have the floor, and nobody else.

The paper was then read, as follows:

Aggregate vote in the city of Toledo for President in 1860, for Governor in 1861, and for Governor in 1863. In 1860 there were but four wards in the city. They have since been divided, and there are now six wards.

	1860.	1861.	1863.
First Ward.....	459	154	528
Second Ward.....	581	230	707
Third Ward.....	643	192	630
Fourth Ward.....	676	140	621
Fifth Ward.....	—	122	471
Sixth Ward.....	—	43	160
Entire vote.....	2,559	881	3,117

Mr. LOAN. Mr. Speaker, this is a fair illustration of the reliability to be placed on the comparison of votes at different times. It shows that against 2,559 votes cast in Toledo in 1860 there were but 881 votes cast in 1861, and that again in 1863 the vote was 3,117, all the elections being important ones. And yet that comparison is sought to be made the basis for determining the force used to prevent men from voting in the seventh congressional district of Missouri.

The whole argument based upon the comparison of votes is hardly worthy of its author. It is false without being even ingenious, and is a mere subterfuge, resorted to to supply an obvious gap in the evidence; a weak and puerile attempt to show that voters were kept from the polls by strained inferences which are not warranted by any facts proven in the case. The legal and competent evidence which has been taken, so far from showing any interference with the fairness and freedom of the election, shows clearly that the most wise and prudent measures were carefully and properly taken to secure a free and full expression of the popular will at the polls, and that these measures were enforced with unusual skill and success by General Hall is manifest by the very large vote polled in the district—it being the largest vote polled in any congressional district in the State, not excepting the St. Louis districts; and the percentage of loss is less by nearly one half than it is in any other district except Mr. Blow's. The vote in the several counties composing the congressional districts in Missouri in 1860 compares with the vote of 1862 as follows:

District.	1860.	1862.	Loss.
1.....	21,715	10,869	10,846
2.....	11,160	9,468	1,692
3.....	12,713	5,522	7,191
4.....	15,754	4,478	11,276
5.....	18,370	9,263	9,107
6.....	18,755	9,370	9,385
7.....	18,235	13,701	4,534
8.....	19,410	11,778	7,632
9.....	19,035	10,498	8,537
Loss in the State.....			70,201

From the foregoing it will be seen that the vote in the seventh district was in 1862 13,701 votes, which I believe is a greater number of votes than the average number of votes polled in the several congressional districts at the corresponding election in the populous and quiet State of Massachusetts. If it were possible for a doubt yet to linger in the mind of any that the election of 1862 was not a fair one, or that the loyal people of the seventh district in Missouri are not truly represented in this House, I would further say that at an election for judges of the supreme court, held in Missouri last November, I for the first time canvassed the district on behalf of the radical candidates; and notwithstanding the combined power and influence of the Federal Government as represented by General Schofield, and of the State government aided by the pawpaw militia, organized from the disloyal element of the State, including returned soldiers from the rebel army, bushwhackers, and guerrillas, who were armed by Federal authority, five companies of which were organized in my own county within the eight weeks preceding the election, in which companies I do not believe there were five loyal men, and when guards were required at the polls they were detailed for that service from these disloyal troops, yet the district cast 4,500 majority for the radical candidates for supreme judges; but the frauds were too overpowering in other parts of the State, and, by disfranchising a majority of the soldiers who voted, the certificates of election were issued to the conservative candidates.

In view of this radical majority of 4,500 votes cast by the seventh district under such circumstances, I ask the gentlemen who make the majority report in this case what they expect to accomplish by sustaining that report except to have this House stultify itself by disfranchising a loyal district that the Administration may thereby spike the guns of its enemies. I would prefer that it should not be done on the terms proposed.

Mr. BRUCE took the floor.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say in behalf of my colleague [Mr. GANSON] that he was called home, not by private business but by public business, and he could not remain here any longer.

Mr. BRUCE, (contestant.) The gentleman read from one vote and I read from another. In the official evidence which has been referred to this House the vote in the seventh congressional district of Missouri in 1860 is stated at 21,938, instead of 18,000, as he read from his statement of the vote. He is accurate from his table and I am accurate from my table. He takes the congressional vote and I take presidential vote. He says that the falling off of the vote in our district was less than the falling off in other districts in the State. I want the House to understand the position of the seventh congressional district of Missouri. It borders upon Kansas and Iowa, and I boldly assert that it is the most loyal district in the State of Missouri and that fewer men went into the rebel army from that district than from any other. We had a population in that district composed almost entirely of men who are not slaveholders, and the counties in which the sitting member received the largest number of his votes were the most disloyal counties in the district. The circumstances in our district were different from those in the district of the gentleman [Mr. BOYD] who succeeds Hon. John S. Phelps, who was so long a valuable Representative in this House. There war and devastation had existed, armies had passed through it and devastated the country, but in our district no such thing existed. Since September, 1861, we have been entirely free from invasion by any rebel force, except upon one occasion when Poindexter passed through our district in the rear of the brigade commanded by the sitting member, and eluded him.

I regret, sir, that the sitting member has seen fit to denounce the chairman of the Committee of Elections, [Mr. DAWES], a gentleman who stands deservedly high, not only in Massachusetts, but throughout the United States, for his integrity and fairness. He has shown upon this occasion that he thought more of principle and the rightful discharge of his duties than of his obligations to his party or of saving a vote here. I honor him, and I tell you the names of Dawes and Baxter will be heralded through the State of Missouri and remembered long as men who have risen above all such considerations and stood by principle. I tell you, gentlemen, that if you retain this gentleman in his seat you will incur the denunciations of those who have nurtured him into existence and have felt his poisoned sting. I have felt it, for at the hour of midnight, when I was toiling in my newspaper office, he came to me and asked me to sustain him for the office of brigadier general, as my paper was regarded as the organ of the Union sentiment. I did so. I wrote an article which met his approval, and he went to St. Louis and received the appointment from Governor Gamble. When he returned home

I got up an ovation to him and made the welcoming speech. In less than three months he turned upon me and united with my enemies to sting the bosom of the man who had warmed him into life. It was an illustration of the fable of the frozen snake. Again, Governor Gamble appointed him to the office of brigadier general and tendered him that of supreme judge. After holding the office of brigadier general for eighteen months he so deported himself that he had to be removed from the position to which he had been appointed, and then after having enjoyed the position to which Governor Gamble had appointed him and received the pay, he went through our congressional district and through a large part of the State denouncing that old man who went down to his grave with honor from the most loyal men of the country.

There is another exemplification of his turning upon his benefactor. The paper that supported him for Congress, and to the efforts of which he was more indebted for his election than to anything else, the St. Joseph's Herald, when he commenced his canvass for the Senate of the United States was not willing to desert Mr. HENDERSON and go for him, and thereupon he impugned the loyalty of the editor of that paper, and turned upon him, and with his own money and that of his friends set up another paper to crush the Herald, in which he has so signally failed.

Sir, I tell you that the chairman of the Committee of Elections is as pure and honest a man as God ever made, and his record here shows it; and yet the sitting member has seen proper to make a most bitter and unparliamentary assault denouncing that gentleman; a man who when put into the scale with him is as high as Olympus as compared with the position he occupies here by fraud and violence, and by driving the people from the polls. Sir, I have aspired from my youth up to a seat in this Hall. It is an honorable ambition; but I have never expected to get here except by honorable means. I never expected to get here by driving the qualified voters from the polls. I expected to reach a seat here by the performance of such services as I have been able to render to my country during this rebellion, and probably I have been incited to additional exertions in order to recommend myself to my constituents. The position of Congressman is an honorable and elevated one, and I have an ambition to fill that position, but I tell you that I will never sacrifice principle and self-respect to obtain a seat upon this floor, or resort to violence and fraud for the attainment of the end.

The sitting member seeks to escape from the responsibility for the force and fraud proven in this case by saying that he was not present when these occurrences took place; but in his anxious desire to hold on to his seat, in his persistent retention of it, he indorses the whole proceedings, and is welcome to all the honor he can gain by it if you choose to retain him in his seat here; but I would scorn to obtain the position on such terms. Why is the sitting member unwilling to go back to his constituency for another election? It will be but a little loss to this House or the Republican party. This affects not only this but several other districts in Missouri. Not only did his terrorism override the laws in this district, but in several other districts.

I have never been a pro-slavery propagandist, and I have been opposed to the agitation of the subject in or out of Congress. I have never made a speech for or against slavery; but I have defended northern men when they have been assailed for their opinions.

The gentleman says that I was allowed to take testimony. Let me read something in reference to that:

SAVANNAH, February 20, 1863.

Editors Morning Herald:

Granny Bruce was in Savannah taking rebel testimony all day to-day, in E. A. Carson's office. Bruce having got wind that the celebrated egg brigade was drilling for his benefit, he concluded not to leave the office until late in the night, when he sneaked off to find lodgings with some one of his kink, and thence made a hasty exit back to St. Joseph on the cars in the morning. Come again, Granny, the brigade is now perfected. Three times three for General Loan, our next Congressman!

A GENERAL LOAN MAN.

"The farce of taking evidence in the contested-election case of Bruce vs. Loan commenced in this city yesterday."

"Is the authority of the Government here powerless, or are its delegated agents recreant to all sense of decency, that such foul proceedings are suffered to continue? We are law-abiding citizens and would not counsel violence; but we are of the opinion that the E. M. M. should not suffer their gallant champion to be so dishonored."—Chillicothe (Missouri) Chronicle, February 28, 1863.

The report of the minority states that there are one hundred and fifty precincts, and that I took testimony in only eight of them. I have shown that I took testimony in twelve precincts, as follows:

Falling off in Precincts.

St. Joseph.....	1,510
Savannah.....	536
Fillmore.....	164
Chillicothe.....	354
Atchison.....	232
De Kalb, (Stewartville).....	184
Greene township.....	119
Jackson.....	217
Grand River.....	118
Oregon.....	321
Forest City.....	177
Mound City.....	135
Falling off.....	4,067

There was more loss in those twelve precincts than in all the remaining one hundred and thirty-eight precincts. The total loss in the twelve precincts, as compared with the vote in 1860 and 1862, is 4,067.

The gentleman says I could have taken testimony. Witnesses swear positively that I could not have taken evidence in the then existing state of things.

It is stated in the reports that there is no proof of what the vote was in Stewartville. I made an effort to get the testimony as to what the vote was there, but the clerk of the election was in the Army, and his deputy could not find the returns. But since the report of the committee was made I have obtained that evidence, and I served a copy of it upon the sitting member that he might not allege that he was taken by surprise. The entire loss in the vote of De Kalb county from 1860 to 1862 was 196 votes, and the loss at Stewartville, where interference is proved to have occurred, was 184 votes of that 196. I give the following official certificate of the clerk:

State of Missouri, County of De Kalb:

I, Ira Brown, clerk of the county court of De Kalb county, Missouri, do hereby certify that the number of votes polled in Washington township of said county at the November election, A. D. 1860, according to the returns now in this office, was 285; and further that the number of votes polled for Benjamin F. Loan and John P. Bruce for Congress at the election in November, 1862, in said township of Washington, was as follows: Benjamin F. Loan received 80 votes and John P. Bruce received 21 votes, and that the total amount of votes polled at said time and place was 101; and further that the precinct at Stewartville was the only voting precinct during the above-named elections in said township.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said court in the office at Maysville this 28th day of March, A. D. 1864.

IRA BROWN, Clerk.

I have here the tables which appear in the report of the committee, and they show that where there was no disturbance I had a majority over the sitting member of 1,047 votes, and Colonel Branch 447.

I tell you this election has been carried by violence and fraud. I assert, and I have furnished the proof, that the sitting member holds his seat by fraud. You may sanction it, and I shall acquiesce; but if there had been a fair election I should have been the Representative in this Congress. I ask you to deal justly. I think the services I have rendered to the Union cause since the beginning of this rebellion entitle me to a fair trial by both sides. I love my country, and have no higher duty than to stand by its flag upon all and every occasion; and I hope when I go home I shall be able to carry such a report as will accord with their sense of propriety and justice.

Now, gentlemen, all I ask at your hands is that you shall deal with me as I have dealt with your people when I have been placed in a position that I could be of service to them. I have always believed in the justice of the northern people. I have always believed that it was my duty to stand by the Government. I have never arrayed one section against the other, and I can say from my heart that while I may have fallen short in the performance of other Christian duties, I never oppressed a human being in my life, and none ever received injustice at my hands.

Sir, I owe to all gentlemen on both sides of the House my cordial thanks for the kindness and consideration with which I have been treated. I shall remember it long. I am deeply indebted to you for it. Whatever may be the result of this case I shall carry with me from this Hall a lively recollection of the kindness of gentlemen of both political parties. My purpose is to go home and do my duty to that flag which waves over the Speaker's chair. I mean to stand by that flag wherever it waves, for good or for evil. I have stood by it in times past in my own country when it has been reared by the side of the rebel flag.

Gentlemen here have never experienced and hence cannot appreciate the perils which we of the border States have encountered in standing up for the Constitution of the country, the union of the States, and the enforcement of the laws. We have gone for our country "one and indivisible." This is my platform.

The SPEAKER stated the question to be upon agreeing to the first resolution reported by the Committee of Elections, and which is as follows: Resolved, That Benjamin F. Loan is not entitled to a seat in this House as Representative from the seventh congressional district of Missouri.

Mr. UPSON. If that resolution is voted down, will that confirm the sitting member in his seat?

The SPEAKER. It requires a majority vote of the House to oust the sitting member from his seat. If the resolution is voted down the sitting member will continue in his seat.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. I demand the yeas and nays on agreeing to the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ANCONA. I move that there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read from the 132d rule.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"A call of the House shall not be in order after the previous question is seconded, unless it shall appear, upon an actual count by the Speaker, that no quorum is present."

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been seconded, the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not in order unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. ANCONA. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. FENTON. I object.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ANCONA. I demand the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 3, nays 128; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benjamin G. Harris, Robinson, and Stiles—3.

NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Boutwell, Boyd, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Coffroth, Cole, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Deming, Driggs, Eden, Eldridge, Eliot, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Finck, Garfield, Gooch, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburt, Huchins, Jenecke, Kelley, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, King, Law, Lazar, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Long, Longyear, Marcy, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, McDowell, McIndoe, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Steele, Stevens, Sweet, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Voorhees, Wadsworth, William B. Washburne, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—128.

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the roll-call,

Mr. MOORHEAD stated that his colleague, Mr. WILLIAMS, was paired with his other colleague, Mr. SROUSE.

Mr. POMEROY stated that his colleague, Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH, was paired with Mr. MALORY.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

The question recurred on the first resolution reported by the Committee of Elections, on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 59, nays 71; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Baxter, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Coffroth, Cravens, Dawson, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Grider, Griswold, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Law, Le Blond, Long, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Tracy, Upson, William B. Washburne, Whaley, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—71.

So the resolution was not agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, stated that his colleague, Mr. DAWES, had been called home by unavoidable business, and had informed him that he was paired off with Mr. JULIAN.

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker, I ought to have said when my name was called that I was paired with Mr. DAWES on last Friday and Saturday during my absence at Annapolis. The pair was limited by me to these two days, but Mr. DAWES, it seems, understands me to be paired on this question generally. He is mistaken in this, as I expressly confined the arrangement to the two days named. I therefore vote on the question pending.

Mr. L. MYERS stated that his colleague, Mr. THAYER, was paired off with Mr. ROGERS.

Mr. STEELE, of New York, stated that Mr. STEELE, of New Jersey, was paired off with Mr. BLOW.

Mr. PERRY stated that he was paired off with Mr. FRANK.

Mr. SWEAT stated that he was paired off with Mr. BLAINE.

Mr. ASHLEY stated that his colleague, Mr. ECKLEY, was paired off with his other colleague, Mr. J. W. WHITE; that Mr. DONNELLY was paired off with Mr. CHILTON A. WHITE; and that Mr. HOLMAN was paired off with Mr. DUMONT.

Mr. FARNSWORTH stated that his colleague, Mr. WASHBURN, was paired off with his other colleague, Mr. KNAPP.

Mr. ASHLEY stated that he had been asked by Mr. GANSON to get him a pair, and he had paired him off with Mr. MARVIN, who had gone home.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. UPSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution had been rejected; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That John P. Bruce is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the seventh congressional district of Missouri.

Mr. UPSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the last resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISPATCH FROM GENERAL BUTLER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following dispatch, which he had received from the Secretary of War:

HEADQUARTERS IN THE FIELD,
NEAR BERMUDA LANDING, May 9, 1864.

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War:

Our operations may be summed up in a few words.

With seventeen hundred cavalry we have advanced up the Peninsula, forced the Chickahominy, and have safely brought them to our present position. These were colored cavalry, and are now holding our advanced pickets toward Richmond.

General Kautz, with three thousand cavalry from Suffolk, on the same day with our movement up James river, forced the Blackwater, burned the railroad bridge at Stony creek, below Petersburg, cutting in two Beauregard's force at that point.

We have landed here, intrenched ourselves, destroyed many miles of railroad, and got a position which, with proper supplies, we can hold out against the whole of Lee's army. I have ordered up the supplies.

Beauregard, with a large portion of his command, was left south by the cutting of the railroads by Kautz. That portion which reached Petersburg under Hill, I have whipped to-day, killing and wounding many and taking many prisoners, after a severe and well-contested fight.

General Grant will not be troubled with any further reinforcements to Lee from Beauregard's forces.

BENJ. F. BUTLER, Major General.

[The news was greeted with great applause upon the floor and in the galleries.]

The SPEAKER stated that applause was not in order, and that he felt it to be his duty to enforce the rules on all occasions.

UNEMPLOYED GENERALS.

The next business in order was the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs in regard to unemployed generals.

Mr. KASSON. I ask unanimous consent to take up the amendments of the Senate to the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask whether those amendments will take up more than the remaining portion of to-day's session?

Mr. KASSON. I do not think that they will occupy more than the balance of this evening.

BUSINESS OF THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent of the House that Wednesday of next week, after the morning hour, be set apart for the reception of reports from the Committee on the Judiciary. We have not been able to report for two or three months.

Mr. PENDLETON. I object.

A. GUTHRIE.

Mr. SMITH, by unanimous consent, moved that the Committee of Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of A. Guthrie, praying to be allowed mileage and per diem as a Delegate from Nebraska, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSULAR, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KASSON. I move that by unanimous consent the House take up the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 40, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1865, and consider them in the House as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

There was no objection, and the motion was agreed to.

First amendment:

For the contribution of the United States to the completion of a new cemetery at Constantinople, to receive the remains of American citizens transferred from an old burial-place, and also as a place for future interments, $1,800.

The SPEAKER stated that the Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Second amendment:

Strike out the word in [brackets] and insert the words in italics in the following:

For salaries of consuls general, consuls, [and] commercial agents, and twenty-five consular pupils, namely.

The SPEAKER stated that the Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Third amendment:

And the consul general at Alexandria shall have the name and title of agent and consul general.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended a concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate from the fourth to the twenty-seventh, both inclusive, were as follows, in which the Committee of Ways and Means recommended a concurrence:

Strike out the parts within [brackets] and insert the parts in italics.

III. CONSULATES.

Schedule B.

VI. COMMERCIAL AGENCIES.

Schedule C.

Apia, [Monrovia,] Saint Paul de Loando, including loss by exchange thereon, four hundred and [fifty thousand] seventy-seven thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. BROOKS. The sixth amendment is to insert Brindisi. I do not see the necessity for that. When I was there a few years ago there was hardly enough to hold the consulate.

Mr. KASSON. Brindisi has increased in magnitude and commercial importance by the extension of the system of Italian railroads to that city; a line of mail steamers has been established connecting Brindisi with Alexandria and the overland route to the East Indies.

The amendments were severally concurred in.

Twenty-eighth amendment:

Insert:

And the salaries of the consuls at Brindisi, Gibraltar, St. Helena, Boulogne, Zurich, Clifton, Conticook, Erie, Goderich, Kingston in Canada, Port Sania, Prescott, Saint Lambert and Longueuil, Toronto, and Windsor, shall be $1,500 each; and the salaries of the consuls at Ceylon and Piræus shall be $1,000 each; and the salary of the consul at Chin Kiang shall be $3,000; and the salary of the consul at Bangkok shall be $2,000; and the salary of the commercial agent at Madagascar shall be $2,000; and the salary of the consul at Nassau shall be $3,000, to commence after the close of the present fiscal year, and to continue during the present rebellion; and the salary of the consul at Lyons shall be $2,000, to commence after the close of the present fiscal year; and the salary of the consul at Manchester shall be $3,000, to commence after the close of the present fiscal year.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended a non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Twenty-ninth amendment:

Add as a new section:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the second section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1853," approved February 7, 1857, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. KASSON. I ask that by general consent this amendment, which is the only one which is likely to give rise to debate, be passed over informally in order that we may dispose of the remainder of the amendments. Then the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. PATTERSON,] who it seems has risen to speak to this amendment, can take the floor upon it.

No objection being made, the amendment was passed over informally.

Thirtieth amendment:

Add the following as a new section:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President may, in his discretion, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the kingdom of Belgium, who shall receive no higher compensation than is now allowed to a minister resident.

The SPEAKER. The committee recommend a concurrence.

Mr. PRUYN. I wish to inquire of this committee in reference to this matter of salary as connected with the new mission to Belgium. If it be proper to create it, I hope the proper salary will be attached to it. If we intend to compliment the King of Belgium, as it is claimed, by the appointment of a minister of higher rank, we ought to pay him a proper salary, because if we pay this small amount this year, certainly before long the Government will ask an appropriation of that kind to be made. It ought to be made at once, in my judgment, and I am ready to vote in favor of a full salary.

Mr. STEVENS. For my own part, I would rather leave the matter as it is. Belgium is not of so very great importance. We have now a minister resident there, and why we should make him a minister plenipotentiary, I cannot understand.

Mr. MORRILL. I trust the House will not agree to the proposition of the Senate. It is very clear that if we do agree and raise the grade of the officer, ere long we will be compelled to raise the salary. I do not understand that the kingdom of Belgium is of sufficient importance to have a minister there of equal grade with those we send to England and France. If we are to raise the grade we ought manifestly to raise the salary. If a year or two hence we should send a man to represent the United States at that place, we shall be compelled either to lower the grade or to raise the salary. Now I am opposed to giving a grade to a man simply because he, out of his own private fortune, can maintain the dignity of the office, when the United States itself is unwilling to support the office by a salary equal to the grade we designated. We might thus save the dignity of the officer but we should lose our own. I trust the House will not agree to any such amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I desire that the House may fully understand the question before they take a vote upon it. The committee, as will be seen, at first recommended the adoption of the amendment of the Senate with an amendment giving the minister the same salary that belongs to the same grade at Berlin and Vienna. We have now different salaries for that same grade at the different courts of Europe, ranging from $17,500 down to $12,000, and in South America ranging down to $10,000. The amendment proposes to authorize the establishment of this grade in Belgium with a salary not exceeding $7,500. This is recommended by the Secretary of State, it is recommended by the Senate; and the Committee of Ways and Means, on a reconsideration, recommend the action without the increase of salary.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask my colleague whether the Committee of Ways and Means as a committee have acted upon the matter at all?

Mr. KASSON. I understand that the committee, in the presence of my friend, the other morning discussed and acted upon the subject, and I understood myself instructed by the committee to agree to the amendment without an increase of salary.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not understand that the committee had any consultation upon the subject.

Mr. KASSON. It was done in open committee in the presence of the chairman, and was participated in by all, as I understood the matter. But I leave that matter, as there seems to be a difference of opinion between us.

When this subject was up in the Senate a similar debate was raised in the Senate, and objection was taken to the fact that the Committee on Foreign Affairs recommended it, but that the Executive Department of the Government did not recommend it, and the Finance Committee, or at least a part of them, had the same kind of a contest with the Committee on Foreign Affairs upon that subject.

Mr. PRUYN. I wish to ask the honorable gentleman from Iowa what is the object of this provision when the President now has the power to make such a nomination?

Mr. KASSON. I will answer the gentleman in a moment. As I said just now, that difficulty was presented in the Senate at the time this question was discussed there. The Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House, however, in their communication with the State Department, called for a statement of the views of that Department upon the subject, and I have here the answer of the Secretary of State, by the courtesy of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which I will submit to be read to the House, first, however, answering the gentleman from New York. The President has power to raise the grade of the minister, under the existing law, but he has not the power to raise it except upon the condition of raising the salary to that which is paid to diplomatic officers of the same grade under the old law.

Mr. PRUYN. I referred to the constitutional right of the President to nominate such a person.

Mr. KASSON. I think the gentleman overlooks the point of this provision, which is not to allow him to send a minister there of that grade, but to give him the right to do it without an increase of salary. The gentleman has, perhaps, overlooked the law, which was passed some years ago, (1856,) which authorized the appointment of diplomatic officers of a certain grade and fixed their salaries in all other countries than those specified in that law at $10,000 per annum. Hence the President cannot establish this grade at the court of Belgium without, at the same time, establishing the pay at $10,000.

Now, the Secretary of State has, I think with very commendable prudence and economy, endeavored to check any increased expenditure in his Department that is not absolutely necessary.

Mr. PRUYN. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this clause does not provide that if the President shall nominate and the Senate confirm the appointment of a minister to Belgium of this grade the salary shall be so much.

Mr. KASSON. The end of the section does provide that very thing. It gives the President power to appoint a minister there of this grade without any increase of pay.

Mr. PRUYN. The gentleman does not seem to see my point. It is that the President has the power now, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint a minister to Belgium of this grade, and it will then be for Congress to say that his salary shall be so and so.

Mr. KASSON. I think I answered the point of the gentleman from New York before. The President has power to appoint this officer now, but he cannot do it without at the same time increasing the expenditure and giving him a salary beyond what is provided for by this bill. This provision is only intended to enable him to raise the grade without increasing the expenditure.

I now send to the Clerk's desk to be read a communication from the Secretary of State relating to this subject.

The Clerk read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.
WASHINGTON, March 23, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of this date, representing that you had been directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to request me to inform them if the existing circumstances of the country require that the grade or pay of any of our ministers and consuls should be raised; and if so, to specify the changes which in my opinion are advisable.

In reply, I have the honor to state that it is deemed advisable, on grounds of high public expediency, to authorize the grade of minister resident at Brussels to be raised to that of envoy-extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary. This has been repeatedly requested by the Belgian Government, which has for several years past been represented here by a minister of the highest grade. The reciprocity may, therefore, be considered due on grounds of international comity and courtesy. It would also be a well-merited compliment to the present sovereign of that country, who has shown himself to be a true friend of ours, and from whom we have asked and received favors as an arbiter between us and other Powers, which have imposed great labor and responsibilities upon him which he has faithfully discharged. The Department would have heretofore more strenuously recommended the change referred to, but for an impression that it would involve an increase of the expense of the mission. This, however, is not necessarily the case, as the grade of the mission may be authorized to be raised upon condition that the compensation of the minister shall not be increased.

Hon. HENRY WINTER DAVIS, Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives.

Mr. KASSON. That explains the reasons why the Executive Department desire this change. Gentlemen will observe that it has been expected by the Government of Belgium for some years that this would be done. It was asked for near the close of the last Administration. They then sent a full minister to this Government, and have expected it in return.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means a question. I desire to know whether this mission to Belgium is not of so little importance that the minister can come away and be absent from his post and travel through this country and remain away for a long time and leave all the business to his secretary? I would inquire further if the present minister is not now absent from his post?

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I have desired, if possible, to keep this debate free from any personal allusion to the minister now occupying that post. The Secretary of State in his communications rests upon no such ground. That minister is now in this country, as I understand, on important private business. He is in Michigan, where he has important landed interests that require his attention. I do not know that for that he deserves reproach. He being so fortunately situated as to have large property to attend to is at home attending to that business. I do not know that he ought to be blamed for it.

Touching one other subject, the importance of the mission, I think that gentlemen cannot fail to perceive that at the court of Belgium there is more diplomatic information of importance to be obtained than at almost any other court in Europe. The present King of Belgium is generally conceded to be the wisest monarch in Europe. He is consulted directly and indirectly by nearly every Government in Europe. Every respectable Power of Europe is represented at that court by full ministers and some of them by ambassadors, in consequence of the importance attached to it. Some republics, too, are represented there by a full minister for reasons which they think satisfactory. The people of Belgium are an active, industrious people; and the commerce between that country and this is increasing to a great extent. An effort is now being made to establish a line of steamers between Antwerp and New York, in order to develop our commercial relations still further.

We ourselves have been committed for years to the character and importance of that court and country by the action of this Government. We have repeatedly referred the matters in arbitration between our country and other Powers to the monarch of Belgium; and in the last case between this country and Chili that monarch was occupied for two years in the examination of it, and his action upon it was so fair and just that the President of this country felt it his duty to address to him an autograph letter of thanks, signifying the high appreciation the Government had of his laborious service. I now ask whether, when that Government has asked this action from us, when it has sent to us a minister of the same grade, when every other respectable Government in Europe is represented there by a minister of that grade, it is the time for us to refuse power to the President to send a minister of that grade? That is the whole point. If a majority of the House thinks that the salary should be increased with the increase of grade, that is another question. But I think when the executive branch of the Government recommends it to be done without increase of pay, when the Senate has resolved that it shall be done without increase of pay, when we all think we ought to economize, I do think that under these circumstances we should give that discretion to the President to increase the grade without at the same time raising the pay of this minister. I beg pardon of the House for detaining it so long, but I believe I have explained the leading facts and points involved in the question.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I have one word to say on this subject. Either give the full pay or do not give the rank. The idea of bedecking the minister with feathers and ribbons for the purpose of making a show and nothing else is not according to my taste. If we ought to have a minister with $17,000 a year, give him that salary, let the President come at once and say that he appoints such an officer. Belgium is a very snug little kingdom. I believe it is nearly if not quite as populous as the State of New York—nearly three millions of people.

Mr. KASSON. Over five millions.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, it has grown lately very fast. I admit that the King of Belgium is an excellent man; but, sir, I do not know that we are to make any difference between a good man or a bad man on the throne there or anywhere else. We are to appoint our ministers by some rule. We have thought heretofore that a minister resident with $7,500 a year had a sufficient salary. The gentleman who is there now is an excellent man I have not a particle of doubt. The $7,500 which he gets in gold does not amount to anything in his pocket. He is rich enough to do without it. But suppose he were to die and it should be my misfortune to be appointed there, I would have to live upon the $7,500, and there are a good many men in my position.

Now, we are not legislating for a wealthy individual. We must legislate according to some general rule. If the gentleman from Iowa will raise the salary according to the rank I will consider it. I will not promise to vote for it, but I can vote for that when I cannot vote for this.

I believe at that place a minister resident, such as we have at two thirds of the courts of Europe, is sufficient, and that there are no circumstances to justify a higher grade of rank unless the President, exercising the power he now has, will make the appointment on his own responsibility, with the salary attached to it. I do not think it is good and wholesome legislation to provide merely for decking a man off in gold lace, feathers, and furbelows; at least it is not such as I mean to vote for.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. PRUYN. I move to strike out the words "who shall receive no higher compensation than is now allowed to a minister resident."

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say that that leaves it exactly according to the existing law.

Mr. PRUYN. That is just where I want to place it.

Mr. KASSON. Then the gentleman should move to strike out the whole section.

Mr. PRUYN. My own impression is that we would do well to appoint a minister of full rank to the court of Belgium. The President has the power at any moment to make that appointment. He has that power under the Constitution if he pleases to exercise it.

The gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] the member of the Committee of Ways and Means who has charge of this bill, did not seem to appreciate the point I made when this section was first read. He proposes here to give authority to the President which he has now under the Constitution. He does not ask it and it is not with us to give. Under the Constitution the President has the power to make such nominations of foreign ministers as he may deem fit. All Congress has to do is to fix the compensation. There is a statute providing that in all cases where the compensation of a minister of full rank is not fixed it shall be $10,000, and the effect of the amendment I propose would be, if the President should make such a nomination, to make that salary $10,000 a year, the same as that of other ministers in Europe, and I believe in South America. The President has the right to make the nomination. I have not the Constitution or I would quote its language, but I believe I am quite right. If we are to have a minister of full rank, and I think on the whole we ought to have, he should have a proper salary. I think it would be a poor compliment to send the King of Belgium a full minister at a reduced salary.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. By this action we not only leave the bill inconsistent with itself, but if we disagree to the Senate amendment it will leave the old law still in force. I trust that the House will have confidence in the action of the Executive, the Senate, and the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and that it will at least signify to the President its disposition to have this thing done without increase of pay. I do not know that the Committee on Foreign Affairs has decided, but I know that several members are in favor of this proposition. And the only desire that I have is to save the Government $2,500 or $5,000, as the case may be. It stands just in this way: the increase of salary is not asked for by the Executive Department, nor by the Senate, nor by the minister, and now, by this action, we save $5,000 or $2,500, as the case may be.

Mr. WILSON. I will ask my colleague if we reject the Senate amendment will not the President appoint a minister plenipotentiary to Belgium?

Mr. KASSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON. Then I would like to know why it is necessary for Congress to act in this matter if the President has already the power to appoint a minister plenipotentiary? To my mind it is conclusive evidence that the President, who now holds the power to make the appointment, believes it is not necessary to have a minister of that rank at that court.

Mr. KASSON. The necessity for this law is that if he does make a minister of that grade he does it at the cost of an increased expenditure to the Treasury, when the dignity of the country does not require an increased appropriation. The law authorizes him to establish the grade now.

Mr. WILSON. The argument which the gentleman now makes is in favor of the appointment of such men, and only such, as have abundant means aside from the salary to maintain a proper position at the court, and therefore it is an argument really against the appointment of men who have not abundant means, and it makes a distinction between citizens of the country. Hence I am opposed to it upon that ground.

Mr. KASSON. It is hardly necessary to meet that argument, which is evidently applicable to another purpose than that to which it is applied. All I have to say is that we have already established different grades, with pay varying from $17,500, as at London and Paris, to $12,000, as at St. Petersburg and Berlin. In South America we pay $10,000. The gentleman's argument applies to the whole system if it applies at all. The court of Belgium is not as expensive a court as some others. For reasons satisfactory to Congress they have established this grade of pay and made it depend upon two things: the importance of the mission and the expense of living at the capital to which the minister is accredited. Under these circumstances, it is no violation at all of the practice of Congress and of the Government in that respect to make this discrimination here. If it becomes necessary hereafter to increase the pay we can increase it as we increased the pay generally a few years ago. It is no departure, therefore, from the uniform practice of the Government to adapt the pay to the circumstances of the court and the importance of it.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KASSON. I have no objection, if the gentleman will ask me a sincere one.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not desire to ask any but a sincere question. The gentleman says he admits that the Government is not in a situation now to raise the pay equal to the grade of the minister. Then does it not follow that we are proposing here to put upon an officer whom we send abroad an expense which we confess we are not able to afford?

Mr. KASSON. I do not see it. On the contrary, there is no additional expense imposed upon him, that I am aware of, by this change of grade. But it does facilitate greatly the transaction of business at foreign courts to have a minister of a high grade. I have seen our minister at one court detained for hours in an ante-room waiting for ministers of a higher grade who came after him to get through their business with the foreign minister before he could attend to that of our minister. I submit, therefore, that when there is a practical advantage in the discharge of business, when this matter of etiquette is a stubborn fact which we cannot get over, when it is part of the law of the administration of foreign courts, whether we should not yield to it, as we may do without cost to our Government, and at the same time increase the dignity of this Republic at a foreign court. I speak of what I have seen and what I know when I say that hours upon hours have been lost—because of this law of etiquette, which is as unchangeable as the law of the Medes and Persians—by our ministers, who wait while the higher grades take precedence.

Mr. STEVENS. May I inquire of my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means whether at these courts our ministers are so much engaged every hour of the day that they cannot afford to wait?

Mr. KASSON. I think the gentleman knows well enough that abroad, even as here at our own plain, republican court, at the foreign offices they have one day in the week to receive foreign ministers and transact their business. If the business is not transacted on the Thursday or Saturday on which the minister calls it lies over for another week, unless indeed he goes through the form of a special request, supplicating an appointment for another intermediate day, and receiving an answer fixing the time, which involves a good deal of labor and etiquette.

Mr. WILSON. Would not that argument require an increase in the rank of all our ministers abroad?

Mr. KASSON. No, because some of our ministers are of the highest rank, and some of less rank have no trouble at inferior courts.

Mr. WILSON. All those of subordinate rank must meet with similar difficulties.

Mr. KASSON. No; some are at courts of by no means the same importance. Take Switzerland, for example; there is less court etiquette there and we have much less business there than we have at the court of Belgium. Brussels is one of the great diplomatic centers of Europe.

Mr. WILSON. Does my colleague think that the business interests of this country will suffer unless we increase the grade of this mission?

Mr. KASSON. I think that the business will be delayed, and that the good opinion in regard to our country of the King of the Belgians will be affected by a refusal of this courtesy. If my colleague listened to the reading of the letter of the Secretary of State he will have noticed what is there stated, that near the close of the last Administration the Belgian Government asked that we should accredit a full minister to that court. We all know that we are not only under obligations of courtesy to the King of the Belgians but that we are under higher obligations to him, especially since the war broke out.

Mr. PRUYN. I wish to call the attention of the House, in the first place, to a preliminary point, and then I will make a proposition which I think will meet the views of the member of the Committee of Ways and Means who has this bill in charge.

By the Constitution of the United States the President is vested with full power in regard to this matter and we have none. I will read that clause of the Constitution:

"He [the President] shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and other officers."

It has always been claimed that, under that clause of the Constitution, this Congress had no power to pass upon questions of the rank of foreign ministers. The President nominates to a foreign court either a chargé d'affaires, or a minister resident, or a minister plenipotentiary. He does what he pleases in that regard. It then remains with Congress to say what salary they will pay.

Now, I think, with regard to this particular case, that if we make any change, and I think a change might well be made, we ought to give a proper salary, or it is no compliment to the King of the Belgians to make the change; at any rate the value of the compliment is much diminished. What I think we ought to do, and what I am prepared to vote for if the gentleman who represents the Committee of Ways and Means will make the proposition, is to appropriate $12,000 for the purpose of paying the salary of a minister of full rank to the court of Belgium, provided the President and Senate shall make the appointment.

Now, sir, a word with regard to the expense of a residence at the court of Belgium. Formerly the cost of a residence at Brussels was very much less than at Paris or at any of the great courts of Europe; and that city, even within a very few years past, became the residence of a large number of English persons who went there for the purpose of living at less expense than they could do at home. But things have very much changed, and now the cost of living at Brussels is substantially the same as at Paris or London. I may be permitted to say, and I do not think it a violation of private confidence to say, with reference to the present minister to Belgium, that during the last year he has spent three or four times the amount of his salary.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from New York will allow me to say that a portion of that sum has been expended in the purchase of some very fine guns that were furnished to our soldiers in the Northwest and are now in the service.

Mr. PRUYN. I did not take this into account. There is a large expenditure behind which I did not say anything about. It strikes me, Mr. Speaker, that we should make a liberal arrangement with all our ministers to Europe, especially in the present condition of our country. My reasoning is exactly the reverse of that of other gentlemen in this House. I think it is one of the greatest mistakes this country has made that two years ago when the Secretary of State recommended a large appropriation for the purpose of sending commissioners to the international exhibition at London this House refused to make it. I think we should have then given the world to understand that, notwithstanding the great struggle in which we are engaged, all our vitality still exists. We should have sent out a commission to that exhibition that would have maintained the high standing and influence of this country.

And so, Mr. Speaker, with reference to our ministers to Europe, I am in favor of maintaining them in their full efficiency and character, and of giving them everything necessary to influence public opinion in Europe in regard to this country, its present condition and future prospects. I trust if we make any change at all we will make a change that will be a thorough one, and give our ministers not only the proper rank but the proper salary. If it is not done this year it will be done the next. My amendment is as follows:

Strike out section three and insert in lieu thereof the following:

The sum of $12,000 be and the same is hereby appropriated to pay the salary of an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the kingdom of Belgium, if the President in the exercise of his constitutional power shall see fit to appoint such officer.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move that the House do now adjourn.

RECEIPTS, ETC., OF TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement showing the receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1863; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOOPER offered a resolution that one hundred and fifty copies of the statement of receipts and expenditures prepared by the Register of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1863, be printed for the use of the Secretary of the Treasury; which was referred under the rule to the Committee on Printing.

The question was put on Mr. Davis's motion; and it was agreed to.

The House thereupon (at half past four o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 11, 1864.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ELECTION OF CHAPLAIN.

In pursuance of the order made on Monday last the Senate proceeded to the election of a Chaplain, with the following result:

Rev. Thos. Bowman, D. D., received 24 votes.

Rev. E. H. Gray received 15 votes.

Rev. Dr. BOWMAN, having received a majority of the votes cast, was declared to be duly chosen Chaplain for the Senate.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a petition of Commodore W. D. Porter, United States Navy, on the subject, reported a bill (S. No. 273) to compensate the officers and crew of the iron-clad gunboat Essex for the destruction of the rebel ram Arkansas, accompanied by a letter of the Secretary of the Navy on the subject. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the communication was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following petitions and memorial, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

A petition of citizens of Missouri, praying that the officers and crew of the gunboat Essex may be suitably rewarded for the destruction of the rebel ram Arkansas;

A petition of citizens of Cairo, Illinois, praying for the permanent location of a navy and dockyard and naval depot at that place; and

A memorial of the mayor and common council of the city of Jeffersonville, Indiana, praying for the location of an armory and navy-yard at that place.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them with amendments:

A bill (S. No. 190) to establish a navy-yard at Cairo, in the State of Illinois; and

A bill (S. No. 246) for the relief of officers, seamen, and others borne on the books of vessels wrecked or lost in the naval service.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a resolution instructing the committee to inquire into the expediency of amending the existing laws regulating the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States so as to confine it to questions of law, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. No. 25) repealing a joint resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate (No. 145) to equalize the pay of soldiers in the United States Army, reported them with amendments; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWARD. I present to the Senate a paper in the nature of a report from the select committee on the Pacific railroad, containing sundry tables and other matters tending to illustrate the operation of the Pacific railroad act of 1862, and the operation of the amendment to that act which has already been presented to the Senate by the committee, and I move that it be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print three thousand copies of the report of the Secretary of the Navy on iron-clad vessels, have instructed me to report it adversely. The document was ordered to be printed by the House of Representatives, and it would be very proper to print it for the Senate but for the fact that the type has been distributed, and it would cost some three thousand dollars.

Mr. ANTHONY also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 265) to expedite and regulate the printing of public documents, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

COLONIZATION OF COLORED PERSONS.

Mr. WILKINSON. The Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 169) to repeal all acts making appropriation for the colonization of free persons of African descent, have instructed me to report it back with a recommendation that it pass, and I also ask for its present consideration.

No objection being made, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILKINSON. I wish simply to state that two years ago Congress passed two acts which evinced, in my judgment, the extreme folly, appropriating $600,000, and placing it at the disposal of the President, for the purpose of sending out of this country free colored persons. An attempt has been made to carry out the provisions of the laws, and one or two cargoes have been sent to an island in the West Indies, and the results have been most hazardous and disgraceful. I ask that those laws may be repealed; that no further expenditure be made in that direction.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I hope the Senator from Minnesota will not press the passage of this bill to-day. I shall offer no objection to its passage at the proper time, but the Senate has passed a resolution asking for a report from the commissioner of emigration of the doings under those laws. I am very anxious that that report shall come in before this question is pressed on the attention of the Senate. I make the suggestion to the Senator from Minnesota. That report is now being made out, and I understand will be tendered to the Senate in a few days.

Mr. WILKINSON. I have no objection to the postponement if the Senator insists upon it, though I think that report will make no difference.

Mr. HALE. The bill had better lie over.

Mr. WILKINSON. I am willing that it shall go over, but I give notice that I shall call it up at the earliest possible moment.

The further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

COMMANDERS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. HALE. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 270) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish and equalize the grade of line officers of the United States Navy," approved July 16, 1862, have instructed me to report the same back with an amendment. As this bill is one to remedy a defect in the existing law in regard to naval appointments, I ask the Senate to consider it now.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that the corps of commanders in the Navy of the United States on the active list shall be temporarily increased so as to embrace all who had been appointed as such prior to the commencement of the present session of Congress, under that construction of the law which then prevailed in the Navy Department; but the number thus allowed is not to exceed ninety; and no further appointments of commanders are to be made on the active list till the number by deaths, dismissals, resignations, or otherwise, shall be reduced to seventy-two.

The second section provides that all payments heretofore made to any officers in the Navy as commanders, under the construction of the law heretofore prevailing in the Navy Department, shall be ratified and allowed, and the proper accounting officers of the Treasury are instructed to allow them in the same way and manner as if there were no question as to the legality of the appointments.

The amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was in section one, line nine, to strike out the word "ninety" and insert "ninety-one."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. My impression is that in the second line of the second section the words "captains or" should be inserted before the word "commanders." I believe the captains have been promoted now, but it has only been done very recently, and so far as relates to pay there should be some retrospective provision for them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator move that amendment?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves to amend the bill in section two, line two, by inserting before the word "commanders" the words "captains or;" so that it will read:

That all payments heretofore made to any officers in the Navy as captains or commanders under the construction of the law heretofore prevailing, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

GENERALS SCHENCK AND BLAIR.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to be printed:

Whereas the President of the United States, in a communication to the House of Representatives of date 28th of April ultimo, represents, "that prior to and at the meeting of the present Congress, Robert C. Schenck, of Ohio, and Francis P. Blair, Jr., of Missouri, members-elect thereof, by and with the consent of the Senate held commissions from the Executive as major generals in the volunteer army;" and that "General Schenck tendered the resignation of his said commission and took his seat in the House of Representatives at the assembling thereof, upon the distinct verbal understanding with the Secretary of War and the Executive that he might at any time during the session, at his own pleasure, withdraw said resignation and return to the field;" and whereas the President in said communication states further that "General Blair was, by temporary agreement with General Sherman, in command of a corps through the battles in front of Chattanooga, and in the march to the relief of Knoxville, which occurred in the latter days of December last, and of course was not present at the assembling of Congress;" and "that when he subsequently arrived here he sought and was allowed by the Secretary of War and the Executive the same conditions and promises as allowed and made to General Schenck;" and further, that "General Blair holds no military commission or appointment other than herein stated:" Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the arrangement aforesaid, made by the President and the Secretary of War with Generals Schenck and Blair, to receive from them temporarily their commissions of major general, with discretion, on their part, at any time during this session of Congress to resume them, was in derogation of the Constitution of the United States, and not within the power of the President and the Secretary of War, or either of them, to make.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to some and disagreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 40) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1865, had agreed to the thirty-first amendment of the Senate to the said bill with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate, had insisted upon its disagreement and amendment as aforesaid, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHN A. KASSON of Iowa, Mr. JAMES W. PATTERSON of New Hampshire, and Mr. JAMES BROOKS of New York, managers at the same on its part.

DISASTERS ON RED RIVER.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the joint committee on the conduct of the war be instructed to investigate the causes of the recent disasters on Red river, with power to send for persons and papers.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that the committee has all the power necessary. It is only necessary to instruct them to inquire into it, I apprehend. So far as sending for persons and papers is concerned, that power is expressly conferred on them already.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I will change the word "instructed" to "requested." I desire to state to the Senate and to the country that the command of that advance was under General Lee, of Kansas, as gallant an officer as ever drew sword for his country. Since the disaster he has been ordered to New Orleans in disgrace. It is a fact that the artillery of the army was intrusted to a wagon train for protection; that there was in the advance a body of cavalry under General Lee; then came the artillery, and next to the artillery came a wagon train, upon a narrow road cut through the timber. I understand it to be an axiom in military affairs that artillery is to be protected by infantry close at hand, not to be intrusted to cavalry even. I am informed—and I want the ear of the chairman of the committee—that General Lee called frequently, demanded repeatedly, that the wagon train be sent back and that infantry be forwarded to him in support of that artillery, and that his calls and demands were disregarded. When the assault was made, the narrow road was filled up by this wagon train, there was no protection for the artillery, and he was overcome by superior numbers.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. President, since I have been in Congress I have uniformly opposed interference by either branch or both branches of Congress with the affairs of the armies in the field. I do not think any good has been accomplished by such interference. I think armies are best managed by the officers in command and by those who have control over them. I have no doubt, sir, that if the statements in reference to General Lee are as the Senator from Kansas represents them—and I do not question them—the Army itself will take care of his reputation.

I think we have had too much for the public good of the dismissals of officers from the Army without trial by court-martial. Great mischief has been done to the service by this mode of proceeding; great mischief will be done again. I hold that no officer in the Army for any conduct should be censured or disgraced without the finding of a court-martial, and an opportunity for him to be heard and make his defense before that court-martial. I make no assault upon the committee charged with these investigations. They have other duties to perform and to attend to. They hear that portion of the testimony only which is submitted to them, and which they call before them. Great injustice, unintentionally upon their part, often, I have no doubt, is done by the fact that officers have no opportunity to explain their conduct during an action or upon the field, which are reported upon here, and they show a different state of facts when they are brought before a military court for trial.

Sir, I do not think that this mode of investigation is fair, just, or useful. I opposed it when I was a member of the other House; I am opposed to it now.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I think the Senator from Illinois did not hear my statement. I said that the relief given to General Lee by the Army was ordering him to New Orleans in disgrace—

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Senator will pardon me. I suppose he was ordered to New Orleans by the commanding officer. That commanding officer is responsible. Whatever disaster has fallen on that army is attributable to the commander that was there. I have no doubt about that. When others come to assume command there, they will afford General Lee an opportunity to vindicate himself against whatever charges may be made against him. An officer under arrest is entitled to a court-martial, as the Senator knows perfectly well from his experience in military affairs. It is an offense to detain him in arrest longer I believe than eight days without preferring charges and bringing him before a court-martial. The Senator will pardon me when I add that I have no doubt the military men will set this whole matter right if you give them a little time.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The present condition of our armies precludes the probability even of relief in the way of a court-martial. This relief should come immediately. Here is an officer who, leading his column at Vicksburg, received a ball through his head in his mouth, and joined the Army again when he was feeding himself with a spoon, unable to open his mouth. He is as gallant a soldier and as able as we have in the service. One hour of disgrace to him is a thousand deaths. I want to reach his vindication at the earliest possible moment. He avers that he demanded again and again and again that the wagon train should be separated from his column, and that the artillery should be furnished with infantry to protect and defend it. Kansas and General Lee ask an immediate vindication. He is a favorite son of that gallant State.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, it is too late in the day to raise objections to congressional investigations in regard to military affairs. It was done by the Continental Congress during the time of the Revolution. It was done in the war of 1812-14, as I once had occasion to show to the Senate by reading from the Journals and Debates of that time. It was done from 1848 up to 1852, and if the Senator from Illinois will refresh himself by reference to the Senate documents during that period he will find that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of this body, Mr. Weller, employed himself I should think most of the time in investigations of this description.

Mr. RICHARDSON. During the progress of the war?

Mr. GRIMES. During the latter part of the progress of the Mexican war, and for the two or three following years—investigations growing out of the controversies between General Pillow and General Scott and all the subordinate officers under them, and in regard to other officers who were not immediately under General Pillow.

But I rise to suggest to the Senator from Kansas the propriety of modifying or changing his resolution so as to inquire into the general administration of that department. I should like to know all about it. I should like to have the committee on the conduct of the war instructed not only to examine as to the particular details of the disaster that happened to us at Pleasant Hill, but I should like to know how the affairs of the department have been administered prior to that time and since that time.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I have not the least objection to that. All I desire is to reach the object I have stated.

Mr. GRIMES. That will reach the object the Senator from Kansas has in view, and may reach something more, and it will relate not alone to military transactions but to civil transactions in that department, and therefore will be relieved from the objection which the Senator from Illinois seems to raise to the military investigation.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The jurisdiction of the committee on the conduct of the war is quite extensive enough if they are confined to war matters. If they are to take the general superintendence of the civil as well as the military administration of this department, it will add very much to their labor, and, it seems to me, would so much absorb the time and attention of the committee that it would be impossible for them to give their attention particularly to the subject of this disaster, which is what we want to get at.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no objection.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I do not know that it is true—I do not pretend to state it as true—but I very much fear this committee will be able to ascertain that the disaster at Pleasant Hill grew out of a sort of furore to gather up cotton; that instead of whipping the enemy, they were trying to hook up cotton; and that led to this disgraceful surprise. It is believed that General Banks had on the Red river a large superiority of numbers; and yet the whole country west of the Mississippi is now endangered, if not altogether lost, for the present, by this furore to get hold of cotton. I have no objection, therefore, to having the resolution cover the whole thing.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas if he can give us the evidence on which he founds the declaration that General Banks had superior numbers on the Red river expedition.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I do not propose to give names. My understanding is, from the authorities here upon inquiry, that General Banks has to-day superiority of numbers on the Red river. I was told so yesterday by one who should know. The State that I have the honor to represent is now exposed from south to north by this mistake—a mistake that, in my opinion, should damn any man professing to have a knowledge of military tactics. The idea of attempting to move artillery without being protected and closely protected by infantry is ridiculous, and should cover every man who submitted to such a movement with everlasting disgrace. We watch our artillery as a mother watches her child. We do not permit that infantry to leave it for a moment. Here in this expedition there were miles between the artillery and the infantry and a wagon train between them, which precluded the possibility of the infantry passing to the support of the artillery. All the West is exposed to-day by this most terrific mistake.

Mr. WADE. I will inquire whether this is a joint resolution or merely a resolution of the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. It is a Senate resolution.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I will say to the chairman of the committee that all I ask is that the facts connected with the loss of that army may be before his committee.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I hope it will be made a joint resolution if it is to pass. It will devolve upon that committee a very considerable labor and considerable expense. Of course we shall be as economical as we can be, but this investigation will cost something if it is ordered. The appropriation for that committee which was passed by the Senate a long time ago has never passed the House of Representatives, and I do not know that they intend that it shall pass. It is evident, however, that the committee on the conduct of the war are compelled under the instructions of this body to incur considerable expense in the investigations which they have to make.

Mr. FOSTER. This resolution should be a joint resolution, as it proposes to instruct a joint committee.

Mr. WADE. It is suggested to me that this subject cannot be sent to a joint committee except by a joint resolution. Perhaps that may be so; but it has not been so understood. Each branch of Congress has instructed the committee on the conduct of the war to make the investigations that we have made; but I think it would be better for both bodies to join in giving instructions upon a matter so important and so extensive as the inquiry now proposed.

As to what the Senator from Illinois has said about our making investigations that impinge upon the character of individuals without giving them notice, I will say to that Senator that we are not obnoxious to any such charge. We have never made any report or presented any evidence against any man unless he has been apprised of it, with one exception, where we took a little evidence for the purpose of enlightening the Senate in executive session on certain occasions, and of course that was secret. In every other case, if the testimony seemed to involve the character of any man or to impute anything wrong to him, we have always apprised him of it, and asked him to give every explanation he could give. Further than that, we have not made any of these military examinations that I know of without the concurrence of the Secretary of War, who has cooperated with us all along, and been exceedingly anxious that we should make them. Of course, we are not anxious to make this investigation, and shall only do it if it is the law of Congress that we should do it. I assure gentlemen it is not a thing to be sought after.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I have no desire, after what has been said by the Senator from Kansas, to arrest the passage of his resolution to inquire into the condition of affairs on the Red river. A great misfortune has fallen upon our army west of the Mississippi, and the public press teems with comments upon the origin and management of that ill-starred expedition. To-day the Senator from Kansas introduces this resolution of inquiry, and before the facts are ascertained he indulges in declarations, assertions, and comments derogatory to the management of the Red river campaign. He makes an arraignment before the Senate and the country of Major General Banks, the commander of the forces there. He desires to vindicate General Lee, the commander of the cavalry in advance, and to do so he casts blame upon the commander of the expedition. Will it not be time enough to praise or blame when the proposed investigation shall disclose the facts?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I think the Senator from Massachusetts misunderstood me. I will state to him that I heard, I think on Monday, that the order for this expedition emanated from a western general; that it was sent on here and endorsed, reluctantly perhaps, by the authorities at Washington city; and the expedition was undertaken against the better judgment of General Banks, as I was informed. I do not arraign General Banks, for I do not know who prevented General Lee from having the infantry to support him.

Mr. WILSON. In victory we overpraise men; in defeat we undervalue them. There is a disposition everywhere now to censure the commander of the Red river expedition, to undervalue his merits and his past services. General Banks is a gentleman of capacity and character, and has possessed, in his own State and in the country, a large share of the public confidence. This misfortune has shaken somewhat that public confidence. I trust the facts which the proposed investigation will disclose will vindicate the management of General Banks. If he has erred in the management of the campaign in western Louisiana, he must share the common lot of public men in civil life and in military life who commit mistakes in the direction of important affairs. I trust the investigation will be conducted with impartiality and fairness, that General Banks will have the opportunity his public services entitle him to receive at the hands of his countrymen to explain his action and vindicate his conduct. When the record is made up it will be time enough to cast censure upon his action. I demand of Senators who propose this investigation that they shall not, in advance, put upon the records of the country declarations tending to condemn the management of General Banks in this Red river movement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. I proposed to amend the resolution.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I am willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. Whatever may be the remarks of the Senator from Kansas to which the Senator from Massachusetts objects, there is nothing in the resolution itself that casts reproach upon General Banks or anybody else. The administration of his department is a legitimate subject of inquiry by Congress. I do not desire an investigation as to the simple fact whether he directed his artillery or his cavalry or his baggage train in a proper manner, but into everything connected with the administration of the department. That is what the people of this country desire at this time. If General Banks has behaved well, and as his friends claim that he has, a proper report on the subject will greatly quiet the public anxiety in connection with his name and with the administration of that department. If he has not, here is a committee of his own political friends and adherents, and if they decide against him let him take the same fate that other men take under similar circumstances who have behaved badly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to say, sir, after the statement of the chairman of the committee on the conduct of the war, the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] that they have furnished every officer who seemed to be implicated with the charges implicating him, that it is a species of information I had not before; and I do not desire when the information is given me to let even that misapprehension from my mind to go to the country.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I have not felt disposed to criticise this expedition and fight, but I do propose now to say a word about it. The idea of permitting a fight to come off at all until Steele and Thayer had formed a junction with the commander of that expedition was, in my opinion, the act of a man who had not prudence at least as a characteristic of a commander. The expedition itself, in my opinion, was ill-timed. Kirby Smith was at Shreveport. He could be found at any time if we wanted to whip him; and if to-day a disaster is happening to General Sherman, it is owing to the fact that that army was not threatening Mobile. I do not know who is responsible for the expedition; but that the expedition itself was a mistake I have no doubt.

Mr. WILSON. It is said that General Sherman ordered this expedition. I do not know how it is; but that is the report.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I do not wish to say how that is. An officer who would send those gunboats up Red river at this season of the year, knowing the uncertainty of its navigation, in my opinion is not entitled to the reputation of prudence, at least. We of the West know that the navigation of the Arkansas and of the Red rivers is too uncertain to trust a large fleet of our most valuable vessels upon their bosom; and yet here are millions of dollars' worth of vessels that it will take time to replace, endangered, for an expedition fruitless if successful, because I hear that it was understood by the general who ordered that expedition that it was to take Shreveport, and return to threaten Mobile, so as to keep the force there at that point; that that was the reason upon which the order for the expedition was predicated. But the idea of permitting any portion of that force to engage Kirby Smith when Thayer and Steele, with twenty or thirty thousand men, were moving to form a junction with him was an imprudent step, to say the least of it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am not quite satisfied to have this debate close and go to the country when the Senator says that the whole project of the expedition to Shreveport was unwise, and that if successful it would have been an unwise expedition. I do not profess to understand military matters very well; I claim no knowledge on that subject; but I understand, and I believe the country has understood, that if the expedition had been properly managed and had been successful in the capture of Shreveport it would have been a most successful expedition and in its results most important to the country. I do not desire to say anything further than simply to say that I do not acquiesce in the statement of the Senator from Kansas that if we had been successful in the capture of Shreveport, on the Red river, it would have been a thing of no account.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The whole power of this Government was being put forth to crush the armies of the rebellion east of the Mississippi river; and I ask the Senator from Wisconsin how the rebel armies west of the Mississippi could aid rebellion east of the Mississippi? Here we are, at a time when we are making a combined effort to crush the rebel armies east of the Mississippi river, sending a force that was within a few days' march of Mobile, west of the Mississippi river to engage troops that could not participate with and aid the rebels east of the Mississippi. I repeat that it was a childish thing dividing our forces when we were endeavoring to concentrate everything upon rebellion east of the Mississippi river. I understand that it was the intent and purpose of him who first ordered the expedition that it should return in time to participate in this campaign, forgetting the uncertainties of the navigation of Red river, forgetting that we might be defeated. If we had reached Shreveport, what would have been the result? The rebel army would have retreated further south into Texas. It would have resulted in nothing but to get a few bales of cotton. That is the reason it was undertaken—for gain. I do not say for gain for the officers or men, but the expedition itself was ill-timed, and stands forth before the world as the most mismanaged and most disastrous expedition of the war.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. One word by way of reply. This expedition upon the Red river, as I am informed, received the sanction of General Curtis, General Steele, General Banks, General Sherman, and the War Department, including the sanction of Lieutenant General Grant, and I undertake to say that if it had been managed in such a way that we had captured Shreveport we should have accomplished in that operation one of the grandest successes that we have accomplished at all. We should have secured Arkansas; we should have relieved the Indian country and Kansas from all danger; we should have threatened the enemy in Texas by the advance of a column in overwhelming force in Texas, where we could have met our friends who still exist in large numbers in western Texas, and it would have given us the whole of the country west of the Mississippi river. I regret as much as the Senator from Kansas, or any other man can, the fact that we have met with a reverse in this expedition. The mismanagement rests somewhere. I do not object to an inquiry into that mismanagement, or that the committee on the conduct of the war should inquire into it. I desire that the real truth should be known, to cover up nothing; but I am not satisfied to have the Senator from Kansas in such strong language denounce the whole project of the expedition upon Shreveport, and turn it off by saying it was a mere speculation in cotton. Mr. President, I have no idea that General Curtis, or General Steele, or General Banks, or General Grant, or the War Department, had any idea they were making an expedition for the capture of cotton. No, sir. It was to take possession of the country beyond the Mississippi, and to settle it for the Union and the Union cause.

Mr. GRIMES. I have no knowledge as to who originated the campaign, and I have no criticism to make as to its conduct; but the remarks which have been made by gentlemen here certainly ought to convince us that there should be a general investigation into the subject. It is of no use to conceal the fact that in portions of the country, and especially in those States from which the army was raised that fought under General Banks, there is an intense indignation against him, and I think there ought to be an opportunity for the public mind to be quieted on this subject.

The Senator from Kansas speaks about the lowness of water in the Red river, and he says it ought to have been known that there would not be water enough there to navigate the gunboats. I think it will turn out upon investigation—I am so informed at any rate—that that was something which could not have been guarded against, for the reason that at this season of the year there is generally water enough in the Red river, but the rebels very adroitly changed the current of the river into one of those bayous which so much abound in Louisiana and carried off a large portion of the volume of water that ordinarily flows through that stream in another direction into the Gulf of Mexico, and thus reduced the water in the river, so that vessels were immediately put aground. If this be so, it is due to General Banks and the men who cooperated with him, and to the other officers of the Army who were said to have given their approval of this expedition, that this fact should be developed in some authentic way before some organ of this body. It is due to them that that fact should be made public if it be a fact, and I was informed on Sunday by an officer who left the fleet nine days before that it was a fact. It is due, I think, to all parties, to the public sentiment of the country, to the Government, to the officers of the Army and Navy who had charge of the expedition, that there should be a fair inquiry into the facts connected with it. I have submitted an amendment changing the resolution into a concurrent resolution, and changing the character of the inquiry so as to make it a general inquiry into the administration of the department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY.) The amendment of the Senator from Iowa is to make the resolution read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the joint committee on the conduct of the war be requested to investigate the causes of the recent disasters on Red river, and inquire into the general administration of that department, with power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to make one remark in answer to the Senator from Wisconsin. With Steele's troops at Little Rock, and Thayer's troops at Fort Smith, Kansas and the Indian country were secure against even guerrillas; we were keeping guerrillas out of the country. I say that the movement of Thayer's troops and Steele's troops on Shreveport, even if there had been a success, endangered the Indian country, and endangered the State I have the honor in part to represent. The only way to defend the Indian territory is by troops in its immediate vicinity. You withdrew them to Shreveport, and opened up the Indian territory and Kansas and Missouri to the incursions of guerrillas. So far as the protection of Arkansas, so far as the protection of the Indian territory, so far as the protection of Kansas was concerned, it was much better that Steele had remained at Little Rock and Thayer at Fort Smith. The Senator from Wisconsin is mistaken. Here is Kansas, which has furnished sixteen thousand troops, and to-day her citizens are exposed from south to north; the families of those gallant soldiers exposed to the murderous Quantrell by this mistake. It is charity to denominate the movement a mistake.

I have avoided criticising our authorities as carefully as the Senator from Wisconsin; I am as desirous to sustain them as the Senator from Wisconsin; but here is my own State calling now for assistance, with only something like fifteen hundred troops within her borders out of the sixteen thousand she has furnished, with her whole southern and eastern border exposed to the incursions of guerrillas, and her brave soldiers hundreds, and some of them thousands of miles from her border, while their families are being exposed to Quantrell's murderous bands, owing, as I believe, to a mistake from some source. I do not know from what authority the Senator from Wisconsin speaks when he says that General Curtis sanctioned this expedition. I would like him to give me that authority. I do know that for months, ever since that gallant general assumed command of the department of Kansas, he has been demanding troops for the protection of his department; and I cannot believe that General Curtis sanctioned an expedition that took from Kansas almost all the protection she had. I would like also to know the authority that authorized the Senator from Wisconsin to state that General Banks sanctioned this expedition. I stated here a few moments since that I had understood that this expedition originated from a western general, that it came here and was reluctantly indorsed, and that it was in direct violation of the wishes of General Banks and contrary to his judgment. Now, I ask the Senator from Wisconsin, when he states that General Curtis sanctioned this expedition, to give his authority. If the statement I have made that General Banks was opposed to this expedition be true, I ask him, in justice to me as well as in justice to General Banks, to state his authority that authorized him before the nation to state that that officer sanctioned this expedition.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not feel at liberty to refer to those letters and papers which I have seen, which purport to be copies of letters of General Banks and other gentlemen in relation to these matters, and state the contents of them. I will state to my friend from Kansas that I believe such to be the fact.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I am especially anxious to know. The statement that the Senator from Wisconsin has made will be extremely damaging to General Curtis, and unless he can state with a knowledge of what he says that General Curtis sanctioned this expedition, I should like to have him withdraw the allegation altogether.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not state that I have any means of knowledge within my power that General Curtis sanctioned this precise expedition; but I think I have knowledge, and I think the Senator from Kansas must have knowledge, that General Curtis desired to lead just such an expedition into this portion of Texas from the Indian country himself.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I cannot permit that remark to be made, certainly. I have no knowledge that General Curtis at this time, in the present unprotected situation of Kansas, desired such an expedition as this. I state, and I desire that to go to the country, that General Curtis, backed by the congressional delegation, has been, to my knowledge, for the last four months urging the Government to send him troops to protect his department.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. And was it not to make an expedition into western Texas, too?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I did not so understand it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I did.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. He may have wanted troops for an expedition into the Indian country, not for any expedition away from the Indian country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES.]

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

CONTRACTORS FOR DOUBLE-ENDERS.

Mr. HALE. I move to postpone prior orders, and take up Senate joint resolution (S. No. 50) for the relief of the contractors for the machinery of the side-wheel gunboats known as double-enders.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to appoint a board of competent persons to examine the claim of the contractors with the United States Government for the machinery of the side-wheel gunboats commonly known as "double-enders," for additional compensation for constructing the same, and to report to the Department what losses have been suffered by the contractors upon their contracts, how far they are justly entitled to relief, and what, if any, additional allowances ought in equity to be made to them by the Government; and upon the report of the board receiving the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Treasury is to pay to the contractors, severally, the sums adjudged to be due them in equity by the board, but such additional compensation is in no case to exceed an amount which, compared with the price stipulated in the contract, shall be in due proportion to the excess in weight of the engines built over such as were contracted for, except for alterations in form or material made by express order of the Government.

Mr. HALE. The facts are all stated in the report, and I wish that the report may be read.

The Secretary read the report made by Mr. HALE on the 4th instant, from which it appears that at different dates, from March 20, 1862, to October 29, 1862, the Navy Department entered into contracts with various iron-works and firms of New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore, Providence, Portland, Newburg, Wilmington, and Chester, for the machinery of the gunboats known as "double-enders," stipulating for twenty-eight engines in all, at prices varying from $73,000 to $85,000, nearly all of them, however, at the uniform rate of $82,000 each. The engines have all been completed after considerable delays, which the contractors claim to be justified by an understanding with the Department that the time named in the contracts for their fulfillment was not to be insisted upon with exactness nor the forfeiture of part of the price therein named in case of delay. The petitioners, alleging that they suffered great losses on these contracts, now come to Congress and ask relief upon the ground that the prices were fixed by the Navy Department in offering these contracts to them, and accepted by them under an entire misapprehension and mistake as to the cost of the work because,

1. The drawings were not made until after the time allowed for the acceptance of the contracts, and the specifications alone could not afford sufficient data for estimating the expense.

2. The work has been done under the direction of inspectors who have given to every part of the contract such a construction as to require the best and most costly work.

3. The expenditure has been greatly enhanced by the action of the Government in various matters not anticipated, and which could not be foreseen when the contracts were made, causing difficulties in obtaining the necessary materials, and increasing the cost of all materials and labor, while the currency in which payment is made has been constantly diminishing in value.

The petitioners further allege that they have used all diligence in fulfilling their contracts with all the means at their command, and that they have completed the work in the most thorough manner, after it was rendered certain that they were doing so at a pecuniary sacrifice, and in the hope and expectation that the Government would finally reimburse them by additional compensation for their inevitable losses. A considerable number of the petitioners have appeared before the committee, and to some extent have been heard, verbally and by papers submitted to the committee, since the subject was referred to them by the Senate. These contractors further represent that they expected to furnish engines similar to those of the Paul Jones, a vessel with which they were familiar, and photographic general plans of whose engines were furnished by the Department at the time these contracts were made, as a guide for making, with slight modifications therein specified, the detailed drawings for the engines they were to build; that at that time the detailed specifications were not printed, or, if printed, had not been furnished them, and they relied upon the estimate of the chief engineer, and his assurance that the weight of the required engines would be about the same as that of the Paul Jones, and would not, in any event, exceed that weight more than fifteen per cent.; but that, in fact, the engines, when completed, exceeded in weight very largely both the estimate and their expectations. The contractors also submit that they undertook the work at the urgent request of the Department, at a price fixed by them, and were influenced to do so by a desire to serve the Government under circumstances then existing which required the vessels to be afloat as soon as possible. These are substantially the allegations upon which the contractors base their claim upon the Government for additional remuneration.

The committee have examined the case presented far enough to satisfy themselves that there is probable ground for some relief to be afforded the petitioners by Congress. But the proper measure of relief to be granted them would depend upon a variety of considerations—such as the truth of the representations of the petitioners; the actual cost of the work to the contractors, exclusive of time and profits, over and above the contract price in each case; how far the weight and amount of materials in the engines actually exceed the estimates and expectations of the contracting parties; to what extent the Government is justly responsible for this error, and how far it is due to improvidence and lack of business sagacity on the part of the contractors; how far the unexpected cost of the engines is simply owing to unnecessary delays or to changes in the market prices of materials and labor, which the Government could not provide against and should not be held responsible for; and whether any deduction should be made for the delay in failing to complete the machinery at the time stipulated in the contracts. It should be remembered also that while the Government must now, as at all times, be just, it can scarcely afford to be liberal at a period, like the present, of extraordinary demand upon all the resources of the country; and also that obvious danger would lurk in a precedent affording relief to parties for losses accruing merely from the recklessness or imprudence of Government contractors.

Two questions in this connection, therefore, are suggested for consideration, namely: first, whether relief should be granted at all; and second, if any be granted, whether it should be simply an amount sufficient to make good the losses, or whether an allowance should also be made for time and legitimate business profits.

Moreover, there being eighteen different parties interested in these contracts with the Government, each case should be examined by itself and upon its own merits, because the committee conceive that while there may be good cause for relief in some cases, an application for it in others may have no equitable foundation whatever. A just determination of all these questions of fact and of principle would involve a protracted examination, the taking of a great amount of testimony, and the collection of other evidence touching these claims. For want of the technical knowledge requisite to an intelligent understanding of the details of the case, the committee do not deem themselves specially competent to this task, even if the business of the Senate would afford them time for the investigation. They have not, therefore, sought to institute any inquiry into the subject further than to justify the conclusion which they announce, that, in view of the eminent character of these memorialists, the importance to the country and the purposes of the Government of the industry which they represent, and the credit due to their statements, the claim which they prefer is one which deserves the attention of the Government. The committee, after due deliberation, are of the opinion that a board of skilled and disinterested persons would be, in a higher degree than themselves, competent to ascertain the facts and determine upon the merits of this claim in a manner just and equitable to both Government and contractors, and therefore recommend the adoption of the pending joint resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know whether the Navy Department has been made acquainted with the facts connected with this resolution and report, and whether there has been any correspondence between the Naval Committee and the Navy Department on this subject, and what the views of the Department are as to the propriety of passing this resolution.

Mr. HALE. I will state the grounds upon which the committee based the resolution and all the facts in their possession. These firms—I think there are eighteen of them—constitute the great mass of gentlemen who are engaged in this sort of work in the United States. The contractors have been before the committee a number of times and we have heard them with a good deal of patience; but we came to the conclusion that it would be utterly impracticable and impossible for the committee to undertake to settle these questions. We submitted the memorials to the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Navy gave us a written answer which I have sent for; it is in the committee-room. If the Senate have heard the report as it has been read, it will be seen that these contractors entered upon these contracts relying very much upon the representations made to them, and in fact commenced the work some time before the contracts were actually executed. Indeed, the contracts never were executed, and in the mode of conducting the business of the Department it may be said these contracts are never executed except in one particular. The contracts are sent out; there are various stipulations in them; the contractor signs them, and they are returned and are placed on file in the Navy Department. That is understood to be the way in which they are generally done.

These gentlemen contended that there had been various alterations made, not only from the contracts, but from the proposals which were published in the advertisement inviting bids; and that after they had made their agreement and contract there were various alterations made in weight and in the mode of construction. The committee thought they were such a good ground for equitable relief, but it would be impossible for them to come to anything like an estimate of what it should be, and they thought the most safe and prudent way would be to refer it to the Navy Department with authority to appoint a board of their own selection to make the examination and report what allowance should be made.

These contractors represent that they were told at the time, although the terms were strict and rigid, that they would not be held to a strict compliance with them. The Secretary of the Navy in his answer does not admit the accuracy of that statement. But there was submitted to the committee, by a Mr. Boardman, the agent for one of these firms who had built these engines, a distinct statement that such was the fact; that although the time was specified, the Government would not hold them to a strict performance within that time.

As I said before, these gentlemen are engaged in this work, and they represent themselves to have suffered very largely from various considerations that have been suggested. The committee thought it would not be wise in the Government to exact to the letter the performance of the contracts when various alterations and additions had been made, but thought it best to refer it back to the Secretary of the Navy, giving him power to ascertain by a board how the matter stood. That is the whole of it. I have not the letters here, but they are in the committee room.

Mr. GRIMES. I think it may be necessary, in order to have a proper understanding of this case, that those letters should be here, and I therefore move that this resolution be postponed until to-morrow. I will state to the Senate that it is a matter of a great deal more magnitude than they might at the first blush suppose. Upwards of six hundred thousand dollars are involved in it, and I have reason to believe that the public service would not be promoted by the passage of the bill. Whenever this bill passes, there is to be another one following it immediately for every class of vessels that have been built for the Navy. These contractors enter into contracts agreeing to furnish a vessel by a certain time. None of them do it. I know that we have not yet got some vessels that were due to the Government last September. These contractors can get more profitable work from individuals, and they proceed to execute that, thinking they can come to Congress and get an act for their relief, to extend the time or to pay them for any extra services they profess to have rendered. In that way the Department is able to hold no control whatever over the contractors. In order to enable the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs to procure that correspondence between the Navy Department and the Committee on Naval Affairs, I move that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection, if it be made the special order. This matter is of some importance, and if there is to be any relief to these contractors they ought to know it, and if there is to be no relief to them they ought to know it also. I have no objection to the motion, if the resolution be made the special order for one o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY.) Does the Senator from Iowa accept that amendment of his motion?

Mr. GRIMES. I have nothing to do with making a special order. I only want to give the Senator an opportunity to procure that correspondence.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to making this resolution a special order. If it passes, it will only be the beginning of five hundred similar bills. We shall have similar appeals from contractors who agreed to furnish flour or supplies to the Government, and they will have precisely the same claim. Every person who by the rise of prices has lost money by his contract will have the same claim. The principle would apply to all the various departments of the Government, and I think would produce disorder and confusion. I certainly would not agree to have a resolution of this sort involving private interests made a special order, and in that way postpone the consideration of general business.

Mr. HALE. It is a great mistake to suppose that there is any such analogy as that suggested by the Senator from Ohio. It is a principle recognized in society by every man in the case of a contract, whether it be for the building of a ship or a house, or anything else, that if the builder, relying upon the honor of the person by whom he is employed, is directed by him to make alterations different from those specified in the contract, there is an implied obligation that the man who orders those alterations shall pay the man who makes them. It is upon this ground that this resolution is based; that the vessels were different from those contracted for.

There is another consideration very different from that; and that is, these gentlemen began to build these vessels, and got them in such a state of forwardness before the contracts and specifications were furnished, that they were at the mercy of the Department, and they would have been obliged to lose a great amount, all the money that had been invested in them, if they had not submitted to the requirements of the Department.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to inquire if these facts appear in evidence, and if they are admitted in the correspondence between the Naval Committee and the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. HALE. They do not appear in the correspondence.

Mr. GRIMES. Are they not denied?

Mr. HALE. I do not understand it so. However, I can have the correspondence here to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to postpone the further consideration of the joint resolution now before the Senate until to-morrow.

Mr. HALE. Before that is done, there is a verbal amendment that I desire to make in the twenty-first line of the resolution. I move to strike out the word "contracted" and to insert the word "bargained," because the contract was not actually executed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to postpone the resolution until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE SECEDED STATES.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 261) to provide for the voluntary enlistment of any persons resident in certain States in the regiments of other States. ["Oh, no."] I want to settle it one way or the other.

The motion was not agreed to.

FRIENDLY SIOUX INDIANS.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask the Senate to take up the bill for the relief of the friendly Sioux Indians which is now lying on the table.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 225) for the relief of certain friendly Indians of the Sioux nation in Minnesota.

Certain Indians of the Sioux nation, during the outbreak in Minnesota in 1862, at the risk of their lives aided in saving many white men, women, and children from being massacred, and, in consequence of such action, were compelled to abandon their homes and property, and are now entirely destitute of the means of support. The bill therefore authorizes and requests the President of the United States to cause an examination to be made in relation to all the facts pertaining to the action of those Indians, and to make such provision for their welfare as their necessities and future protection may require. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act the sum of $10,000 is appropriated.

The Committee on Indian Affairs reported the bill with two amendments. The first amendment was in section two, line three, to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$7,500."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will ask the attention of the Senate for a moment, as they may not understand this case. The honorable Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] introduced this bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. It was based upon the representations of gentlemen from the State of Minnesota cognizant of the facts—Bishop Whipple, of Minnesota, and the Representatives and Senators from Minnesota who personally knew something of the facts—and also from the statement of one Mr. Galbraith, who was the agent of the Indians in Minnesota, a letter from whom I have since received and hold in my hand, and as it is very short I will read it to the Senate:

WASHINGTON, April 23, 1864.

Sir: Permit me through you to say a word to your committee upon a little matter, which lies closer to my heart than most things. A Sioux Indian chief, named Am-pe-tu-to-ke-cha, Christian name John Otherday, saved my wife and children and fifty-eight whites besides, at the time of the Sioux Indian massacre in August and September, A. D. 1862. How he saved I shall not now stop to say—I know he saved them.

I want the Government by some substantial aid to recognize this act of Christian heroism. I pray for it; I beg for it. Hon. WILLIAM WINDOM, of the House of Representatives, will furnish you the facts in this matter.

I am, sir, in haste, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
THOMAS J. GALBRAITH,
Indian Agent.

Hon. JAMES R. DOOLITTLE, United States Senate, Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, &c.

The facts show that this Otherday, who is one of the chiefs, with certain other Indians there, performed acts of Christian heroism in saving our white people from massacre that demand recognition at the hands of the Government. I fully concurred in the purpose of the Senator from Iowa in the bill which he introduced, but when we came to examine it and discuss it in detail we thought the sum of $7,500 would be sufficient, $2,500 of which by another amendment is to be used for the purpose of securing probably a farm in the State of Minnesota for this chief Otherday, and the remaining $5,000 is to be paid to the other Indians who were engaged in this glorious work of saving our people from massacre.

Mr. SUMNER. How much did the bill originally appropriate?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Ten thousand dollars; but we thought the sum of $2,500 for the chief, and the other sum of $5,000, to be distributed among the other Indians according to the terms of the bill, would be about right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to add at the end of section two the following:

One third of said sum to be paid and expended for the benefit of Am-pe-tu-to-ke-cha, or John Otherday, and the remainder for the benefit of such other Indians as shall appear specially entitled thereto, for their friendly, extraordinary, and gallant services in rescuing white settlers from massacre in Minnesota: Provided, That not more than the sum of $500 shall be expended for the benefit of any one Indian, except the chief above mentioned; and that the Secretary of the Interior shall report to the next Congress the names of the Indians for whose benefit the same shall be expended, and the amount expended for each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN AGENT NEAR GREEN BAY.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire now to call up Senate bill No. 247, in relation to the salary of the United States agent for Indians near Green Bay. He is the only Indian agent, I believe, that we have in the United States whose salary is less than $1,500. He has three small tribes of Indians upon his hands. I desire his salary to be like that of all other agents. That will end my list of bills for this morning.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs that the salary of the agent of the United States for the Indians in the vicinity of Green Bay shall hereafter be fixed at the sum of $1,500, to commence with the next fiscal year.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ACCEPTANCE OF BRITISH PRESENT.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution No. 51. It will take no time. It merely proposes to allow one of our surgeons to receive a testimonial from the British Government.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. No. 51) authorizing the acceptance of a certain testimonial from the Government of Great Britain was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes Surgeon Solomon Sharp, of the Navy of the United States, to accept the piece of plate recently presented to him by the Government of Great Britain as a mark of high appreciation of the unremitting attention and kindness shown by him to certain officers of the British ship Greyhound while in the naval hospital under his charge at Norfolk, Virginia.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE WITH ELECTIONS.

Mr. POWELL. I move that the bill (S. No. 37) to prevent officers of the Army and Navy, and other persons engaged in the military and naval service of the United States, from interfering in elections in the States be taken up, not for the purpose of considering it to-day, but with a view to make it the special order for Friday next; so that on Friday the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] who desires to address the Senate upon it, may have an opportunity to be heard.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to. Mr. POWELL. I now move that it be made the special order for Friday next at one o'clock.

Mr. CLARK. I object.
The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) It requires a vote of two thirds to make the bill a special order.

Mr. POWELL. I hope the Senate will allow it to be made a special order. The bill has been very elaborately discussed, and I think it will take but very little more time in discussion. The Senator from Maryland desires to make an argument upon it. I wish to fix a day for its consideration, and then dispose of it. I move that it be made the special order for Friday next at one o'clock.

Mr. CLARK. I hope that will not be done. I do not think we ought to make any bill of that kind a special order at this stage of the session. There may be on Friday some very important business, very much more important than that, that should be considered, and I hope the time will not be preoccupied by making this a special order. I do not think it should be done.

Mr. POWELL. If there are any revenue bills to be considered on Friday, I will not press it against them; but this is a very important bill, and I think we ought to consider it.

Mr. CLARK. I will suggest to the Senator that at any time when the Senate may not be preoccupied, he can move to take up the bill, and a majority of the Senate can take it up and consider it; but now it requires a vote of two thirds to make it a special order; so that if he lets his bill lie along, if he really wants to take it up, he can make the motion at a convenient time, and a majority vote will be sufficient; but now it requires two thirds.

Mr. POWELL. I certainly do really desire to take it up, and I now notify the Senate that I shall move to take it up on Friday. Perhaps, however, I can get a vote of two thirds for this motion; and so I insist on the motion.

Mr. JOHNSON. When the bill is taken up I desire to address the Senate, and it makes no difference to me whether I speak on Friday or at any other time. I have no desire to have it made the order of the day for any particular day. An opportunity will occur, when the Senate is not engaged in business which it may think more important, when it will permit me to address it on the subject.

Mr. CLARK. I dare say that if the Senator desires to address the Senate, the Senate at a convenient time will be glad to hear him, and will take up the bill at any convenient time when he desires to be heard.

Mr. JOHNSON. That will satisfy me.
Mr. FOOT. To that end, I move that the bill lie on the table, and then it will be subject to the motion of any Senator who may desire to be heard upon it at any time, and it will be within the control of a majority of the Senate, and I presume the Senator from Maryland can rely upon a hearing whenever he shall desire to address the Senate on the subject. I move that the bill lie on the table.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Vermont is not debatable.

Mr. POWELL. I do not mean to debate it. I only wish to withdraw my motion, and to give notice that on Friday at one o'clock I shall move to take up the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky withdraws his motion.

Mr. FOOT. The question is on my motion that the bill lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

VOLUNTEER NAVAL APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. HALE submitted the following report:
The committee of conference appointed to take into consideration the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 370) to appoint certain officers of the Navy, having met, after full and free conference have agreed and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives concur in the first amendment of the Senate, and that the Senate recede from the other amendments made by it to the bill.

JOHN P. HALE,
W. T. WILLEY,
ALEXANDER RAMSEY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
F. A. PIKE,
WILLIAM D. KELLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HALE also submitted the following report:

The committee of conference appointed to take into consideration the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 76) entitled "An act relating to appointments in the naval service and courts-martial," having met, after full and free conference have agreed and do recommend to their respective Houses to agree as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from its vote striking out the first section of the bill, which shall be amended so as to read as follows:

Hereafter all appointments in the volunteer naval service of the United States above the rank of acting master shall be submitted to the Senate for confirmation in the same way and manner as appointments in the regular Navy are required to be submitted.

JOHN P. HALE,
W. T. WILLEY,
ALEXANDER RAMSEY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
F. A. PIKE,
WILLIAM D. KELLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the bill (S. No. 154) to provide for the better organization of the quartermaster's department, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that there shall be established in the office of the Quartermaster General of the Army the following divisions, each of which shall be placed in the charge of a competent officer of the quartermaster's department, to be assigned to such duty by the Secretary of War, who shall, under such rules as may be prescribed by the Quartermaster General, with the approval of the Secretary of War, transact the business of such division.

The first division is to have charge of the purchase, procurement, and disposition of horses for cavalry, artillery, wagon, and ambulance trains, and all other purposes for which horses may be procured for the armies of the United States. The second division is to have charge of the purchase, procurement, issue, and disposition of cloth and clothing, knapsacks, camp and garrison equipage, and all accoutrements of the soldier which are provided by the quartermaster's department. The third division is to have charge of the purchase, charter, hire, and maintenance of all vessels to be used in the transportation of the Army, and of prisoners of war, and of their supplies, on the ocean, and the bays and sounds connected therewith, and upon the northern and northwestern lakes, including all vessels propelled by steam or otherwise, owned or employed by the War Department, excepting river steam vessels upon the western rivers. The fourth division is to have charge of the purchase, charter, hire, maintenance, and procurement of all transportation for the Army, and its supplies by land and upon western rivers, (other than transportation by animal power in the field, and at camps, garrisons, posts, depots, and stations,) including all railroad and telegraph lines operated by the United States for military purposes, and of all steam rams and gunboats owned or employed by the War Department upon the western rivers, until other disposition shall be made of them by competent authority. The fifth division is to have charge of the purchase, procurement, issue, and disposition of forage and straw for the Army. The sixth division is to have charge of the erection, procurement, maintenance, disposition, &c., of all barracks, hospital buildings, storehouses, stables, bridges, (other than railroad bridges,) wharves, and other structures composed in whole or in part of lumber, and of all lumber, nails, and hardware for building purposes, and of the hire and commutation of quarters for officers, the hire of quarters for troops, the hire of grounds for cantonments or other military purposes, and the repair and care of all buildings and other structures in this act mentioned, and of all grounds owned, hired, or occupied for military purposes, except such as are lawfully under the charge of other bureaus of the War Department; and of extra pay to soldiers employed in erecting barracks or other fatigue duty, under the acts of March 2, 1819, and August 4, 1854. The seventh division is to have charge of the purchase, procurement, issue, and disposition of all wagons, ambulances, traveling forges, and harness, (except such as are furnished by the ordnance department,) and of all hardware except as hereinbefore provided; and of all fuel for officers and enlisted men, camps, garrisons, hospitals, posts, storehouses, offices, public transports, steam rams, and Army gunboats, and of all transportation by animal power in the field, at camps, garrisons, posts, depots, and stations; and of the construction and repair of roads other than railroads; and of the compensation of wagon and forage masters, and of clerks to officers of the quartermaster's department; and of the purchase of heating and cooking stoves; and of the expenses of courts-martial, military commissions, and courts of inquiry; and of mileage and allowances to officers for the transportation of themselves and their baggage when traveling upon duty without troops, escorts, or supplies; and of supplies for prisoners of war and such refugees as the Secretary of War may direct to be temporarily provided for; and of the purchase of stationery, blanks, and blank-books for the quartermaster's department; and of the printing of the division and department orders and reports; and of the proper and authorized expenses for the movements and operations of an army not expressly assigned to any other division or department. The eighth division is to have charge of all inspections of the quartermaster's department and of all reports made by officers assigned to inspection duty, analyzing and preserving the reports as received, and communicating, through the Quartermaster General, to the chiefs of the proper divisions such portions of these reports as may be necessary for their information and use. The officers assigned to inspection duty are to have power not only to report and to point out any errors or abuses which they may discover in the practical operations of the quartermaster's department, but to give, by order of the Quartermaster General, the orders which may be immediately necessary to correct and to prevent a continuance of such abuses or errors. All such orders are to be immediately reported to the chief of the inspection division for the approval or otherwise of the Quartermaster General. The ninth division is to have charge of all the correspondence, returns, reports, and records received, filed, and preserved in the office of the Quartermaster General, and of the transmission thereof to the several other divisions of that office and Departments of the Government.

The supplies and material for the principal depots of the quartermaster's department are to be purchased after due public notice by the heads of the several divisions, except in cases of supplies procured within the field of active military operations, which are purchased or taken from the inhabitants of the seat of war or its immediate vicinity, and except in case of emergency not admitting of delay. In military departments west of the Missouri river, or so remote from the seat of Government as to make this mode of supply inexpedient, the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, assign to officers of the quartermaster's department the duty of making purchases and contracts for such military departments, in whole or in part, and of making payments therefor. Such officers of the quartermaster's department so authorized to make purchases are not to inspect, measure, weigh, or receive the articles purchased or contracted for by them, but such inspecting, measuring, weighing, and receiving is to be performed by the quartermasters attached to the commands or depots for whose use the articles are purchased or contracted for.

The heads of the several divisions under the direction of the Quartermaster General are from time to time to advertise for proposals for the supplies necessary for the movements and operations of the several armies, posts, detachments, garrisons, hospitals, and for other military purposes, in newspapers having general circulation in those parts of the country where such supplies can be most advantageously furnished, having regard also to the places where such supplies are to be delivered and used; and all such supplies so purchased or contracted for are to be subject to careful inspection, and all clothing and camp and garrison equipage is to be subject to a double inspection, first, as to the quality of the material, and second, as to the kind and character of the workmanship, which inspection in all cases is to be performed by or under the direction of the officers in charge of the depots where such supplies may be ordered to be delivered, or by or under the direction of the quartermasters of the commands for whose use they may be purchased or contracted for; and all payments for supplies so purchased are to be made by the officers in charge of the several divisions above mentioned, upon receipts or certificates from the officers inspecting and receiving such supplies, prepared in such form and attested in such manner as may be prescribed by the Quartermaster General. But purchases made in the field may be paid for by the officers authorized to make such purchases, and payments for hire of persons employed at the several depots, or in the operations of the quartermaster's department in the field; payments for mileage to officers, commutation of their fuel and quarters, allowances to officers attending courts-martial and military commissions, the expenses of such courts and commissions, occasional freights earned by vessels and steamboats, and by transportation, stage, and railroad, or other transportation companies, when not exceeding the sum of $5,000, may be made by officers of the quartermaster's department who may be charged with such duty.

It is to be the duty of the Quartermaster General to establish depots, from time to time, at places convenient to the principal armies in the field, for receiving and distributing the supplies necessary for such armies, and for the detachments, posts, and hospitals most accessible to such depots; and the business of inspecting, weighing, measuring, and receiving supplies for such armies, detachments, posts, and hospitals, and of giving receipts or certificates therefor to the persons furnishing such supplies, is to be carried on as far as practicable at such depots; but the Quartermaster General, or the heads of the several divisions above mentioned, may cause such supplies to be sent from the place of purchase directly to the quartermasters of the commands for whose use they are procured, in any cases where it may be more economical or advantageous so to do; and in cases where horses, clothing, or camp and garrison equipage may be so sent, suitable and competent inspectors are to be sent to examine the same before they are issued and receipted for.

When an emergency shall exist requiring the immediate procurement of supplies for the necessary movements and operations of an army or detachment, and when such supplies cannot be procured from any established depot of the quartermaster's department, or from the head of the division charged with the duty of furnishing such supplies, within the required time, then it is to be lawful for the commanding officer of such army or detachment to order the chief quartermaster of such army or detachment to procure such supplies during the continuance of such emergency, but no longer, in the most expeditious manner; and it is to be the duty of such quartermaster to obey such order; and his accounts of the disbursement of moneys for such supplies are to be accompanied by the order of the commanding officer, or a certified copy of the same, and also by a statement of the particular facts and circumstances, with their dates, constituting such emergency.

All quartermaster's supplies for the use of the armies of the United States, except as provided in the preceding sections, are to be obtained from the established depots of the quartermaster's department, or from the heads of the several divisions in such manner, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, as the Quartermaster General may prescribe.

It is to be the duty of the Quartermaster General, immediately after the passage of this act, and at least once in every three months thereafter, to require from the principal quartermasters of the several military departments and depots approximate statements of the aggregate amounts of supplies on hand and estimates of the additional amounts required for the service for the ensuing three months, stating at what places such supplies will be required and what amounts are legally contracted for but not yet delivered. And it is to be the duty of the heads of the several divisions to purchase or contract for the supplies which the Quartermaster General may estimate to be necessary in accordance with law, and all quartermasters are forthwith to turn over to the Quartermaster General, to be assigned to the heads of the several divisions; all contracts not yet fulfilled which they may have executed on behalf of the United States, and all proposals which they may have received in answer to advertisements for future supplies; and if any quartermaster shall neglect or refuse, for the space of one month, to turn over to the Quartermaster General any such contract, such neglect or refusal is to be deemed prima facie evidence of fraud, and it will be the duty of the Quartermaster General to notify the Treasurer of the United States of such neglect or refusal, and the Treasurer of the United States is thereupon to suspend payment of all checks or drafts of such quartermaster, and the pay of such quartermaster is to be stopped until he shall have made a satisfactory explanation to the Secretary of War of such neglect or refusal. If an emergency shall exist, as provided in the fifth section of this act, and the Quartermaster General shall believe that the public interests will be promoted by allowing any such contract to remain in the hands of the quartermaster who executed the same, then such contract may remain in the hands of such quartermaster for the space of two months, and no longer.

All inspectors of horses, clothing, fuel, forage, lumber, and other supplies of the quartermaster's department are to be sworn (or affirmed) to perform their duties in a faithful and impartial manner, and for any corruption, willful neglect, or fraud in the performance of their duties they are to be liable to punishment by fine and imprisonment, by sentence of court-martial or military commission; and if any contractor or person furnishing such supplies shall give, or offer to give, to any inspector of such supplies, or to any other person for his use, directly or indirectly, any money, or other valuable consideration, such person giving, or offering to give such money, or other valuable consideration, is to forfeit to the United States the full amount of his contract or contracts with the United States, and the name and offense of such person is to be published in general orders, and also in one newspaper of general circulation at his place of residence, and it will be unlawful thereafter for any officer of the United States to make any contract with such person.

If any contractor or person furnishing supplies or transportation shall give, or offer to give, or cause to be given, to any officer or employee of the quartermaster's department having charge of the receipt or disposition of the supplies or transportation furnished by him, or in any way connected therewith, any money or other valuable consideration, directly or indirectly, all contracts and charters with such person are, at the option of the Secretary of War, to be null and void; and if any officer or employee of the quartermaster's department shall knowingly accept any such money or other valuable consideration from such person, he is to be deemed guilty of malfeasance and be punished by fine or imprisonment, or both, as a court-martial or military commission may direct.

The heads of the several Executive Departments of the Government may designate the newspapers which shall be entitled to publish the advertisements required by law to be published by such Departments. The rates of publication of such advertisements are not to be higher than those paid by private individuals advertising as largely in the same newspapers. And the twelfth section of the "Act making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th June, 1846," approved March 3, 1845, is to be repealed.

Whenever it shall become necessary to purchase any steam or sailing vessel for the use of the quartermaster's department, the same shall be first inspected by one or more competent naval officers detailed in accordance with the provisions of the act authorizing the detail of naval officers for the service of the War Department, approved February 12, 1862, and all steam vessels are to be inspected by an officer skilled in the construction and operation of steam machinery, in addition to the other usual inspection of such vessels. And it is to be unlawful for any officer of the quartermaster's department to purchase any vessel for the United States until such inspection shall have been fully made, and until the inspecting officers shall have reported favorably upon the condition of such vessel.

The officers placed in charge of the several divisions thus to be created are, during the time that they remain in such charge, each to have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel in the quartermaster's department. The Quartermaster General may, with the approval of the Secretary of War, from time to time, and according to the necessities of the public service, change the distribution of duties among them; and all such changes are to be forthwith published in general orders of the War Department.

During the continuance of the present rebellion the Secretary of War may assign to duty, as inspectors of the quartermaster's department, six officers, to be selected from the regular and volunteer officers who have served for not less than one year in that department, who shall have, while so assigned and acting, the temporary rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant colonels of the quartermaster's department. When any one of those officers is relieved from such duty, his temporary rank, pay, and emoluments will cease, and he will return to his lineal rank in the department.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia with amendments. The first amendment was in line twelve of the first section, after the word "horses" to insert "and mules;" and in line fourteen to insert "or mules" after "horses;" so as to make the clause read:

The first division shall have charge of the purchase, procurement, and disposition of horses and mules for cavalry, artillery, wagon, and ambulance trains, and all other purposes for which horses or mules may be procured for the armies of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the words "and barges" after "vessels," in line twenty-eight of section one.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the words "principal depots of the" before "quartermaster's," in line two of section two; so as to make the section read:

That the supplies and material for the quartermaster's department shall be purchased after due public notice by the heads of the several divisions, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the word "transportation" before "stage," in line thirty-three of section three.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the word "mules" after "horses," in line sixteen of section four.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line two of section eight, after the word "horses" to insert "mules;" and after "lumber" to insert "hired transports;" so as to make the section read:

That all inspectors of horses, mules, clothing, fuel, forage, lumber, hired transports, and other supplies of the quartermaster's department shall be sworn, &c.

The next amendment was to insert the words "or transportation" after "supplies," in lines nine and ten of section eight.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the tenth section of the bill, which was as follows:

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the heads of the several Executive Departments of the Government may designate the newspaper which shall be entitled to publish the advertisements required by law to be published by such Departments: Provided, That the rates of publication of such advertisements shall not be higher than those paid by private individuals advertising as largely in the same newspapers. And the twelfth section of the "Act making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th June, 1846," approved March 3, 1845, shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. GRIMES. I hope that section will not be stricken out.

Mr. WILSON. I think it is unnecessary to have that section in the bill; it will do no good; and I hope, therefore, it will be stricken out; and if Senators want to legislate on matters connected with advertising let it be somewhere else.

Mr. GRIMES. As the section is here I hope the Senate will consent to let it remain here. The first portion of the section only declares what the law ought to be, and perhaps already is:

That the heads of the several Executive Departments of the Government may designate the newspaper which shall be entitled to publish the advertisements required by law to be published by such Departments: Provided, That the rates of publication of such advertisements shall not be higher than those paid by private individuals advertising as largely in the same newspapers.

That is the valuable part of the section. The quartermaster's department, as the Senate very well know, furnishes an immense amount of advertising; and under a provision which in some mysterious way got incorporated into an appropriation bill in 1845, the newspapers published in the city of Washington are authorized to receive the same rate of compensation from the Government for this advertising that is paid by private individuals for a small amount of advertising. The result is that immense sums are paid out by the Government in this city, and especially by the quartermaster's department, under that provision of the act of 1845, for the benefit of the newspapers in this city. I am perfectly content, however, to accept the first seven lines of this section, and let the law of 1845 stand if the Senator chooses. Then this section will only relate to the quartermaster's department; and it is proper that we should regulate in this bill the advertising of the quartermaster's department. If the Senator thinks there would be something incongruous in having the repeal of the act of 1845 in this bill, let us disagree to the amendment of the committee and adopt the first seven lines of this section, and then it will be perfectly congruous and will relate to nothing but the advertising of the quartermaster's department. I understand that the Senator from Massachusetts agrees to this suggestion. I move, then, to strike out all of the section after the end of the seventh line.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out the following words in the section:

And the twelfth section of the act making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th June, 1846, approved March 3, 1845, shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

MR. GRIMES. I now move to amend the section by striking out the words "the heads of the several Executive Departments of the Government," and inserting "the Secretary of War," and then by striking out the word "departments" in the fifth line and inserting "quartermaster's department;" so as to make it read:

That the Secretary of War may designate the newspaper which shall be entitled to publish the advertisements required by law to be published by the quartermaster's department.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Iowa this difficulty: he proposes to amend the amendment of the committee, and then, if that amendment be agreed to, the whole section will go out; if it be not agreed to, the whole section will be in. If the Senator will move to strike out the section and to insert precisely what he wants in it, he will meet the case.

MR. GRIMES. I move, then, to strike out all of the tenth section of the bill after the enacting clause, and to insert in lieu of it the following:

That the Secretary of War may designate the newspaper which shall be entitled to publish the advertisements required by law to be published by the quartermaster's department: Provided, That the rates of publication of such advertisements shall not be higher than those paid by private individuals advertising in the same newspaper.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to insert after the word "department" in the eighth line of the thirteenth section the following:

And he may also assign to each division of more than one brigade a quartermaster as division quartermaster, to be selected in like manner, who, while so assigned, shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a major of the quartermaster's department.

The amendment was agreed to.

MR. RAMSEY. I propose to amend the bill by striking out in the third section the following words:

By or under the direction of the officers in charge of the depots where such supplies may be ordered to be delivered, or by or under the direction of the quartermasters of the commands for whose use they may be purchased or contracted for.

And in lieu of them to insert:

By a competent inspector appointed by and under the direction of the chief of the clothing division, and who shall have had ample experience in the inspection of clothing, knapsacks, camp and garrison equipage, and who shall employ such suitable assistants as the exigencies of the service may require.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

MR. SHERMAN. Before the bill is passed, I should like to have the Senator from Massachusetts tell us what additional officers are provided, and what additional rank is granted by the bill. Let us have a general statement of the results of the bill. I have not yet had time to examine it.

MR. WILSON. The quartermaster's department under this bill is divided into nine divisions, each of which is to have a proper officer at the head of it. There is some promotion of course in that.

MR. SHERMAN. What rank will they have?

MR. GRIMES. It is provided that the officers placed in charge of the several divisions are to have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of the quartermaster's department, or in other words a colonel of cavalry.

MR. LANE, of Kansas. Does it promote the head of the quartermaster's department?

MR. GRIMES. No.

MR. WILSON. There is very little promotion in the bill. The Quartermaster General was very anxious to have promotion in the quartermaster's department to a considerable extent, and several of the military officers in the field have recommended such promotions, among others General Grant, but the committee did not believe that in the present condition of the country it would be proper to gratify the desires and wishes of these officers. Many of them ought to be promoted as a matter of justice; but we can do very little in that way now I think, without adding largely to the expense of the country, and the committee did not feel that they ought to recommend it at this time. This bill divides the department into nine divisions, and my own judgment is that if some plan of this kind had been adopted at the opening of the war we should have saved many millions of dollars to the country.

MR. GRIMES. I am very favorably impressed with the provisions of this bill; but I do not want the officers who are to be appointed or promoted under it to gather from the passage of the bill any understanding that they are to remain permanently in a service that is to be established upon so stupendous a scale as this. I therefore propose to amend the bill by inserting after the word "Army," in the fourth line of the first section, the words "to exist during the present rebellion and one year thereafter;" so that it shall read:

There shall be established in the quartermaster's department of the Army, to exist during the present rebellion and one year thereafter, the following divisions, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

D. FITZGERALD AND J. BALL.

On motion of MR. TEN EYCK, the bill (S. No. 244) for the relief of Daniel Fitzgerald and Jonathan Ball was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. Its purpose is to empower the Commissioner of Patents to proceed upon, determine, and decide the application of Daniel Fitzgerald for an extension of his patent for an improvement in fire-proof chests and safes, and the application of Jonathan Ball for an extension of his patent for an improved mode of coating the interior side of metallic water-pipes with hydraulic cement, the same as though those patents had not been extended once already; and the Commissioner is to examine and decide upon the applications on the same evidence and in the same manner as in other cases where extensions of patents are applied for under existing laws.

MR. TEN EYCK. There is a printed report accompanying this bill, but I do not know that it is necessary to read it; at all events Senators will determine that for themselves after I make a brief statement. There were a very large number of applications made to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office for the extension of patents which had been granted and which had been once extended by the office; and the committee saw occasion to select two of the whole number as suitable for some relief, or at least for investigation. These were two separate applications, but they were grouped together by the committee in one bill. One is for the extension of a patent for certain iron safes, and the other for an extension of a patent for the making of a hydraulic cement for coating water-pipes. It appeared by the evidence before the committee, particularly with respect to the coating for water-pipes—and I had more knowledge of that than of the other case—that from the very nature of the invention, it took a long while to induce the public to go to the expense of even introducing pipes so coated beneath the ground for the purpose for which they were designed, and many years were required to test their durability and sufficiency. In relation to that patent it appeared by the statement of the officers of the company now organized to introduce the improvement into use, and of Jonathan Ball himself, under oath, that it had been entirely unremunerative until within the last two or three years. We had a statement under oath showing what the expenses had been and what the receipts had been, and the receipts amounted to some eight or nine per cent. on the capital stock. Now, within two or three years past, the public have taken hold of this improvement, and it is being generally introduced, having been found to be valuable. The continuation of the patent is desirable on the part of these persons, as there has been no sufficient remuneration for the securing of a valuable improvement, and that would bring it within the principle which has always governed in such cases.

The committee, however, did not see fit to report a bill providing for the extension of the patent for several years longer; but the facts in the case of Daniel Fitzgerald being very similar to the facts in the case of Ball, they preferred to report a bill authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to investigate the matter in detail, to have a full examination, and to see whether the statements thus made by the parties were correct, and if he were satisfied that the improvements were of advantage, and that the parties making the improvements had not been remunerated, and they were in other respects suitable improvements for the extension of the patents, he might have the power of extending them. That is all that is contained in the bill.

MR. TRUMBULL. I should like to hear the report read.

The Secretary read the report made by MR. COWAN on the 20th of April, from which it appears that the memorialist, Daniel Fitzgerald, obtained a patent on the 1st day of June, 1843, for an "improvement in fire-proof chests and safes," and upon the expiration of the same in 1857 he obtained an extension thereof for a further period of seven years.

Jonathan Ball obtained a patent on the 15th day of December, 1843, for an improved mode of coating the interior side of metallic water-pipes with hydraulic cement, and afterwards, on the 15th day of September, 1857, he obtained an extension for a further period of seven years.

The memorialists aver further that from the nature of the subject-matter of the improvements, the amount of capital required to introduce them generally to the notice of the public, and the great length of time required to verify their usefulness, they have neither of them as yet been remunerated for the benefits they have conferred upon the community, and they therefore desire and pray that a further extension may be granted to them for their several patents.

The committee are of opinion that the proper relief to which petitioners are entitled is to allow them to apply to the Commissioner of Patents for a second extension of the patents, to be decided by that officer according to all the provisions of the law now existing as to first extensions, and they report a bill for that purpose, the passage of which they recommend.

MR. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to this bill, except a general one which I have to all bills of this character. I served upon the Committee on Patents one or two Congresses since I have been a member of the Senate, and we had before us a good many applications for the extension of patents by acts of Congress. During the period that I was a member of that committee we revised the law on the subject, and extended the period of time for which parties could take out patents, so that I think it is now seventeen years.

Mr. COWAN. Twenty-one.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I had forgotten the exact time. It used to be fourteen years. Congress was troubled with these applications for the extensions of patents. Almost every party who had a patent would come with an application, and introduce testimony to show that his improvement was a valuable one, and that he had been subjected to litigation or to some extraordinary expense that had prevented his realizing from it the profits which he thought the discovery had entitled him to, and therefore he would want his patent extended. As the law formerly stood authority was given to the Commissioner of Patents in cases of that character to extend the patent for seven years, when the patent originally was taken out for fourteen years. On making a proper showing that he had used due diligence in order to introduce his invention to the public, that notwithstanding this due diligence he had, from some unforeseen obstacle or other, been unable to realize a fair remuneration for his discovery, the Commissioner of Patents was authorized to extend the patent for seven years further, making the whole term twenty-one years. There it was supposed the thing would end.

But now what is this case? These parties obtained their patents in 1843, almost a generation ago. They had them originally for fourteen years, which, in the judgment of Congress, was a sufficient period of time for a party, by the use of ordinary diligence, to receive a fair reward for the discovery which he had made, if it was of any value to the country. Congress supposed that in a period of fourteen years, if a discovery was a valuable one, a patentee could introduce it to the public so as to receive a fair compensation for the improvement. These parties had fourteen years. They then applied to the Commissioner, in 1857, and obtained, each of them, seven years more. They have had twenty-one years, and now they come again and say that from the peculiarity of these patents they have not yet been able to make money enough out of them. Whether these are valuable discoveries or not I do not know. I suppose the Committee on Patents have satisfied themselves on that subject, that they are valuable discoveries, and I suppose the committee have satisfied themselves that these men have exercised, not only during the fourteen years but the seven years additional, due diligence, and have not been able yet to receive a fair remuneration for the labor they were at in perfecting these discoveries. But it does seem to me that it is setting a wretched precedent for Congress, by special legislation, to extend patents beyond twenty-one years.

But gentlemen will say, "We do not propose to do that, we propose to let the Commissioner of Patents do it, just the same as if it had not been extended once." That amounts to the same thing. Whenever you pass an act of Congress of this character, the Commissioner of Patents takes it as a sort of license to extend the patent, and not only a license to extend it, but as an expression of the opinion of Congress that it ought to be extended. These parties are now to go before him just the same as if they had had but one term, without having had an extension already.

If we adopt this proposition we shall have applications for extensions in almost every case. It must be a very peculiar case that will ever justify me in voting to extend a patent by act of Congress, or to authorize a party to apply a second time to the Commissioner for this extension. I did vote for one case. I think there were two cases while I served upon the Committee on Patents where authority was given to extend the patents, but they were very peculiar. One was where a party had made his application for extension in due time; he had not had the seven years' extension, but he made his application in due time, sent on his papers regularly, but from some failure of the mails they were not received in time. Another was a case where the patentee, where the improvement was valuable, went crazy, became insane, and in consequence of his condition the application was not made at the proper time, and it was shown that his family were poor, and that he had never received a fair compensation for his invention. I think in those two cases bills were passed; but there is no such peculiarity shown about this case, and, for one, I hope Congress will not adopt the system of allowing patents to be extended beyond the period of twenty-one years. I think it is long enough.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Mr. President, in the present condition of the Senate I know it is hazardous to add any further expressions on the subject, because I think the Senate are disposed toward an adjournment, or, perhaps, have grown weary of this business, but I may, perhaps, be excused for making a short reply to some of the objections urged by the Senator from Illinois in relation to this bill.

I think the general scope of his remarks would go as well against the granting of any patent originally as against the proposed extension of these patents. The theory upon which we have granted patents is encouragement in the useful arts and manufactures, an inducement held out to men of genius and ingenuity to set their wits to work in order to benefit mankind by inventions and improvements, and that they should have some remuneration or return for the exertions they make in that direction. In this case two patents are proposed to be extended. In regard to one of them I have more knowledge than of the other, because the place of business is located within the borders of my own State, although the invention was originally in the State of New York. My knowledge in regard to it enables me to say that there is a necessity for the extension of that patent at the present time, if we recognize the principle upon which we grant patents at all. It is an improvement in the pipe as a conduit for water; it is claimed to be an improved mode of coating the interior side of metal water-pipes with hydraulic water-cement; and from its very nature and character it requires the lapse of time to prove its usefulness and its durability. The public have been cautious and wary in expending large sums of money in the use and employment of this kind of pipe, because in the first instance the purchase of the pipes and fitting them up and laying them beneath the surface of the ground is attended with great expense; and it was hazardous to employ this improvement and embark in a very great expense lest it might all turn out to be insufficient. It was not known till the lapse of many years whether this cement would stand the corroding influences of the water, mixed with various substances that are to be found in water, and would prove to be valuable; and it is proved by the affidavit of the parties interested in the patent that for a period up to within three or four years past this patent was altogether unremunerative; but within the last three or four years a company has been established and located, and by the experience which has been afforded from the lapse of time, a few pipes having been laid down many years ago, the public have gained confidence in it, and they are being generally introduced.

It appears that the whole amount of receipts for this patent have been nine per cent. upon the money expended, and that is all. The statement made by the applicant was in round numbers, in general terms, of the expenditures attendant upon the introduction of the business and the receipts derived from the introduction of the pipe in public use. We thought as a committee that we were not able to take up this balance sheet and critically examine it; that it would be better for us to pass a bill, which is a sort of enabling bill, authorizing the parties to go before the Commissioner of Patents, who is a kind of watch dog, and who will not allow these patents to pass through unless they stand on the principle which authorizes the extension of a patent after it has been granted for fourteen years in the first instance; and that is all this bill proposes to do, to refer these parties to the Commissioner, to require them to lay before him a statement of their business to show whether it has been remunerative; and if the Commissioner of Patents should be of the opinion that it has not been, he is authorized to extend the patent for seven years longer. If he should be of a contrary opinion, the matter falls to the ground. We thought the Commissioner was better able to judge of the merits of this application than either the Committee on Patents or the Senate itself acting hastily on a measure of this kind.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I hope the Senator will allow this matter to be settled. There is certainly a quorum here or about the Chamber. There have been but three bills reported from the Committee on Patents during the session, and this is the second one that has been acted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts. The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. COWAN. I have a single word to say in regard to this bill. The question raised by the honorable Senator from Illinois is whether a patent, after it has once been extended according to the laws in force, shall ever thereafter be extended or not. If the Senate will determine that question definitely and precisely as it arises on these bills, I am very free to say it will save the labor of the Committee on Patents perhaps more than one half the work it has to do. But if we are to be guided by the principle that he who invents a valuable improvement or makes a valuable discovery shall be entitled to the exclusive use of that improvement or discovery until he is remunerated, then I think we shall be going in accordance with the past conduct of the Senate in that respect, and that these cases will then furnish examples which are within the rule.

Here is Fitzgerald, who invented, as he alleges, a valuable improvement in fire-proof safes; but how was the public to know whether it was a valuable improvement or not? A man may keep a safe for twenty years before a fire occurs by which to test it, and a great many accidents may occur in the mean time to prevent this invention from being remunerative to him. It was not remunerative after he had it fourteen years. He alleges that it is not remunerative after he has had it twenty-one years, and that he can show that to the Commissioner of Patents if he has an opportunity to go before him. All that we enact in this bill, if it becomes a law, is that he shall have that opportunity. Ball's case is very similar. He invents a hydraulic cement for the purpose of coating the interior of metal water-pipes. How long is that to be tested before the community will have confidence in it, such confidence in it as to make it profitable for his remuneration? He says that the twenty years he has already had have not sufficed for that purpose, and that he desires an extension of seven years. The bill says to him, "If you can satisfy the Commissioner of Patents that it has not been remunerative, then it may be extended for another period of seven years."

I should be glad to have a determination of the Senate on the first question, shall patents be extended at all after they have been once regularly extended? If non-extension in such cases is to be the rule, it ought to be known, because then it will be useless to consider such cases any further. If they are to be extended after having been once extended, I have no hesitation in saying that these are fit cases for the operation of that enabling power in Congress, and the applications ought to be granted.

Mr. HALE. How long is it since the patents expired?

Mr. TEN EYCK. Neither has yet expired.

Mr. SUMNER. It seem to me—I may be pardoned for saying a word—that it is very difficult to answer the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania. In short, the argument of the Senator from Illinois is against any extension of a patent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Unless there is some casualty without the fault of the patentee which prevents the full enjoyment of his rights.

Mr. SUMNER. Unless there has been some casualty without his fault which prevents the enjoyment of his rights. The Senator alluded to his experience on the Patent Committee. It so happened that the Senate placed me in years past on that committee for some time, and while there the rule that I followed was to go against an extension unless there seemed to be strong evidence in its favor, unless the case was exceptional. I did not go as far as the Senator from Illinois, to require that the exceptional circumstances should be in the nature of a casualty, for it does seem to me, and I submit to the Senator, that that is asking too much. It seems to me that the exceptional circumstances have been more properly presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania. If it appears satisfactorily that owing to the peculiar nature of the invention or some particular circumstance in connection with its operation, its advantages could not become known during the fourteen years, or, if you please, during the twenty-one years which it is said this invention has had to run, those considerations are of such a character as to make a just ground for exception; otherwise why are we called upon to consider the case of the extension of this patent? We had better adopt a rule, as suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania, not to entertain any such cases, or not entertain any such cases unless the parties in their petition positively set forth what the Senator from Illinois calls casualties. I do not think the Senate are disposed to adopt any rule so rigid and exclusive as that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts, who is a member of the Committee on Patents—

Mr. SUMNER. No; not now. I was last year, but not now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Perhaps the Senator may be informed, or some other member of the committee, whether Congress has in the last ten years in any instance authorized the extension of a patent a second time, unless it has been for some casualty, as the Senator from Massachusetts remarks.

Mr. COWAN. I can answer the honorable Senator from Illinois that there are, I think, three or four cases at least within three or four years, perhaps longer, where Congress has interfered and authorized an extension; and I think in one or two cases they extended the patents by law themselves. There is a case—I do not remember the name of the inventor—of a patent for a metallic coffin which was extended perhaps at this session, or authority to the inventor to go before the Commissioner of Patents and ask for an extension, the same as in this bill.

I will further remark that in both these cases the patents have not yet expired. One of the rules which has governed the committee in its action upon these cases is that the applicants shall endeavor before their patent expires to have the renewal made, so that the right would not lapse to the community, or allow third persons to be involved in trouble by supposing that it had lapsed.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know if I understand correctly the case before us. If I understand it, as the Senator from Pennsylvania puts it, one of these patentees has discovered, as he imagines, some sort of an indestructible composition to be used in the making of fire-proof safes. He wants his patent extended, because there have not been a sufficient number of fires yet occurred where these safes have been exposed to test the question as to whether they are really fire-proof or not; and, as I understand it, he desires us to extend it until these fires shall have been of frequent occurrence enough to settle the question as to the value of this particular species of non-combustible material. I think that is the whole case. This man twenty-one years ago discovered what he believed was an indestructible material. He has been using it; but up to this time he has not had an opportunity to determine satisfactorily to the public whether it is indestructible or not; he has not had sufficient opportunity to submit it to tests to which he might himself subject it at every cross-road.

Mr. COLLAMER. He says it will last forever, but he has not had time to try it.

Mr. GRIMES. In the language of my friend from Vermont, he says it will last forever, but has not yet had time to try it; and the Committee on Patents seriously come in here and ask us to extend this patent more than twenty-one years in order to give this man an opportunity to submit his safes to more trials to settle the question whether this material is indestructible or not. That is the way I understand the case. If the Senator from Pennsylvania can explain it in any other way I wish he would do it.

Mr. COWAN. The Committee on Patents have seriously asked no such thing. The honorable Senator from Iowa has very humorously treated what they ask the Senate to do. Nobody has said, that I know of, that the patentee required twenty-one years to be convinced of the qualities of his safes; but it was asserted that the public might require that and even a longer period before they would be so well satisfied of the value of the improvement, and by adopting it would remunerate the person who discovered it for the time and labor and money which he had expended in procuring for them this benefit and advantage. It is perfectly obvious that there are many improvements which might be of that nature. Although he who invented them and discovered them, or he who had actually tested them, might learn in a very short time whether they were valuable or not, yet it requires a long time to convince the public of it so well that they will make it remunerative to the inventor.

Mr. COLLAMER. As I understand the argument of the Senator, he goes upon the ground that we have recognized in our law the principle that if a man, in the time granted to him by his patent, has not had an opportunity to obtain remuneration pecuniarily, it should be extended, and that on that principle it is proposed to extend these patents. The inquiry I wish to make is this: if we recognize the principle that where a man has not had opportunity to get remuneration, his patent should be extended a second or third time, why should we not have a general law to do it? We have a general law now providing that any patentee by going before the Commissioner previous to the expiration of the patent and showing him that he has not received sufficient remuneration, may receive an extension from him for seven years. If we are to apply that principle still further, why not apply it in the same way, and say that at the end of that seven years he may again show to the Commissioner that he has not received sufficient remuneration and the Commissioner may again extend it. It seems to me, instead of passing bills granting permission to a patentee in a particular case to go before the Commissioner, we should have a general law allowing all men to go before the Commissioner and show the facts in any case again and again, if it is proper to do it at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. TEN EYCK called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Chandler, Clark, Cowan, Davis, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Pomeroy, Rainey, Richardson, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, and Ten Eyck—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Collamer, Conness, Doolittle, Fessenden, Grimes, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wiley—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Dixon, Harding, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Hicks, Howe, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Riddle, Saulsbury, Wilson, and Wright.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

LAND GRANT TO AN IOWA RAILROAD.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 159) for a grant of lands in the State of Iowa in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State. It proposes to grant to the State of Iowa, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from Sioux City, in that State, to the South line of the State of Minnesota, at such point as the State of Iowa may select between the Big Sioux and the west fork of the Des Moines river; also to that State for the use and benefit of the McGregor Western Railroad Company, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from a point at or near the foot of Main street, South McGregor, in that State, in a westerly direction, by the most practicable route, on or near the forty-third parallel of north latitude, until it shall intersect the road running from Sioux City to the Minnesota State line, in the county of O'Brien, in that State, every alternate section of land designated by odd numbers for ten sections in width on each side of the roads; but, in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the lines or routes of the roads are definitely located, sold any section or any part thereof, or that the right of preemption or homestead settlement has attached to the same, or that the same has been reserved by the United States for any purpose whatever, then it is to be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be selected, from the public lands of the United States nearest to the specified tiers of sections, so much land in alternate sections, or parts of sections, designated by odd numbers, as shall be equal to such lands as the United States have sold, reserved, or otherwise appropriated, or to which the rights of homestead settlement or preemption have attached, which lands thus indicated by odd numbers and sections, by the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, are to be held by the State of Iowa for the uses and purposes of these railroads. The land so selected is in no case to be located more than twenty miles from the lines of the roads, and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States by any act of Congress, or in any other manner by competent authority, for the purpose of aiding in any object of internal improvement or other purpose whatever, are reserved and excepted from the operations of this act, except so far as it may be found necessary to locate the routes of the roads through such reserved lands, in which case the right of way is to be granted subject to the approval of the President of the United States.

There is also a section which grants to the State of Minnesota, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railroad from St. Paul and St. Anthony, via Minneapolis, to a convenient point of junction west of the Mississippi, to the southern boundary of the State, in the direction of the mouth of the Big Sioux river, four additional alternate sections of land per mile, to be selected upon the same conditions, restrictions, and limitations as are contained in the act making a grant of land to the Territory of Minnesota, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in that Territory, and granting public lands in alternate sections to the State of Alabama, to aid in the construction of a certain railroad in that State, approved March 3, 1857. The land to be so located by virtue of this section may be selected within twenty miles of the line of the road; but in no case at a greater distance therefrom.

The bill contains other sections which are common to such bills.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 11, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATIONS.

The SPEAKER stated the first question in order to be the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 40, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1865, the pending question being on the following amendment:

Strike out the following amendment of the Senate: SEC. 3. And he it further enacted, That the President may, in his discretion, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the kingdom of Belgium, who shall receive no higher compensation than is now allowed to a minister resident.

And in lieu thereof insert the following: That the sum of $12,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to pay the salary of an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the kingdom of Belgium, if the President, in the exercise of his constitutional power, shall see fit to appoint such officer.

Mr. KASSON. I have prepared a substitute for that amendment which I intend to submit; but I do not see the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRYOR] in his seat.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

That if the President, in his discretion, shall nominate an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the kingdom of Belgium, the sum appropriated to the minister resident is hereby transferred to such envoy, and the additional sum of $2,500 is hereby appropriated in conformity with the first section of the consular and diplomatic act, approved August 18, 1856.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I know that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FAYEN] wants to say something on this subject; and as he is not present, I move that this section be passed over for the present.

There was no objection, and it was agreed to accordingly.

Thirty-first amendment:

Add the following as a new section:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the third section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1860," approved March 3, 1859, is hereby repealed. And the fee for certifying invoices to be charged by the consuls general for the British North American provinces, and his subordinate consular officers and agents, for goods not exceeding $100 in value, shall be one dollar, and the same fee shall be charged for certifying the growth or production of goods made duty free by the reciprocity treaty: Provided, however, That no such certificate of growth or production shall be required for goods not exceeding in value the sum of $300.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended a concurrence in the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to add the following proviso:

Provided further, That the salaries for consuls in the British provinces of North America shall be paid in the lawful currency of the United States.

Mr. KASSON. While this is not from the Committee of Ways and Means I have personally no objection to it, and do not know that there is any objection to it. It is intended merely to provide that the consuls along our northern frontier, across the water from the United States, shall be paid in the legal tender of the United States.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the fees pay the salaries of these consuls?

Mr. KASSON. The communications from the Executive Departments show that they will more than pay the salaries of these consuls.

Mr. BROOKS. How much more?

Mr. KASSON. They cannot do more than approximate to it.

Mr. BROOKS. These consuls will have to be paid better than they have been paid; for under the new tax law we will have to adopt some regulations like these in operation upon the borders of Belgium and other countries. The labor of these consuls will, of course, be great. And under our present rate of duty smuggling will be immense unless the frontier is guarded carefully.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman will see by looking to a previous part of the bill that these consuls are paid a salary of $1,500 a year. This proviso merely provides that payment shall be made in the legal tender of the United States.

Mr. BROOKS. What about the fees?

Mr. KASSON. They go into the Treasury. The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the Senate amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Thirty-second amendment:

Add as a new section:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the office of commercial agent at Hakodadi, Japan, may, at the discretion of the Secretary of State, be changed to that of consul, to be classed with consuls other than those named in schedules B and C in the act approved August 18, 1856.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended a concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Thirty-third amendment:

Amend the title of the bill by adding thereto the words, "and for other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the twenty-ninth amendment of the Senate, heretofore passed over, and which is as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the second section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1858," approved February 7, 1857, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended a non-concurrence in this amendment.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, having given some consideration to this bill from a desire for personal information, I am constrained, reluctantly, to withhold my assent to the recommendation of the committee that the House do not concur in the amendment of the Senate, restoring that section of an act of 1856 authorizing the appointment of twenty-five consular pupils.

The functions of our consuls are of the highest importance to our commercial prosperity, and often involve the peace of the country and the honor of the Government. The field of their duties lies beyond the limits of the nation they represent, and is far removed from the ordinary sources of information. Their operations are not confined to commercial affairs, but extend by treaty stipulations with several of the Barbary States and European Governments to the exercise of judicial powers. In Turkey, Siam, Japan, and China, they are called upon to determine the destination of immense treasures, and have the entire criminal jurisdiction of citizens of the United States. These, sir, are extensive powers, and in fold the permanent welfare of the country. The proper discharge of such functions in a foreign land, and sometimes in collision with the able and wary officials of States jealous of republican institutions and of our growing power, demands the exercise of special gifts and peculiar accomplishments.

But, sir, I apprehend we do not ordinarily find these rare qualifications brought to the administration of our consular system as at present organized. Nor can we with reason require this until it is brought into accordance with the European systems which educate men for these special duties.

Our consular system is embodied in the act of 1856, in which the scattered legislation upon the subject was gathered up, revised, supplemented, and framed into a single statute.

The origin of the system was a bill, generally believed to have been drawn by Chief Justice Ellsworth, at the time chairman of the Senate committee to whom the recommendation of President Washington upon the subject had been referred. The names of that committee have since become familiar and revered through all the land, and could they but speak to us of the early history of the Republic they might without arrogance or presumption adopt the language of the Latin poet,

"Quorum pars magna fui."

The bill, with some amendments, passed both Houses unanimously, and became a law in 1792. More than seventy years have since elapsed, and the act, in substance, is still in force. In 1854 a distinguished member of this House pronounced the original system "cumbersome in its details and unsuited to the nature of American institutions."

I will not give judgment upon the justice or injustice of this criticism, but will presume to suggest that the fact that the original act still survives in its main features, though somewhat modified and supplemented to adapt it to the changed conditions and enlarged demands of our expanding commerce, testifies unmistakably to the profound sagacity if not to the comprehensive wisdom of its framers.

In 1803 an act was passed providing in various ways for the protection of American seamen, for the payment of fees, for the authentication of the transfer of United States stocks, and for penalties for the issue of false certificates and passports. The provisions of this act, in part at least, were made upon the recommendation of the elder Adams in his second annual address to Congress.

This, sir, was the sum total of our legislation for more than sixty years upon an interest involving more than any other not only the security of our citizens and the respectability of the Republic among foreign nations, but also the protection and enlargement of our commerce, the exhaustless source of national wealth, from which the Government draws its revenues in time of peace, and by which, once at least in our brief history, it has liquidated a debt whose ratio to the whole wealth of the country was nearly as large as that of the present debt to the present wealth of the country, and after that filled the Treasury with a surplus of $40,000,000.

A report commending itself by its wisdom and ability to all well-informed men had been made upon this subject by Mr. Livingston, the Secretary of State, during the administration and under the sanction of President Jackson. But, with the exception of the ill-judged act of 1840, regulating the shipment and discharge of seamen, and the duties of consuls, no essential changes were made in the system by our legislation till 1855.

In 1844, a bill to remodel the system was introduced into the Senate by Mr. Semple, of Illinois, and indefinitely postponed.

In 1845 a similar bill was referred to Mr. Buchanan, at the time Secretary of State, with a request for a report upon the same to the House. The Secretary's report, made at the commencement of the following session, was one of marked ability, and gave evidence of careful research and extended observation. It reviewed the whole subject, and recommended such improvements as would adapt the system to the then present amplitude of our commerce, and to the policy practiced by other nations in their commercial and diplomatic intercourse. No immediate action resulted from this report, but it furnished valuable materials for future legislation.

Mr. Perkins, of Louisiana, after a thorough investigation of the subject, prepared and presented to the House in 1854 a bill to remodel the entire diplomatic and consular system of the United States. The bill was a great improvement upon the existing laws. Among other things it provided that consuls and commercial agents should not be absent from their districts more than ten days without leave from the President, and that their salaries should cease if they were absent a longer time either with or without leave; that none but citizens of the United States could receive such appointments, be employed as clerks, or have access to the archives of the foreign offices of the Government; that consuls in none of the principal ports should transact business in person or by an agent; and that they should receive their pay by salary and not by fees; that commissions and fees should be in part abolished and in part reduced, and the funds thus received returned to the Treasury and used to pay the consular salaries. The bill passed the House by a very large majority, and the Senate unanimously. It was approved March 1, 1855. Immediately on its passage Mr. Marcy set about the preparation of a volume of instructions, which was completed and transmitted to our consuls.

The examination thus given to the subject by the Secretary and by the Attorney General in the preparation of this volume, led to the discovery of many defects in the law, and to an earnest recommendation of an early revision. The result was the act of 1856.

In this bill first appeared a provision for the appointment of consular pupils, though it had been anticipated in a treaty negotiated with France by Mr. Everett. The act was passed and approved near the close of the session. At the opening of the next session an appropriation was asked to pay the salaries of the twenty-five pupils whom the law authorized the President to appoint. After a spirited and somewhat protracted debate, in which there was a great deal of talk and a little sound reasoning, the appropriation was refused by the House. When the subject came before the Senate, the members of that body not only refused the appropriation, but voted to rescind the section authorizing the appointment of such pupils. Then, as now, the principal argument used by the opponents of the measure was the very obvious and unanswerable asseveration that the innate sagacity of an American citizen was an over-match for the learning, skill, and aptitude of any foreign merchant or official acquired through years of tedious training.

Now, sir, I am not so foolhardy as to attempt the refutation of a self-evident truth, for "thank God I, too, am an American citizen," and will therefore devote myself to some objections in which we are not so well-agreed.

It is urged in opposition that the law provides no guarantee that these young men will not be removed with every change of Administration; none that the Government will advance them to higher consular duties when educated, or that they will consent to serve in that capacity if desired so to do. The greater inducements held out by mercantile pursuits, it is affirmed, will inevitably draw them away from the service of the Government. All these anticipated evils may be provided against, if it is thought wise, by specific provisions of law.

But, sir, the objections lose their force when it is remembered that these young men, unlike the students in our naval and military schools, would render a full equivalent, in service, for all they receive from Government during the process of their consular education; for they are to be assigned by the President "to such consulates and with such duties as he may think proper." It should be kept in mind, too, that the salaries of our consuls were graded by the law of 1856 upon the assumption that these pupil-clerks would be appointed and paid by Government. If, then, the House do not concur with the Senate in the restoration of this section, and do not make the requisite appropriations therefor, the salaries of our consuls, diminished by the compensation of indispensable clerks, will, as we are assured by the Secretary of State, be altogether inadequate for an economical support of themselves and their families in expensive foreign capitals.

It was while Mr. Hawthorne was serving at Liverpool that the act went into operation requiring all consular fees to be paid into the Treasury, and the consuls to be remunerated by a fixed salary. That eminent and gifted American was compelled to remove his family at once from the social and literary intercourse of the city back amid the more simple enjoyments of the country, by a laudable desire, if not an inexorable necessity, to bring his expenses within his income.

The salary fixed at that time for both Liverpool and London was $7,500. It has not since been advanced, though the unavoidable expenses of those consulates have greatly increased, as there is manifold and most mournful evidence in the correspondence of Messrs. Dudley and Mann at the State Department.

The consul at Glasgow reports that his present salary will not enable him to eke out an economical support for himself and family. The consul at Marseilles writes to the same effect, as follows:

"The consuls at Marseilles of all the principal Powers are paid some double and some more than double the salary of your consul; yet all complain of the inadequacy of their pay, asserting that five francs five years ago had a value there that eight have not at the present time. Mr. Mack, the English consul, with a salary of $5,000, informs me that his expenses for living during the last three years have outrun his income for that period to the amount of $3,500, yet he lives in a plain style, and assures me that the only luxury he allows himself is a daily morning walk. I had intended to board myself and family, but with only my wife and two little children, I found that my plan, if carried out at a respectable house, would cost me much more than my entire salary, leaving less than nothing to pay for clothing, clerk-hire, &c. I remember that when I was to Iowa, an old gray-headed lawyer asked me if I was or had been a tailor. 'Ah, you have not,' he exclaimed; 'can't succeed here then; nobody but tailors make acceptable lawyers for Iowa people.' In another sense it is true here: to make his means fit the end, it requires a tailor for a United States consul at Marseilles."

Our consul at Paris, at the close of an exceedingly interesting and instructive communication, sums up the whole matter in the following statistics:

"The annual and indispensable expenses of the consulate, then, for the work I am now doing, may be briefly recapitulated as follows:

	Per annum.	Per annum.

"An office has need to be one of great dignity which can command such a premium for the privilege of holding it; and then he ought to be very ambitious or very rich who would care to hold it long."

It should be borne in mind, sir, that this is from the pen of an able and accomplished gentleman, who has rendered valuable service to the Government during the pending struggle in other than official ways, especially in the publication of a work in French, setting forth the resources of our country and the character of our people in a way to secure for us the favorable judgment and good opinions of the European mind.

But, sir, I apprehend that these matters may all be left without solicitude to the operations of the laws of mind, which are more irresistible than the enactments of States. Men are insensibly drawn into those pursuits which harmonize with the habits and tastes which, if not created, have at least been matured and made permanent by education and association. These pupils, having become familiar with the languages of the respective countries to which they would be assigned, and affiliated thereto, in a measure, by ties of taste and friendship, and seeking to complete intellectual pursuits upon which they had entered, would be held to the consulates without law by a natural gravitation.

If, at length, drawn away by the tempting prizes held out to commercial enterprise, in the majority of cases their business operations would be confined to those countries with which both study and experience had rendered them familiar, for these would be to them the path of success. What then?

Knowledge would widen with the circles of trade and the intercourse of business, until these men, comprehending the higher relations and abstruse economy of commerce, and familiar with the institutions and habits of foreign society, would be fitted as no other American citizens could be to fulfill the responsible and often delicate duties devolved upon the consuls of this great commercial people. Nor would this be the entire outgrowth and fruitage of the system which the Government through three Administrations has attempted to establish. Many of the appointees passing to their professional training from our higher institutions of learning would not rest with the acquisition of foreign languages and a knowledge of what pertains immediately to official duties, but would pass on to a study of the literature, the history, the laws, and the genius of foreign Governments, and thus we should have in time what we never have had, a body of public men fitted, eminently fitted, by their comprehensive and varied attainments, to sustain the national reputation and welfare at foreign courts in the higher ministerial relations.

It will be perceived that I do not rest this argument upon any statute, nor even upon the regulations laid down by the State Department in respect to the duties and advancement of consular pupils. I base it upon an inevitable sequence of events that are in their nature related to each other. The advancement of these consular pupils to higher and more responsible duties and their continuance in office will be a necessity growing out of their superior qualifications and the demands of both commerce and diplomacy for the very best ability which the genius of our institutions can produce. Thus it seems clear to my apprehension that the scheme, in accordance with its design and contrary to the fears of some gentlemen, will tend to obviate the instability which hitherto has been the great evil of our diplomatic and consular policy.

A still stronger argument for the restoration of the rescinded section of the law of 1856, if possible, is to be found in the increased and urgent demand for clerical service growing out of an act of the last Congress requiring triplicate invoices of all imports of foreign goods, certified to by the consul, vice consul, or commercial agent of the United States nearest to the place of shipment.

This act is precautionary against fraud, and specifies that one of the triplicate invoices shall be given to the shipmaster for the entry of his goods, wares, or merchandise, one forwarded to the collector of the port of entry, and the other carefully preserved among the archives of the consulate. This act has added $100,000 to the receipts of the Treasury in consular fees, and, by a rough estimate made by those whose judgment upon this matter is entitled to great respect and confidence, has increased the annual revenues to the extent of $10,000,000. But at the same time it has increased the business of the consulates sixty or a hundred-fold, and thereby made a necessity for an increase of the clerical force. As a consequence of this our consuls very generally, and, as it would seem, not unreasonably, have applied for an advance of salaries. These applications, with but three exceptions, have been held in abeyance in anticipation of the relief to be given to the principal stations by the clerical pupils provided for in this bill.

If now we reject this measure, we ought in simple justice to increase the salaries of our commercial agents of various grades to meet this unprecedented and unavoidable outlay, and that, sir, would be a burden heavier than it is proposed to lay upon the Treasury by this bill. Perhaps state-craft will justify such economy, but my limited observation has left me simple enough to suppose that a true statesmanship would scorn

"With one hand to put
A penny in the urn of poverty,
And with the other take a shilling out."

It is easy for this House to perceive that a single fraud, such as the operation of this law discovers to us to have been practiced upon our revenue officers heretofore, to the extent of millions of dollars annually, might deprive us of a sum sufficient and more than sufficient to cover the entire expense of this system of consular pupils. And in view of the unfortunate prejudices of the European mind against us, is it unreasonable to suppose that our commercial and governmental interests would suffer far less from frauds perpetrated through collusion with consular clerks if they were intelligent Americans than if they were of foreign birth, intimate with foreign merchants, and educated into all the antipathies and antagonisms of European society?

The appointment of American clerks would seem to be dictated by common prudence, and from the consideration also that it would secure freedom and efficiency within the sphere of their activities. Vattel says:

"The functions of a consul require that he be not a subject of the State where he resides, as in this case he would be obliged in all things to conform to its orders, and not be at liberty to acquit himself of the duties of his office."

This would apply in its full force to the chief clerk in the absence or sickness of the consul, and measurably to all the clerks in the discharge of their proper functions. We cannot afford to forego the advantages proffered to us in this bill.

But, sir, it is objected that the appointment of these twenty-five pupils will increase the patronage of the President, already fearfully large. There is an old proverb that it is the last straw which breaks the camel's back. Now, sir, all I have to say is, if this straw will break down the Government, or even demoralize an honest Chief Magistrate, neither the one nor the other will be worth saving. There are weighty reasons why these clerks should be appointed by and responsible to the Government and not to the consuls. Let me bring to the notice of the House the words of one of our ablest writers, at the time a consul at one of the principal marts of Europe. He says:

"In my opinion the whole staff of clerks should be appointed, not by the consul, but by the State Department, of which they should be the servants, and not removable by the consul except on grounds approved by the Secretary of State. With clerks of my own selection I would engage to commit defalcations to the extent of at least one half of the receipts of the office without the possibility of proof against me. No man ought to be exposed to so great a temptation as this. Many men will certainly yield to it."

It will be remembered by members familiar with our consular history that the successor of this distinguished gentleman, unfortunately for himself and the Government, proved the feasibility of the plan so ably foreshadowed.

But it is still further urged, in language which has conveyed to my mind certainly something of bitterness and contempt, that the effect of this measure would be to establish schools in which the sons of political favorites would be educated abroad at public expense for the discharge of duties which they would never perform. One might suppose from the tone of this groundless charge that it contained "a charm of powerful trouble" that must inevitably drag the bill into the limbo of perished legislation.

But I affirm that no candid mind can apprehend danger from this source when it is considered that the administration of Government frequently passes from one party to another, and that parties themselves are constantly changing. If it were true, it would be the most innocent of all political patronage, and an evil likely soon to cure itself; for these young men, having never entered deeply into the struggles of politics, would, after a brief absence, cease to be partisans and become, what every commercial agent of the Government abroad should be, but what they are not very likely to be under the present system, candid and unbiased friends of the Republic.

I must confess, however, that what is here urged as the main reason to dissuade from this measure persuades me most to its support. Even if no immediate equivalent in service was to be returned, it would not, I apprehend, be a breach of any axiom of political economy or do violence to the teachings of a sound political philosophy, for this Congress to devote the small sum solicited by the Government through three Administrations, and by such statesmen as Everett, Marcy, Cass, and Seward, to an effort to improve the business capacity and professional intelligence of the commercial agents of this great people in foreign capitals. It might at least add to the stock of national intelligence, if it did nothing more, and thus feed the hidden sources of our prosperity, stability, and glory as a people. We do well always to bear in mind that ignorance is the mother of discord and sedition in free States, and makes popular suffrage a snare and a weakness. It has been our misfortune, and a main reason that we are now repeating the bloody experience of the early republics, that our population in a large section of the Union has increased more rapidly than the power to educate, enlighten, and assimilate the teeming millions. Had we to-day, sir, a bureau of national instruction under the guidance of an enlightened and judicious secretary it would be well for our permanent peace and prosperity, and would allay the anxious fears of many of the wisest and best friends of civil liberty both in Europe and America. It is a narrow and suicidal philosophy that would withhold or divert the bounty which the Government would devote to the education of its people. The measure before us is a part of that enlightened policy which appoints to special training chosen youth for special duties of preëminent and paramount importance to the Republic.

Permanent foreign clerks, familiar with the duties of the office, are frequently the leading personages, and have the paramount control of the large financial and commercial interests of our consulates. This is true not only in the temporary absence and disability of the consuls and in the transitions of Administrations, but too often during the entire period of an Administration. This is both disreputable and unsafe. Let us fill these clerkships with intelligent Americans, upon whose sympathies we can rely, who will labor for the welfare of our commerce and Government, and who, in time, will commend themselves to the appointing power, by their special acquisitions and qualifications, for interpreters, vice consuls, and consuls, and not unfrequently for still higher duties in the foreign missions.

Again, it is urged, and it is the only argument against this measure which has weight upon my mind, that it is not prudent to add $25,000 to the burdens of the Government in these perilous times. But, sir, I call to mind that the genius of trade, in periods of great financial embarrassment, often fills the lap of poverty with plenty by judiciously investing capital in ways that will enlarge the profits of productive industry. So I can but believe this application of the public funds will increase the business and multiply the profits of commerce till the income it brings to the Treasury will far outrun the yearly draft. A Government, paralyzed through fear of evils to come, will inevitably be drawn into the vortex from which it shrinks. Let it be borne in mind that our State Department is nearly self-supporting; that our consular system, sustained at an annual expense of $300,000, returns more than two hundred and fifty thousand dollars into the Treasury in consular fees, and that the incomes from this source are increasing year by year.

Give us back the Union reconstructed upon the basis of free labor and untrammelled enterprise, and our commerce will rise from the struggle like Anteus from his contact with the earth. With such an issue, though our commercial marine should be swept from the ocean, it would spring like a Phoenix from the ashes of war and renew its flight. Let us, then, conduct our legislation in the full assurance of final victory and prolonged prosperity. Sir, we will let

"No pent-up Utica contracts our powers;
The whole boundless continent is ours."

The classic gentleman who represents the commercial metropolis of the Republic upon this floor with such distinguished ability, a little time since quoted in eloquent phrase, but, as I must think, unfortunate connection, the proverbial Delenda est Carthago of the old Roman patriot. Sir, I commend to the gentleman to recall and ponder over the life and death of that great exemplar of civil liberty. Could we but unsphere the spirit of Cato and bid it speak through his lips, it would inspire them with no miserable word of discouragement or taunt or bitterness against his Government in this hour of the nation's prolonged struggle for life and liberty, but adapting itself to the changed condition of the times, would close all his speeches with the heroic cry, Delenda est rebellio et confederatio.

Cato was more than willing that Africa should perish that liberty and the republic might survive.

In the law of 1856, the President is authorized to require of the consuls:

"The communication of information and the procurement and transmission of the products of the arts, sciences, manufactures, agriculture, and commerce from time to time, as he may think conducive to the public interests."

They are liable also, in the absence of the proper officers, to be called upon to fulfill diplomatic functions. We see, therefore, that the discharge of very responsible duties, and those requiring extended information and a high order of intelligence, may be laid upon these officers. These duties are represented by the Secretary of State as having been very onerous and valuable during the progress of the present war. He says:

"Since the commencement of this war the Department has had much confidential correspondence with our consuls abroad in relation to the rebel privateers, the fitting out of blockade runners, and equipping of vessels of war in foreign countries by individuals in the interest of the rebels, and the shipment of arms and other munitions for their use. Upon all these matters the Department has been kept fully informed by our consuls, and the information thus communicated, which has been promptly made known to the Navy Department, and thus to the commanders of the blockading squadrons, has led to the capture and condemnation of many blockade runners with valuable cargoes."

"It is important, therefore, that the chief clerk in each of the principal consulates should be a thoroughly loyal American citizen, fitted at any moment, in case of the sickness, absence, death, or temporary disability of the consul, to take his place and discharge faithfully his duties."

The object, sir, of our consular system is to protect the commercial rights and privileges of the nation, and to advance its prosperity and power. No agents of the Government stand nearer the sources of national greatness, none are intrusted with higher interests. The peace of the country and the honor of its flag over every sea and in every clime are in their keeping. They stand in eminent social relations in all the great mercantile marts of the world, and by their attainments, manners, and business capacity, determine largely the opinions of mankind in respect to our national character. In view of these grave responsibilities, I submit, sir, that it is the part of a prudent policy and an enlightened statesmanship for this assembly to forego no opportunity to enlarge the influence of its representatives abroad, and to secure the respect of foreign nations.

Mr. BROOKS. What is the precise question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the twenty-ninth amendment of the Senate, in which the Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence.

Mr. BROOKS. That is to strike out the provision for the twenty-five consular pupils.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is to add section two.

Mr. BROOKS. That leaves out the twelve consular pupils?

The SPEAKER. That is the effect of it, although the twenty-five consular pupils are not named in the section.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, after the action of the Committee of Ways and Means recommending a non-concurrence in this amendment of the Senate, I should not have risen to address the House but for the highly instructive and elaborate speech of the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. PATTERSON.] As such a speech may have an undue effect upon the House and change the action recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means, I feel it my duty briefly to address the House in reply to the honorable gentleman.

I thank the honorable gentleman for the compliments he has paid me and which I so illy deserve; and though such compliments quite disarm me in any reply I may have to make, yet I must say something of his reference to the fulmination in the Roman senate of Cato the Censor, Delenda est Carthago, and his application of that fulmination as words now fit for us in the Congress of the United States.

The honorable gentleman, scholar as he is, will remember that it was in the free, popular, and classic days of Rome, when a Roman citizen enjoyed Roman liberty, that this fulmination went forth from Rome, Delenda est Carthago. "I am a Roman citizen," was then the proudest boast of man, and the joy and glory of a Roman. Rome then began the process of confiscation and extermination for all the nations of the earth; not only for Hispania and Britannia, but thence on to the Euphrates and the Tigris. Arms then governed Rome, no longer the toga. But in this conquering and exterminating process the Roman republic became the consolidated Roman empire. Roman liberty was lost; the rights of Romans ceased to exist; the Roman citizen was no longer a citizen, but the mere subject of a Roman emperor. I fear that if this process of consolidation and extermination is carried on, though the American empire may be spread from Washington far beyond the Rio Grande to Central America, and perhaps to the Amazon or to the arctic regions, yet in that process the fate which was the fate of the Roman citizen may be ours, and we shall no longer be free and independent American citizens, but the subjects of some wretched, miserable, praetorian-elected emperor.

These remarks, sir, I know are not kindred to the subject before the House, but the topic was introduced by the gentleman from New Hampshire. I therefore pass from them with this other remark, that the whole scope and tendency of his argument, if not of his course, is too like consolidation in everything. The gentleman is quite sure that if a bureau of instruction were instituted by this Government for the education of the people, our institutions would be better secured than if it were left to the people to educate themselves. Here the honorable gentleman and myself differ altogether. He believes that all good is to come from the Government; I believe that all good is to come from man. I believe that the precepts of Christianity are first to reform the man, the individual, and not the action of the Government. But the action of the Government in general is likely to do more harm to mankind than it is to do good, and whatever reforms mankind must come from Christianity, from family and home training, and not from the fostering care of the Federal Government, or of any consolidated Government. It is but natural, therefore, in this process of reasoning, that the gentleman should be advocating that this system of international institutions should be established by the people of the United States at the expense of the people of the United States.

True there are but twenty-five consular pupils named in this bill, but these twenty-five are but a nest-egg of a vast system which in the end will be imposed upon the whole diplomatic system of the country. Our system beautifully differs from all European systems in all its diplomatic regulations; and I declare with all the confidence of truth that nowhere on earth, under no form of Government service since the foundation of our Republic, has the diplomacy of a Government ever been better carried on or so well carried on as in this under our system peculiar to the United States. The whole history of our country shows that we abound with educated, intelligent, and literary men qualified to represent our country abroad in any court of Europe without foreign training therefor.

Who are the men, educated in our schools, trained in no diplomatic circle anywhere, who have illustrated the honor of the American name abroad? The illustrious Jefferson, of Virginia, as minister to France; the elder Adams at the court of St. James, and his son, the younger Adams, one of the best educated men in the country. Then there was the illustrious Pinckney, and the not less illustrious Jay; and in our own day a not less renowned and distinguished man, who has shed light upon international law, and given renown to our nation the world over, Mr. Wheaton, the product of New England schools, and trained in no foreign courts. And our diplomacy has been illustrated too by Irving as minister to Spain, by Van Buren, minister to England, and by Motley, another offspring of New England schools, and New England schools alone; and by Hawthorne, also trained in no school of diplomacy. Everett I had almost forgotten to name among the brilliant list; but if the last named, he is among the foremost of the scholars, not only of our country, but of the world.

In the whole diplomatic history of Europe, when we come to compare name with name, historian with historian, scholar with scholar, neither France nor England nor Russia, nor all combined, can present so beautiful a galaxy of literary men as the American diplomacy has afforded, from Franklin, the printer, down to our day, although they have been men trained in our own schools. What need, then, for consular schools in Europe or anywhere to educate our young men? Our system differs entirely from foreign systems. I had almost forgotten the name of Lewis Cass among the list of those who have so illustrated our country abroad—Cass, a man born of New England, but educated on the frontier among the savages of the Northwest. It has been our policy to take that class of men from among the great body of the people and send them to Europe to meet counts and lords and dukes, and we have lost nothing in the result, but gained much.

Their system is an hereditary one; their diplomacy passes from family to family; they are educated and trained only for diplomatic purposes; while our representatives, the offspring of our free institutions, have presented the class of men I have described here. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. PATTERSON] well says that in courts like those of Japan, Siam, and China, highly educated consuls are necessary. I know they are. Judicial processes are intrusted to them, but qualified men are abundant if the Executive will but select them to fill those places. And I hesitate not to say, from a personal knowledge and experience, that the consulate at Constantinople has been filled for years by one of the best educated men that could have been selected in any country of Europe for that purpose. The consulate in Japan, filled by Mr. Harris, and the consulate in China, filled at one time by Dr. Parker, afterwards made Commissioner, were provided with men most admirably fitted for their places. And if good men are not always selected for such places it is the fault of the Executive, because such men are abundant in the country, and the Executive can always have them if he wills.

And now our whole system of education and training is educating our young men far more than they used to be for filling these consular offices when the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire and myself were young men. Even the Arabic is taught in some of our schools to fit men for consulships in the East. Our late consul at Beyrout was one of the best educated Arabic scholars in the East, a native-born American citizen. Indeed, the important consulships have been in the main adequately well filled; and where there are wrong men, I repeat, the fault is in the Executive, whom no consular schools can correct.

Sir, I should look upon it as a great calamity, a great misfortune, to this country if we should be represented abroad in high places by consular pupils, by men who have been twenty or thirty years from their country. It is necessary for every young man to come home within five or ten years and free himself of the courtly associations and despotic modes of European thinking, to breathe once more the spirit of our own free institutions; then, after thus mingling with the great body of the community, to go abroad once more if necessary to represent that free spirit abroad. The law, therefore, here proposed is not necessary, and I trust and hope that it will not be accepted by the House. I trust that the action of the Committee of Ways and Means—a committee with which I do not always agree—will be supported by all sides of the House, and that we will not now, in the midst of war, not now in the midst of a bleeding Treasury, as well as of a bleeding people, not now, when economy is more than ever necessary, begin to educate young men abroad for any diplomatic purpose whatever.

Mr. PATTERSON. I wish to occupy the attention of the House for a few moments only. I do not desire to reply to the gentleman's illogical and irrelevant inferences in respect to my advocacy of consolidation. I wish simply to say that his remarks, so far as they have any force, would stand against an act authorizing the appointment of diplomatic pupils, not against the Senate amendment to the bill now before the House, which would restore the rescinded section of the law of 1856, providing for the appointment of consular pupils.

Does not the gentleman know that several of the distinguished men whose names he has paraded with such triumph were trained diplomats, that they enjoyed as a prerequisite of their great success the professional discipline which I advocate for our consuls? This is true of Jefferson, Adams, Everett, Wheaton, Motley, and others whom I might mention.

I am not unmindful of the great services and splendid abilities of Franklin, Jay, Wheaton, and other honored names never to be forgotten in our diplomatic history. Those venerated names but illustrate the rule and shadow forth the possibilities of a better system.

Of such, and of such only, could Horace say,

"Nil mortalibus arduum est," but the verse which succeeds in the splendid lyric,

"Cælum Ipsi petimus stultitia," though but a poet's myth drawn from the fables of the giants, is but simple verity if applied to our present American consular system.

Why, sir, Mr. Everett, to whom the gentleman refers, was the first to introduce this policy by embodying it in the treaty which he negotiated with the French minister in 1853. The Secretaries Marcy and Cass, whom he has summoned before us, urged it earnestly and persistently. They who have had the best means of knowing the defects and necessities of our consular system, are the men who press this measure. The names to which the gentleman has referred are exceptions. That our commercial and revenue interests and the reputation of the nation have suffered sadly from the utter ignorance of our consuls of the languages, laws, history, and policy of the Governments to which they have been sent and of their own proper duties, is notorious. I do not say this to their disparagement. They may be intelligent in all other matters but not in this. It is their misfortune that they have been thrown from their proper sphere by the blind policy of parties. I call attention to the following communication from a very intelligent gentleman, formerly a member of this House, who has lately returned from his consulate at Matanzas.

WASHINGTON, April 18, 1864.

Sir: While my connection with a consulate has not been long enough to lend much value to my suggestions it was so recent that the recollections of my experience are vivid, and may help to a correct appreciation of the difficulties surrounding that branch of executive service; and I beg to offer my observation to the Department.

I have recently read the debates in the Senate on the pending bill, a provision of which authorizes the appointment of consular pupils; and if anything can demonstrate the necessity of the measure it is the seeming failure of some of the ablest of that body to appreciate the subject.

To say that there are incurable evils inevitable to our system of government, and to accept the defects in our foreign service as one of them, is a weak escape from responsibility. Our commercial representation may be below that of any other respectable Government. Its defects are so obvious and the remedies so apparently possible that to say the service cannot be vastly improved is an assertion not to be accepted without persistent effort and experiment.

The consul is appointed with little reference to his actual fitness. He is the American average of ability and intelligence; has had no commercial or legal education; without any examination as to qualifications, he often goes out without the advantage of personal instructions under the Consular Bureau, and does not readily master the valuable Consular Manual furnished him. As but one other nation speaks his language, he doubtless goes among a people with whom he can hold no possible communication. He knows nothing of their customs, mode of thought, or channels of information; knows nothing of their commercial ordinances and policy, or of the treaties of his own or their Government; cannot communicate with their authorities so as to procure a local recognition, pending the arrival of his exequatur. An instance occurred in Cuba where an American consul remained four months before he established relations with the Government.

The newly arrived American consul stands in the presence of a foreign people deaf and dumb, and is obliged to acquire many of the rudiments of human intercourse anew. With no familiarity with the common routine of his office or of commercial affairs, he receives his post from a predecessor who is in too much of a hurry or too churlish to instruct him, and many men in middle life are incapable of ever being instructed. His compensation usually precludes the possibility of employing a clerk. He is for the first time to see a ship's register, and the shipping articles are a new and occult revelation. At first the difference between an invoice and a ship's manifest is not apparent, and an extended protest is an extensive arrangement. He does not know the use of the numerous blanks with which his office is filled, and never finds them all out. The mode of keeping the consular accounts he does not apprehend, and not one in fifty of the newly appointed consuls can by possibility make up the necessary quarterly reports or furnish the commercial statistics that swell the annual volume of our Commercial Relations; and whoever examines those will be astonished at the many blanks which the incompetency of American consuls at important ports makes in those fragmentary and imperfect works. The captain of the port sends him a clearance for his vessel, yet what it is, or from whence, or for what purpose, he has no conception; and when in his pursuit of knowledge under difficulties he finds one who can make its contents known he then has to be informed what he is to do to it, to the utter astonishment of the foreign officers who wonder most at his being sent among them at all.

Perplexing controversies constantly arise between seamen and their captains. The new consul knows nothing of either class, or in what way the disputes are or should be dealt with, and yet he must decide promptly. He does not know in what cases he may ask the aid of the local police, nor to whom or how he may apply.

Grave questions of commercial law are often met, arising from loss of cargo, wrecks, general average, &c., the authentication of records, taking proofs, &c., with a constant demand for drafting papers, for which he has no forms. So of the disposition of the remains and property of deceased Americans. So, too, he is ignorant of the delicate texture of our relations with the country where he resides, of subsisting treaties, of their construction, and whether questions arising under them were ever before settled, and how. Often the official correspondence of the State Department with his predecessor on questions that perplex him remain a sealed book to him; and he is ignorant of the ordinary precedents of the office he holds and the cases and traditions of his own consulate. A consular pupil of two years would be equal to most of these questions, or would have access to means of information which he would understand. An American consul was once imprisoned for one hundred days in Matanzas for attempting to exercise a consular right under a treaty with Spain. Though honest he was mistaken, and was left without redress.

If the new consul succeeds to one of the most important posts which employs subordinates, he necessarily and inevitably falls into their hands and under their control. He takes their impressions, adopts their views, sees what they desire him to see, and hears only their rendering of the things he would hear. A man thus commencing forever remains the ward of his subordinates; and these may have been the employees of a predecessor removed for cause, and who sustain no relation of responsibility to the Government, as a consular pupil would.

In my own experience I received the constant and gratuitous assistance of one of the most accomplished of our consular officers in the Spanish dominions, and thus, I trust, the public service was not compromised in my person; and I was saved from the inevitable mistresses and personal mortifications that would otherwise have attended me, and received thanks for services that were really due to another.

The constant education of twenty-five competent and emulous young Americans as consular pupils, not removable except for cause, and who should not succeed to consulates till after two years' tuition, and who should be required to master commercial law, modern languages, or some of them, become familiar with our commercial treaties, &c., would soon supply a corps of competent consuls, and no Administration could leave them unemployed.

Many would doubtless resign to seek places in foreign commercial houses. Their return to other pursuits would be avenues through which a rare fund of knowledge would find its way into public service in Congress and foreign missions.

I trust the motives with which this is offered to the head of the State Department may excuse its intrusion upon him.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

A. G. RIDDLE, late Consul.

Hon. Wm. H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

It may be said that these places of higher trusts and emoluments will continue to be bestowed as rewards for political services. But give us a body of men eminently fitted for the work, and it will be found that there are interests of trade and of State stronger than the claims of party which will wrest these appointments from the category of party spoils.

The seventh section of the act of 1856, repealed in 1857, which it is now proposed to repeal, is a first movement in the proper direction. The importance of having well-informed Americans in the inferior grades of the consular service may well be illustrated by a reference to the illicit trade between Canada and the United States. That smuggling, to the extent of millions of dollars annually, is being carried on in silks and velvets and other goods from France and Switzerland, and teas from China, under the protection if not under the direction of our alien commercial agents in the British provinces is well understood by high officials who have the best means of information; and this is but an illustration, on a small scale, of the frauds practiced upon our revenues through the dishonesty of foreign clerks and the professional incompetency of consuls in other parts of the world. How long are we to endure such things for the mere gratification of what, by an expressive vulgarity, has been styled buncombe?

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that by the provisions of that general act it was intended to devise, improve, and permanently establish a diplomatic and consular system for the United States. It was proposed as a part of that system that the President should be authorized to employ these persons who are there called consular pupils. They are in fact consular clerks, and the term "pupil" may perhaps mislead some gentlemen as to the purport of the law. It is simply designed to establish a class of men not liable to constant removal, but who should be allowed to become acquainted with the language, the laws, and manners and customs of the country to which they may be sent.

Now, what is the mischief in the existing law which it is here proposed to remedy, and which it is desired to remedy by the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. PATTERSON?]. No sooner does a consul become familiar with the duties of his office and the mode and manner of transacting business with which he is charged than, by a change of Administration, he is liable to removal and a new man sent out, while in the mean time our commercial affairs require an efficient man.

There is not an American ship going into a foreign port that the captain or seamen do not demand the services of our consul to present their case to the foreign authorities and have justice done to them. By the present system we cannot secure the services of competent and efficient officers as consuls, and this is the evil that we seek to remedy. Will this proposition as it comes from the Senate do it? It simply authorizes the President to appoint these consular pupils.

But when will they be removed? Will they not be removed just as consuls are removed? When they get to be efficient will they not be taken away under a change of Administration, and leave the same embarrassment to exist under which we are now laboring? In the opinion of the committee there is no guard thrown around this section to prevent the recurrence of the same mischief which we all desire to remedy. Under these circumstances the committee cannot consent to the establishment of this corps of consular clerks, thereby adding this burden to the Treasury, though it is not very large, unless the section be accompanied by a proviso which should make the system one which would secure a permanent benefit to the commercial and other interests of the country. Now, if we had a security that we could secure the right kind of men for this purpose, and could secure them as clerks to consuls abroad when they reach their destination, I should feel strongly inclined to support the gentleman from New Hampshire.

With this statement of the question, if there is no other gentleman who desires to speak, I propose to take the action of the House upon it.

Mr. MORRILL. After the very attractive speech of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. PATTERSON,] I am not disposed to have the question taken until the House can look at the matter in its practical operation. Now, if these pupils shall be appointed, there is no guarantee whatever upon their part that they are to serve the country, nor is there any obligation upon the country that they shall be continued in the service. The evil sought to be remedied cannot be reached in that way. The real evil is in the appointing power. There are a plenty of young men in the country who are well qualified for these positions; young men, sons of merchants, who are not only educated with some reference to the duties they are to perform in future life, but are educated in the languages of those countries with which their fathers are engaged in commerce. Among our citizens you will find a sufficient supply of these men to fill all these appointments if the Executive would but do his duty. I hope that we will hold the Executive responsible for these appointments, and not create by law a class of popinjays who will receive the contempt of the country when they return home.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence. The amendment was non-concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The next amendment reserved for consideration will be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President may, in his discretion, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the kingdom of Belgium, who shall receive no higher compensation than is now allowed to a minister resident.

The SPEAKER. To that amendment the gentleman from New York offered an amendment.

Mr. PRUYN. I did not offer the amendment, as the Speaker supposes. It was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL.]

Mr. BROOMALL. I will father the amendment, and withdraw it.

Mr. KASSON. I move to amend by inserting after the word "that" the following:

If the President, in his discretion, shall nominate an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the kingdom of Belgium, the sum appropriated to the minister resident is hereby transferred to such envoy, and the additional sum of $2,500 is hereby appropriated in conformity to the first section of the diplomatic and consular act, approved August 18, 1856.

I will explain the effect of the amendment. The first section of the diplomatic and consular act to which I made reference a little while ago provides the rate of compensation for ministers, envoys, &c., abroad. In schedule A, after naming certain countries in which the salary shall be $17,500, and others in which the salary shall be $12,000, it is provided that in all other cases the salary shall be $10,000. The President has the right to designate the grade, and the object is that if he makes an appointment there shall be the money appropriated to meet it. If he does not make the appointment nobody will draw the money.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not understand that any vote of yesterday sanctioned the idea of raising this grade, or of appropriating anything beyond the $7,500. I stated that if a minister of that grade was to be appointed he ought to have a full salary, but I am not going to invite the President to raise the grade of a minister and make an appointment unless he chooses to do so himself. And this is nothing more nor less than an invitation to the Executive to do what he ought to do without any prompting from us. If it is necessary let him make the appointment and ask for an appropriation to pay the salary, and we will vote it. But for us, for reasons which I cannot understand, to come here and ask the President to do a thing which he has shown no inclination to do, and then say that if he will do it we will pay the man he appoints, is not according to my taste. I hope the whole thing will be voted down.

Mr. KASSON. We have a communication from the President, through the Secretary of State, stating that it is the wish of that Department to raise the grade of this mission, and it cannot be done, of course, unless there is an appropriation made.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman is mistaken. The Secretary says that he does not want an appropriation.

Mr. KASSON. The House voted down that yesterday. The law of 1856 expressly fixes the salary at $10,000 when the appointment is made. We have here a communication from the Secretary of State saying that he desires the appointment to be made. Now, all it remains for Congress to do, if it does not see proper to contravene the action of the Executive Department, is to appropriate the additional $2,500 called for by the law of 1856. If the appointment is not made, of course the appropriation will not be drawn.

Mr. STEVENS. May I ask the gentleman if I have misunderstood the communication of the Secretary of State? I understand him to say expressly that he asks no appropriation.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman stated yesterday that he did not wish the grade of this mission to be raised without an appropriation equal to the requirements of the increased grade. Other gentlemen took the same ground, and accordingly the House cast the vote yesterday which we all remember.

All I ask, therefore, is that we conform our action to the existing law. Inasmuch as the Executive Department proposes to raise the grade of this mission, it becomes necessary for us to make an appropriation in accordance with the request made of $2,500 as proposed.

Mr. SPALDING. I think it sufficient for us to vote appropriations for these foreign ministers whenever the President himself shall designate the grade. I object, as does the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to traveling in advance of the movements of the President upon these subjects.

I do not understand that the Secretary of State asks for an advance of grade in this case with an increase of salary, but simply that the present incumbent shall be advanced, to retain the same salary which he now enjoys. Now, to this many members object; for they say that the present incumbent may not be very long in that office, and then a man may be placed there who will require this increase. I say, in view of this reasoning, that it is better for us, in my apprehension, to vote down this provision and wait until the President shall advance the grade of this mission and ask us to make the appropriation.

Mr. KASSON. I have only to say that that request has been already made in the usual manner through the Secretary of State in an official communication coming here through the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the House decided yesterday that the grade should be raised with an increase of pay. I do not think that in a matter of this kind we ought to contravene the action of the Executive Department. I hope we shall not do it in this case without better reasons than have been stated. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; the question being first upon Mr. KASSON's amendment.

Mr. KASSON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KASSON and THOMAS were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 40, nays 53.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on agreeing to the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to strike out what remains of the amendment of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The House is now acting under the previous question, but that would be the effect of non-concurring in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I hope we shall vote down the amendment of the Senate.

The question was taken, and the amendment of the Senate, as amended, was disagreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I now move that a committee of conference be asked on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to this bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the consideration, during the morning hour, of House bill No. 276, to secure to persons in the military or naval service of the United States homesteads upon confiscated or forfeited estates in insurrectionary districts.

PREVENTION OF SMUGGLING.

Mr. ELIOT asked and obtained unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table an act (S. No. 266) to prevent smuggling; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish the gentleman from Massachusetts would ask to have the bill printed.

Mr. ELIOT. I have no objection. The bill was ordered to be printed.

NAVAJO INDIAN CAPTIVES.

Mr. WINDOM asked and obtained unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table an act (S. No. 226) to aid in the settlement, subsistence, and support of the Navajo Indian captives upon a reservation in the Territory of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

COMMISSIONER OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. YEAMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced an act relating to the office of Commissioner of Public Buildings; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

CONFISCATED ESTATES.

The House then proceeded, as the business next in order, to the consideration of House bill

No. 276, to secure to persons in the military or naval service of the United States homesteads upon confiscated or forfeited estates in insurrectionary districts, the question being on engrossment and third reading.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. JULIAN. I am about to move the previous question on the passage of the bill. I am willing, however, to yield the floor to any gentleman who may desire to debate it. I understood there were several gentlemen who did intend to speak upon it.

Mr. MALLORY. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana whether the operation of this bill is intended to apply to estates that may be confiscated in any of the States of the Union?

Mr. JULIAN. It only relates to confiscated lands in the insurrectionary districts.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I had desired to say something upon this question, but I did not anticipate that the question would come before the House this morning. If the gentleman from Indiana desires to have the question taken to-day, I shall be compelled to enter my objections against the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that he has already spoken one hour upon this bill in one of the evening sessions.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I have not, sir.

The SPEAKER. The remarks were upon other subjects, but they were delivered during the debate on this bill. That is the recollection of the Chair.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I have spoken but once during an evening session, and that was on the bill reported by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] to secure a republican form of government to the rebellious States. I think the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands [Mr. JULIAN] will recollect that I have had nothing to say whatever on this subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair may be in error. Mr. JULIAN. That is true. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] has not spoken on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is correct.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that if he desires to take the question to-day I will submit what few remarks I have to make in opposition to the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, since the reading of the bill it has struck me that it contains some extraordinary provisions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is correct in his statement; he has not addressed the House on the pending proposition.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. If the gentleman from Indiana desires to go on with the bill now I presume that I must make my remarks at this time.

Mr. KING. I should like to have time to look into the provisions of this bill before the House is called upon to act on it. It affects my State. There are a number of cases pending in the district court of the United States in Missouri in which the confiscation act is enforced. It will have a direct effect on real estate there, so far as it is embraced by the proceedings under that act.

Mr. JULIAN. I yield the floor to the gentleman from New York. I understand the gentleman desires to debate the question to-day.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Does the gentleman desire to take the question to-day?

Mr. JULIAN. I do.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Then I will be compelled to go on with what I have to say in reference to this question now.

Mr. PENDLETON. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield unconditionally to the gentleman from New York?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is compelled to recognize the gentleman from Indiana as chairman of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PENDLETON. Is it an unconditional surrender of the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can make it so by objecting.

Mr. PENDLETON. Then I insist that the gentleman from Indiana shall yield the floor unconditionally.

Mr. JULIAN. I do not object, as I have the right to close the debate under the rule.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think that this bill has not attracted that attention of the House which its importance demands. I think that members are not aware of the gravity and importance of the principles involved in this measure. By its title it is "A bill to secure to persons in the military or naval service of the United States homesteads on confiscated or forfeited estates in insurrectionary districts." It is reported from the Committee on Public Lands, and every gentleman who has spoken on the subject at all has spoken in favor of it. I believe, sir, I am the first member who has expressed an opinion against it.

Mr. Speaker, I differ entirely with my colleagues on the Committee on Public Lands in reference to the propriety of its passage. It purports to be a bill for a patriotic and humane purpose. In my judgment it is neither patriotic nor humane. I am as desirous of going as far as any member upon this floor in giving full and ample compensation to all persons in the military and naval service of the United States. I believe if there be any class of people entitled to the liberality of the Government, it is that class who are now in good faith, and from honest, patriotic motives, defending, as they honestly think, the flag, the glory, and the integrity of the country. Gentlemen on the other side of the House will do us the justice to say that we have on every occasion during this Congress manifested our desire to give to those persons increased compensation and to afford their interests every care and protection. Sir, we voted here early in the session to pay them in gold or its equivalent. I am of the opinion that, including the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. JULIAN,] who reported this bill, every man on that side of the House voted against that proposition. We have frequently proposed to increase their pay, and until within a few days, every man on that side of the House has voted against it. Since the commencement of this session, and indeed of the war, we have manifested a liberal disposition toward the persons in the military and naval service of the United States.

Now comes a proposition from the Committee on Public Lands to give them homesteads, not upon the public domain—no, that is reserved for railroad purposes and to facilitate speculations—but upon lands to be acquired by confiscation. While we have thousands of millions of public lands, the title of which is indisputably in possession of the Government, and which we are parting with by the hundreds of thousands at a sitting, we refuse to give to the sailors and soldiers of those lands, but turn them over to the tender mercies of the rebels, and tell them they shall have those lands after they have conquered them, provided they remain there and hold them at the point of the bayonet afterwards.

I say this is a most extraordinary exhibition of benevolence and patriotism. You give away to speculators what you own, but to those who fight the battles of the country you give what you do not own and to which you never can acquire, under the Constitution of the United States, a title beyond the lifetime of the present holder. You give them homesteads from the confiscated estates. I think it is quite well settled by the non-action of the Senate upon our resolution passed here after a struggle in the early part of the session, that we cannot, as the President told you last July, acquire a title to these confiscated estates except after due process of law and after a compliance with all the measures required by the Constitution, and then only during the lifetime of the owner of the estate.

At best, therefore, you propose to give to the soldiers and sailors a life estate under pretense that you are giving them homesteads. You announce to the world and to these poor men that you are about to do them justice, that the Congress of the United States is about to confer upon them a great boon and benefit when you know it is a deception and a falsehood. You are doing no such thing. Another objection is that by the bill you hold out inducements to the soldier which invites the worst passions of his nature. You urge him by this species of bribery to the physical occupancy and ownership of lands, and thus induce him to perpetrate acts outside of the rules of war and regardless of the Constitution, upon the principle of Palenham at New Orleans when he gave the watchword of "booty and beauty," following that example, you are arousing the darkest passions in order to accomplish a personal, a selfish, an avaricious, and a partisan object.

But, sir, as I have suspected from the origin of this bill, there is a hidden motive in it, not expressed by its title, beyond what would appear from the ordinary and cursory reading of it. I have had but little time to examine it. Although a member of the committee who reported it, I was not present at its passage nor at the time of its introduction by the committee. And, indeed, I take this occasion to say, if there is any subject of a public character I am ignorant upon, it is everything pertaining to our public lands; and I suppose it was because I was thus ignorant that I had the honor to be placed on that committee. Now, sir, I suspected—and I say it with all due respect, for I certainly have a respect for the chairman of our committee—I suspected, from the extraordinary zeal and interest which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] manifested in this bill, that there was something which did not appear upon the surface. I suspected there was an African somewhere, and after some search I have found him. Benton said of Douglas's Kansas and Nebraska bill, that "it carried a stump speech in its belly;" so this carries a little nigger in its belly. It is there, and I think I can make it apparent to this House.

In section four the bill provides that "all persons who are laborers"—not soldiers, not sailors, not the men who are bravely hazarding life and liberty with muskets in their hands in defense of their country—but laborers are to enjoy these homes. That fixes a class not designated in the title. It includes laborers, who we all know are persons employed in the remotest degree by the military, and allows them to derive the same benefits and the same advantages from the enjoyment of these homesteads or confiscated estates that the soldier and the sailor are to have.

Then, again, in the eighth section it is provided that "no distinction shall be made on account of color or race." There is the nigger, sir. The laborer is to have these lands, and of course it is the freedmen, for there are no other laborers but black men. The gentleman from Indiana intends to provide for his black friends under the pretext of doing a patriotic and humane act in behalf of our soldiers and sailors, who are risking everything in defense of their country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will go as far as any man in works of humanity, benevolence, and kindness, and that is why I should like to rescue this poor, unfortunate race from the mistaken philanthropy and benevolence of those who are using its misfortunes for partisan objects and purposes. I do believe—and in saying this I wish it to be understood that I speak for no one but myself—that the direst curse and misfortune that has fallen upon that race has been the incorporation of their interests into the politics of the country, whereby they have been made a football for the ambition of white men to the destruction of their moral and physical well-being.

Sir, had I the power I would rescue this unfortunate race, not from their masters at the South, but from the partisan designs and mistaken philanthropy of the North. They were taken from a state of barbarism, and I might almost say of cannibalism, and by slavery so much derided have been made in the main an honest, happy, intelligent, producing class, whose wants, from the interests and the necessities of the case, have been well supplied.

This bill in effect provides that after white men with arms in their hands have possessed themselves of these lands, they are to be given to the slaves, who are to till them, not for their own benefit, but, according to the example of the last two years, during which freedmen have been worked as slaves never were, for the benefit of northern speculators and philanthropists. The fat lands of the South are to be worked by the black man, not for his own advantage, but for the advantage of those who have "official privilege" to enjoy the fruits of his labor. This is the kindness, the humanity, the benevolence that is to be exhibited toward this poor, unfortunate race!

But, Mr. Speaker, I have an objection yet more grave to this bill, and that is that it is based upon the assumption that the Union shall never be restored. Like nearly every proposition of a political character which has been submitted by the majority to Congress at this session, it is based upon an assumption that the Union ought not to be, will not be, and shall not be, restored; that the southern people shall never again live under a Government with us centered in Washington city. This is palpable. If this Union is to be restored under the Constitution of the United States, every one of the States in which these confiscated lands lie will come back into that Union with all its territorial integrity and with all the rights it has heretofore maintained. If we are to have an American Union again, we must have a Union in which each State stands in the same position, no one State possessing any more right and interest in the administration of the Government than the other, each reserving to itself the full exercise of all rights where not originally delegated to the Federal Government. That reservation implies exclusive control and jurisdiction over all domestic questions, and that of course includes not only slavery, but it includes the rights of property in lands held by private owners. And yet, by the passage of this act, and by your confiscation measure, you forcibly and violently seize those lands and part with them to individuals. Of course, you will have to give them up again or pay for them, or else you cannot restore the Union. You have got to do one of two things: either you must restore private property or, under the Constitution, give "just compensation for it." If not, you disregard the Constitution and the existence of the Federal Union. That is the alternative. You do not propose to give the property of the States, but the property of the people in rebellion, as a punishment for treason. Some of the southern people are as good and true Union men as any who live at the North. You propose indiscriminately and irrespectively, whether there be treason or attainer of treason, or not, to lay your hands violently upon this private property and to give it away. When you assume that you have the right to give it away, you assume that the Union is forever gone and that you hold these lands by conquest.

Mr. Speaker, I would take no step tending to the creation of one obstacle, however slight, in the way of a restoration of the Union. I have never done so—I never shall do so. I have never uttered one word, nor will I, so help me God, tending to prevent reunion if it is possible. I am willing to make any sacrifice to aid in bringing back the American people, North and South, to a full realization of the terrible destruction which they are bringing on their own unfortunate heads. I am one of those who yet hope almost in fear against hope for restoration; and by no vote of mine in this House shall I, in any way, directly or indirectly, give countenance to the assumption conveyed in this bill. In no way can I give countenance to this disunion heresy by, in advance of the settlement of the question, disposing of the lands and of the rights and interests of independent communities who, in my judgment, have a right to return to the Union, and whom, under our Constitution, we have no right to exclude. On the very slight examination which I have made of the bill, these defects appeared so palpable that I have, in this manner, endeavored to state them to the House. I repeat in conclusion that in my judgment the bill is objectionable, because it proposes to give what we have not got to give, and to which we can have no valid title in fee under the Constitution; that under the pretext of benefiting the soldiers we are really doing by this bill nothing of the kind.

Again, it says in substance that "we will kill or seize the masters, and give their estates to their slaves." That, in my opinion, is a very grave objection. Another objection is that if it be right to give homesteads to soldiers and sailors they should be given from the public domain.

Again, it is the black laborer and not the white soldier that excites the philanthropic concern of its framers.

Finally, my objection to it is that it is based upon the assumption that the Union cannot and shall not be restored; that that is a thing of the past; that the privileges and the obligations of the Constitution have been withdrawn from those States. Whether we design it or not we are making a decision to the effect that the penalty of rebellion is the subversion of all their rights and liberties as States; the right of governing themselves; the right of ownership to their lands, and their reduction to a condition below that of a dependent people in an ordinary Territory. We are deciding by this bill that the people of the South have committed a crime which entitles us, not only to take away any government they may now have, but to substitute in lieu of it just such a government as we may in our judgment think proper to establish. For these and other reasons stated, Mr. Speaker, thus briefly and imperfectly expressed, I shall vote against the bill under consideration.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I think it is true, as stated by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] that this bill has not received as much attention as its importance deserves. But I think it is not true, as the gentleman further stated, that the principles involved in it have not been considered as fully and deliberately as they ought to be considered before action is taken. In my view, the only principles involved in the bill now before the House have been definitely settled by the action of this body after the fullest consideration, and after the most mature deliberation.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, is the legitimate result, the natural consequence of two measures of very great importance which have passed into laws by the action of Congress, after an extended discussion of each. I mean the act confiscating the property of rebels and the act granting free homesteads on the public domain to all who will settle upon and cultivate them.

This bill is the legitimate consequence of the principles embodied in those measures. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] assumed in the remarks he has made that the only way in which we are to acquire the lands on which this bill operates is under the confiscation act. But if he had read the bill carefully he would have seen that these lands are to be acquired, and are constantly being acquired, under the act for the collection of direct taxes in insurrectionary districts, and under the act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, as well as under the confiscation act.

If these acts are enforced, as we are already enforcing them, we shall acquire a large amount of landed property, the title to which will be in this Government; and this bill simply proposes that the lands thus acquired shall be treated as a part of the public domain to be disposed of in accordance with the wise policy which Congress has already determined to apply to the disposition of our public lands by allotting them as homesteads to those who are willing to cultivate them, with the exception that in the disposition of the lands acquired under the acts which I have named preference is to be given to those patriotic men who have performed military and naval service for the country in this terrible struggle for national existence.

The first objection which the gentleman from New York makes to the bill is that it gives our soldiers and sailors the right to occupy the land thus acquired as homesteads. He is not willing to extend to them this privilege. Yet he claims, as all the members on that side of the House claim, to be the especial friend of our soldiers in the field. He says that the members on that side have been willing and anxious to pay the soldiers in gold, and that they have also been desirous of increasing their pay.

Am I right in supposing that the motive which prompted the attempt on that side of the House to have our soldiers paid in gold was, that such a measure might be the means of embarrassing the Government in carrying on the war? They understand that another currency and another standard of value have been established and are now in use in this country. If it would not be impossible to carry out the measure of paying our armies in gold, it would certainly entail great financial embarrassment, and perhaps financial ruin upon the Government to compel it to pay in gold the vast sums of money which we appropriate for the payment of our officers and soldiers. Is that the motive which animates the gentleman from New York? Is that the motive which animates the members on the other side of the House? Are these the objects which they seek to accomplish in pressing the proposition as they have done, that our armies shall be paid in gold? What other motive, what other object, can they possibly have? But, sir, they are not only willing to pay the soldiers in gold, but they are willing to very largely increase their pay. The proposition which comes from that side is to increase it far more than was provided for in the bill which was reported on this side of the House and has become a law.

The sincerity of the gentleman from New York and his political associates is shown in the fact that while they have been proposing to pay the soldiers in gold and to increase their pay so largely, they have voted against the taxation necessary to put the Government in possession of the money to pay them at all. If the gentleman was in his seat and voted on the tax bill his vote will, undoubtedly, be found recorded in the negative. By what process of reasoning can such inconsistencies be reconciled? Gentlemen on the other side rise in their places and with many professions of friendship for and support of our soldiers strenuously advocate an increase of their wages, but when it is proposed to lay the taxation necessary to pay even the wages they are now receiving, and which is absolutely necessary to the continued existence of the Government and sustain it in its efforts to crush this rebellion, many of these same gentlemen are found voting against it. And now when we come in with a measure of simple justice to our soldiers fully within the power of the Government to grant, when they know that large amounts of lands in the States in rebellion are being acquired under the confiscation act, the act for the collection of taxes in insurrectionary districts and under the internal revenue law, and it is proposed on this side of the House as an act of justice to give homesteads upon them to the soldiers who have periled their lives in defending the country, who have saved the Government, and by whose valor these lands have been acquired, and will be held and occupied, we find the gentleman from New York and his associates upon that side of the House opposing it. There is no doubt that they will vote against this bill, notwithstanding all their professions of regard and friendship for our soldiers. And yet, sir, it is a practical measure of the highest justice, which may be extended to them without in any degree weakening or impairing the resources of the country.

But the gentleman states that it is impossible for us to acquire title to lands under the operation of the confiscation act, because that act is unconstitutional, and cannot be enforced. It is too late to discuss that question. Congress has settled, so far as its deliberations are concerned, the right to confiscate the lands of rebels. Under the amnesty proclamation this confiscation operates only upon the property of those who persist in their treason, and refuse to lay down their arms. Does the gentleman from New York feel any tenderness for that class of rebels? Does he desire to preserve and restore the property of those who refuse to desist from imbruing their hands in the blood of our people? All who are engaged in war against the Government can avert the confiscation of their lands, under the amnesty proclamation of the President, by laying down their arms and availing themselves of its provisions. It is only those who persist in treason that this act will injure and punish. This House has settled the principle of confiscation, and it is too late for the gentleman from New York, or any other gentleman, to urge its unconstitutionality, or that it should not be enforced. The loyal people of this country are satisfied of its constitutionality, and demand that it shall be fully enforced.

But the gentleman sees another objection, and it seems to be the paramount objection in his mind to this bill, and that is that it allows the blacks, or, as he denominates them, "the niggers," to participate in its benefits. To those blacks who have been enrolled in our armies, to those who have stood with the soldiers of our own color in the deadly storm of battle, to those who have periled their lives for the salvation of the country, the gentleman insists upon denying those rights which we grant to the other soldiers of the Union armies.

What is the motive for this continued and bitter hostility toward the blacks? Is the fear which animates the gentleman from New York, and prompts him to oppose this bill the same as that which we have heard so often expressed upon that side of the House, that this is a step toward negro equality, toward raising the negroes up to a level with, or making them superior to, the white race in this country?

Prompted by the worst and meanest passions that corrode the human heart, avarice and the desire to domineer and tyrannize over fellow-men, the negro was brought by fraud and force and planted in this country. We have oppressed them here for upwards of two hundred years; they have been ground down under the heel of oppression; they have been held in bondage, in abject slavery; have been treated as brutes, bought and sold and worked like cattle in our markets and fields; all means of instruction and mental culture have been denied them; they have had absolutely none of the means of advancement and elevation extended to them which have been found necessary to civilize and elevate the white races. And yet gentlemen rise in their places here pretending to speak for the white race which has had all the means of progress and advancement which have been denied to the black, and insist that no measure of justice, that no act whatever which shows any favor to that downtrodden race shall be extended to them, because there is danger that they may become equal or superior to the white race. It is an argument which no white man who possesses any sense of self-respect should or could use.

But, sir, I do not desire to detain the House long, and I hurry rapidly over these points. The gentleman from New York further said that the strongest objection in his mind to the passage of this law was that it would prevent forever the restoration of the Union. I deny it. I say it is but a step in a series of measures adopted by Congress calculated to restore the Union in its highest and best sense, by eliminating from it all that is evil and preserving all that is good; by destroying what is in antagonism to the principles upon which our institutions and upon which the Government and the Union are founded; by making the whole country free; by setting at liberty the oppressed and despised black race, and giving them some sort of a chance in this country.

The delusive scheme of attempting to export and colonize four million people has proved, as was to be expected, an ignominious failure. The blacks are here, and must remain here. The great majority of the loyal people of the country are already convinced, and the minority are fast adopting the same conclusion, that the only means by which we can restore the Union upon a foundation of lasting peace is to destroy slavery, and the only way to destroy it beyond the chance of resurrection is to recognize at least the simple natural right of the blacks to own property, and to enjoy the product of their own labor. If they have been endowed by their Creator with qualities of mind equal to those of the white race, if they were designed by the Almighty, who created the black as well as the white race, to occupy a position equal with the white race, why should we deny it to them; why should we not give them some right, some justice, some chance for improvement and elevation? The blacks came to us naked and ignorant; long years of oppression and slavery have stripped them of every natural and political right. Yet they come with loyal hearts and strong arms, and stand by the side of our own soldiers in bearing up our national flag in the deadly shock of battle. For this we give them freedom, for aiding us in preserving our institutions and preserving our Government. This, with other measures which we have adopted, proposes to give to those who survive the dreadful conflict of battle, and escape after the battle is over massacre at the hands of brutal fiends who are making war on the Government, the means to live by their own industry; and if they have any capacity for improvement it will also give them the opportunity for advancement. To this gentlemen on the other side of the House are opposed. I do not envy them the position which they occupy.

This bill in my judgment is an important one in its provisions and in its effects. As the distinguished and able chairman of the Committee on Public Lands who drew and reported it has shown, we shall acquire large amounts of lands throughout the seceded States, and they will be the lands of those who have gone the furthest in upholding this rebellion. By dividing these lands up and allowing the soldiers who have served in the Union armies to occupy them, we shall introduce into the rebel slave States what we who live in free States believe to be a higher and better civilization. Our own population will be commingled with such of the people of the southern States as renew their allegiance to the national Government. They will carry there our school-houses, our churches, our agricultural, mechanical, and manufacturing enterprise, and harmony of feeling and community of thought and sentiment and interest will be the result of it. Those men who persist in their treason to the end will justly have forfeited the right to their property as they have justly forfeited their lives. They have set the example of a more groundless, red-handed, accursed rebellion than history records. I trust that we shall set the example of so punishing it that history will never record that it has been repeated.

I believe there is a settled determination on the part of this House as there is a settled determination in the country, that some punishment shall overtake those traitors who persist in their crime and in their attempt to overthrow this Government. Such punishment is necessary for the establishment of a permanent peace; lenity toward them is cruelty to our own loyal and patriotic people. The argument of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] is founded upon the idea that treason is no crime; that whatever is taken from the rebels is to be restored to them. Sir, any man who believes this does not understand the character or temper of the American people. While they have been patient, self-sacrificing, and enduring in their efforts to put down this rebellion they will be equally steadfast and determined in their demand that all these measures which Congress and the Government have adopted for the punishment of treason and the establishment of peace upon a firm and lasting basis shall be executed with a stern and unfaltering purpose.

Mr. JULIAN obtained the floor.

DISCHARGE OF UNEMPLOYED GENERALS.

The morning hour having expired, the House resumed, as a special order, the consideration of joint resolution of the House No. 49, to drop from the rolls of the Army unemployed general officers.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not propose to speak at any length in closing the debate upon this resolution. When it was last before the House my colleague [Mr. ASHLEY] had the floor. He is not now present, and unless some other gentleman desires to be heard I propose to move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. There are several amendments pending.

Mr. SCHENCK. I was not aware of that, but I am reminded by that statement to ask leave to modify the resolution before any vote is taken upon it by striking out "April" and inserting "July" in the fifth line.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must do that before he moves the previous question.

Mr. KERNAN. Was there not a substitute offered for the joint resolution and also an amendment?

The SPEAKER. Yes. The gentleman from New York himself offered a substitute for the entire resolution, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COX] moved to add a proviso at the end of the original resolution. The vote will first be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio which was designed to perfect the original resolution, and then upon the substitute.

Mr. SCHENCK. Before demanding the previous question I desire, on behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs, to modify the joint resolution by substituting July for April. The time is already past when it was proposed that this resolution should take effect.

The joint resolution was modified accordingly.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. KERNAN. I would ask the gentleman if it is true, as I have been informed, that some of these officers have been dismissed since this measure has been reported.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think that one or two have been mustered out of the service, and that a number of others have been employed.

Mr. KERNAN. Does not the gentleman think that we had better postpone this matter and let the President take the proper action?

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir. I prefer that we should pass this resolution, in order that we may insure proper action.

Mr. KERNAN. You do not think the other would answer?

Mr. SCHENCK. I think this would be the better course.

Mr. KERNAN. The gentleman is aware that this measure has become old.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think the mere pendency of this joint resolution has done good, and that its passage will do more.

Mr. KERNAN. My substitute merely proposes—and that is the only difference between it and the original measure—that instead of the officers mentioned being dropped they shall appear before a board of officers to be appointed by the President, and that, if found incompetent, they shall be dropped; and if found competent they shall not be dropped. That is the only difference. I believe I copied the original resolution in all respects but that.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman will have a vote upon his substitute.

Mr. KERNAN. Before the vote is taken I will modify the substitute as the gentleman has modified the original resolution, by substituting July for April.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the committee which reported this joint resolution, I propose to make a few remarks, and to call the attention of the House to the circumstances under which the subject of it came up for consideration. At the time this Congress assembled it was generally understood throughout the country that a large number of officers of high grade in the Army to whom, on that account, perhaps, attention was more particularly directed, had, either on their own request or without application, been relieved from duty, and were then altogether unemployed or only employed in duties of minor character, more appropriate to officers of inferior rank. It was a subject of comment in the newspapers; it was the occasion of remark everywhere; and members of Congress, in speaking here, very naturally shared in that common disposition to comment on such a condition of things.

As a consequence, very soon after the session began a gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] called the attention of the House to this particular subject by the introduction of a resolution, which I shall send to the Clerk's desk to be read. The resolution was introduced on the 14th of December, 1863.

The Clerk read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
UNITED STATES, December 13, 1864.

On motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH,
Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform this House of the names, number, pay, and emoluments of major generals and brigadier generals of volunteers, and of the regular Army, and their staffs respectively, not on duty, and the length of time which has elapsed since each of them has been relieved from duty, and which of them, and how many, are not now on duty in consequence of wounds or disability incurred in the service.

Mr. SCHENCK. In answer to the call made by that resolution, which was passed without a dissenting voice, the Secretary of War sent to the House a letter which I hold in my hand. In this letter he embodies the facts in accordance with what had been the general understanding, namely: that twenty-five general officers—fourteen major generals, and eleven brigadier generals—were entirely unemployed, and that certain officers of their personal staffs were also unemployed with them—numbering twenty-five. At the same time another list was furnished of general officers on duty who were not actually commanding or serving with troops, amounting in number to thirty-nine, making an aggregate of eighty-nine officers reported as being either unemployed altogether or not employed in the command of troops. I must remark, however, that in looking over the list of general officers on duty, but not actually commanding troops, it must have been seen then, as it is yet, that a number of those were in the discharge of duties important enough not to be considered inappropriate to their respective grades. On the coming in of this reply from the Secretary of War, and immediately on its being laid on our tables in a printed form so as to convey the information which it contained to this House, a member from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] introduced another resolution, which I shall also send to the Clerk's desk to be read as part of the legislative history of this proceeding.

The Clerk read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
UNITED STATES, January 18, 1864.

Mr. HOLMAN submitted the following, which was adopted: Whereas this House has been officially informed that a large number of officers of the Army, including a number of major and brigadier generals, have been for a long period of time relieved from active service, while still receiving the full pay pertaining to their rank; and whereas such policy, while embarrassing to the officers so relieved, is manifestly unjust to the country, and interferes with just and proper promotions in the Army: Therefore

Resolved, That in the judgment of this House the policy of retaining in the pay of the Government officers who have been indefinitely relieved from active service, not physically disabled by wounds, and who have not been placed on the retired list, ought to be discontinued, and that the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire what legislation, if any, is necessary to effect a remedy in the premises, and reduce the number of general officers not employed in active service, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. KERNAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio be kind enough to permit the list of unemployed general officers to be read, so that it may be apparent to the House who are to be affected by this law?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly. Does the gentleman wish this list to be read now?

Mr. KERNAN. I do not desire to have it read now particularly.

Mr. SCHENCK. It will be seen, Mr. Speaker, as gentlemen have been so exceedingly anxious to find some personal aim or object influencing the Committee on Military Affairs in reporting this joint resolution—that the duty was imposed upon the committee to report on the subject; and it will be seen under what circumstances they did report.

It can hardly be supposed that when the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. PARSONS], on this side of the House, called attention to what was occupying the minds of the people of the country, and when an answer to a resolution of inquiry was returned by the Secretary of War, and when a reference of the whole subject was made on motion by a gentleman on the other side, with instructions to the Committee on Military Affairs to report by bill or otherwise as to what should be done in regard to discontinuing officers unemployed, it can hardly be supposed, with any sort of fairness, that this can be considered as partaking of the character of a conspiracy. I say, therefore, that gentlemen are very hard-run indeed, and are drawing inferences very ungenerous, either as against the gentleman from Illinois, the gentleman from Indiana, or any one of the committee who have undertaken to perform the business committed to them, when it is pretended that there must be something personal in the matter. So far from this being the case, I stand here to-day for and in behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs, and aver that I do not believe a single member of that committee made it a question to be considered how this joint resolution might or might not affect any particular general officer.

The committee finding that the evil existed, and being called on to report some resolution by which a remedy might be applied to that evil, after fully considering the whole matter reported the joint resolution now before the House. That joint resolution proposes nothing illiberal, nothing strange. It simply provides that, as these facts exist, if there be found, as the resolution is now modified, on the 1st of July next general officers unemployed, or not employed in some way suitable to their rank, and have been continuously unemployed or not fully employed during three months, one quarter of a year, preceding that day, then they shall be dropped from the rolls of the Army and not be any longer an expense to the Government. It saves those who may be unemployed by reason of sickness or wounds; such officers are properly exempted from the effects of this joint resolution. There is a saving also to the officers of the regular Army of the right to fall back to their position in the regular Army when their appointments as general officers in the volunteers are taken away from them.

There is nothing, I say, illiberal in this. It will only have the effect to induce the President to come to some determination in reference to unemployed or not fully employed general officers. He has once appointed them, thinking they were qualified to discharge the duties to which they were assigned, and he will be constrained to determine whether, under all the circumstances, he will continue them in office or not. It is rather addressed to the President than to any one else. We, in effect, propose to make this declaration to the Executive: "Here are these gentlemen; you have already thought proper to appoint them; you have left them for reasons which seemed good to you or to the War Department unemployed, or unfitly employed. In the present condition of the Treasury of the country, and in this time of war, we cannot agree that officers shall draw pay without rendering equivalent service, and therefore unless they are on due notice fitly employed we will not pay them. Either you must have these general officers go to their proper duty, or they will be dropped from the rolls."

The gentleman from New York [Mr. KERNAN] inquired in regard to the present occupation of the officers on the list sent to me. As to their present status I cannot answer as to all. But in looking over the list now I see that there are several on it as to whom changes have been made. Influenced possibly in some cases by the fact that such a joint resolution was pending, or by other considerations, it has been thought proper by the President, or those who manage our military affairs, to order some of them to duty; and there are two or three who, I understand, have been mustered out of the service. The list has been considerably reduced. Still we ask the joint resolution to be passed to provide a remedy for an evil to some extent yet continuing, and justly complained of.

I desire further to say, that so far were the committee, and so far was I, from looking on this in any low or personal view, that until the principle and policy of the proposition we make to the House had been settled, I hardly believe it had been considered or anticipated who would be affected by the measure, and when my attention is directed to the list, I find that it ill becomes gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber to suppose that there is some party feeling in this matter. Three fourths of these officers, if not almost every one, whose names are here given by the Secretary of War, are known as staunch supporters of the Government, and among them I discover four or five of my own particular personal and esteemed friends. Among them, also, I find those who, in my judgment, should long since have been employed. I mention these things merely for the purpose of divesting this matter of that character which has been very unjustly sought to be given to it, and for the purpose of vindicating the committee as having simply obeyed the instruction of the House, to report some remedy for that which was admitted to be an existing evil, and clearly proved such by the very answer made by the Executive Department to our call for information.

It is true there are two officers who may in certain contingencies be affected by this proceeding who are of the regular Army, and I apprehend that had it not been that those two names happened to be upon the Secretary's list—however improper it may be to draw distinctions ordinarily between men and officers in this country—we should never have heard of any opposition to this most wholesome proposed enactment.

Mr. KERNAN. The gentleman will do me the justice to say that I made no allusion of that kind. I based my substitute and my reasons upon the distinct ground that I was opposed to legislating officers out of the Army by act of Congress. I was in favor nevertheless of having a proper tribunal before whom they should appear in order that those who proved unworthy should be put out.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am aware of the position of the gentleman, and I did not refer to him, but referred to some gentlemen upon this and that side of the House, who, because General McClellan and General Frémont might chance to fall within the operation of this rule, have intimated that it was aimed at them. In the debate which took place on this report when it was up for consideration before, my colleague [Mr. Cox] especially made that charge.

Now, sir, I will not stop to talk about either McClellan or Frémont. I have but to repeat that this joint resolution is for the purpose of general legislation, to cure a great evil by a general provision which shall apply to all cases which it may justly and equitably reach, according to the action of Congress and the subsequent action of the Executive, without reference to any particular persons.

But I must be permitted to say that there is no peculiar hardship in the case of either of the gentlemen referred to. It has been said that they belong to the regular Army, and therefore that they would be struck off from a profession which they had adopted for life, and be thrown out at what some may consider an advanced age, when it would be difficult for them to turn their attention and energies to new pursuits. Gentlemen must have forgotten that at the commencement of this war Generals Frémont and McClellan were both civilians, and had long before given up the profession of arms and were engaged in other vocations.

Then the fact of their happening to be in the regular Army instead of being in the volunteer corps amounts to no more than this: they were selected like others because of the emergencies of this war and the necessity of increasing the number of our officers. Being placed in that position they have no more right than others to expect that when the emergency ceases their services would be retained any longer than in the opinion of the Government they were needed, nor that they would not be dropped like any other officers. But for the supposed necessities of the war they, like so many others, would have been neither in the regular Army nor in the volunteers, but still in civil life.

I intend by these remarks no sort of disrespect to those officers. I have no disposition, nor, if I were competent, am I called on to criticise their claims or merits. But I do want to divest the minds of all here of an impression which seems to be made that they stand somehow upon a different footing from others. They have been employed in a military capacity because the emergency required an increased number of officers; and when the public occasion arises for dispensing with their further services, whatever there may be in the capacity or achievements of either of them, so far as their personal rights are concerned, there is no reason why they should not stand equal with others under the law and the action of the Executive thereon. Were I the President I would long ago have settled the cases of these two officers. He holds the cards in his own hands. Let him order them to report to Lieutenant General Grant or elsewhere for duty; let them be assigned to corps, divisions, or other commands as other officers have been, and then if they, or either of them, be unwilling to serve unless given the places which they might themselves select, it is they that make the issue. But this is for the Commander-in-Chief to consider, and is no part of the duty of Congress.

Congress says to the Executive, "Here are these numerous officers unemployed, or not altogether employed as they should be, on duty fitting to their respective grades and positions; and we desire that you put them to their work, or else we cannot afford longer and through months and years of idleness to pay them for services not rendered." That is one of the simplest economical propositions in the world.

Mr. MALLORY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. He speaks of officers unemployed, and of those not employed properly in the grades to which they belong. I wish to understand what the gentleman means. Is there anything in the resolution that determines what employment shall be given to an officer of the Army corresponding with the grade he holds, or is that matter left with the discretion of the Executive?

Mr. SCHENCK. It must necessarily be left to the discretion of the Executive in accordance with military usage. Take, for instance, the case of General McDowell, who has been for some time at Wilmington, in Delaware, presiding over the deliberations and labors of an important board convened for the purpose of retiring officers of all grades in the regular Army. The chief of such a retiring board is very properly a major general. Then, too, there are generals at the heads of bureaus, as in the quartermaster's and other important departments. Others are selected very necessarily in the time of such great military operations as are now going on as chiefs of staffs or of staff corps. These matters must be left to the discretion of the President or War Department or General-in-Chief; we can have no control over them.

Mr. MALLORY. I intended when I asked the question of the gentleman from Ohio to call his attention, and that of the House, to the case of the gentleman who now acts as quartermaster of the whole southern district, and who holds the rank of brigadier general.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suppose there is not a doubt that the War Department would think a general officer was properly employed in so high a position as that. But there have been, and are yet, perhaps, some general officers who are in command of posts, or assigned to places, where they have not so much as a regiment, and where there is no call for services of the highest military grade, where, indeed, a colonel, a major, or even a captain, might as well perform all the duty. I suppose there can be little doubt that such officers should be put on different and more important duty, or else be dropped from the service. But all that will address itself to the good sense and judgment of the Commander-in-Chief if this resolution should pass.

I was about to say, sir, when interrupted, that on looking over this list it will be found that the cost to the Government of these unemployed Generals, as they were at the time the report was made, is stated to be at the rate of $264,378 a year, and that the cost of those officers of their personal staffs, necessarily unemployed with them, being added, would swell the whole amount to $326,316 a year. The Government has been paying that, and paying it without equivalent services rendered.

I have not a doubt but that that amount is now considerably reduced by the fact that a number of the officers here named have been dismissed, or put upon duty properly, and fully. Still, there must be some two hundred thousand dollars, more or less, which we are paying without any thing in return to the Government. This presents the subject simply in its economical point of view.

Now, sir, as I have said, there is nothing illiberal, so also I aver there is nothing unusual in this proposition of the committee; and here I come to the argument of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. KERNAN.) He offers a substitute based upon the proposition, as he says, that he will never be willing to drop from, or muster out of, the service of the Government an officer without giving him a chance to be heard.

Mr. KERNAN. By act of Congress.

Mr. SCHENCK. I accept that modification of the gentleman's proposition.

All I have to say, then, is that the gentleman is not going to act consistently with the former legislation of Congress upon this subject; for the statute-book is full of cases where we have done precisely the same thing. For instance, as long ago as 1795, at the very beginning of legislation in regard to military matters, it was provided in the fourth section of "An act for continuing and regulating the military establishment of the United States" that cavalry should serve as mounted dragoons when ordered so to do, and that in all cases of the enlistment of troops there be expressly reserved to the Government the right to discharge all or any part thereof at such times or in such proportion as might be deemed expedient. Thus, Congress was never willing, from the beginning, to have a military establishment, except upon the distinct understanding that they might reduce it at any time they pleased, that the Government might muster out as many men or drop as many officers as the changed condition of affairs might seem to require for the public interests.

In 1847 it was provided by the twenty-first section of an act approved March 3, of that year, that for the purpose of avoiding unnecessary expenses in the military establishment, including volunteers, the President of the United States was authorized, in case of failure in filling the rank and file of any regiment or regiments, to consolidate such deficient regiment or regiments, and to discharge all supernumerary officers. What does that mean? You find the same idea scattered through a great many acts of legislation. It is one of the features of the military establishment of the country that no officer or man employed is to be regarded as having a right or claim to be continued in that service if the condition of the country, its necessities, and the emergencies of the times shall, in the opinion of the law-making power, require that his services shall be dispensed with. But these, and such as these, it may be claimed, were cases where the liability to be mustered out was made a condition precedent to the enlistment or appointment. I come, however, to a modern case, the exact application of which cannot be questioned. The very last Congress passed an act commonly known as the enrollment act; and in the nineteenth and twentieth sections of that act it is provided that if a regiment shall fall below a certain number the companies of that regiment shall be consolidated, and the supernumerary officers be mustered out. That is, if it be found that the condition of the regiment and the condition of the public service, as connected with that regiment, no longer require the services of certain colonels, lieutenant colonels, majors, or company officers, they must be, and are by law required to be, dropped from the service; and this was where no such contingency or condition was foreseen or provided for in advance.

Mr. KERNAN. These cases are where the Army is to be reduced; but is it claimed that we are not now needing both major and brigadier generals in the service?

Mr. SCHENCK. I will come to that presently.

Mr. KERNAN. If I understand right, a major general was commissioned during the last week.

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, and if we got this law passed it will make room for a good many men who are now acting in that capacity while they are holding the rank of colonel.

Mr. KERNAN. My suggestion is, that if any of them are not fully qualified they shall be sent before an examining board and turned out. The point I make is, that we should not legislate both good and bad out of service and appoint others whom we do not know to be any better.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not see that the gentleman meets my argument. Colonels, lieutenant colonels, majors, captains, and lieutenants, if the necessities of the service do not require them to be retained, are by law required to be dropped. It is not done with any reference to their qualifications or their services, but it is required absolutely to be done whenever the law-executing power sees that the contingency has occurred. They shall go out of the service because their services can no longer be an equivalent for the salaries paid to them.

But I am not yet done with the gentleman from New York. A member of this House when the enrollment act of the present session was under consideration—a gentleman representing a district in Maryland, [Mr. WEBSTER]—rose in his place and proposed, as an amendment to that act, the repeal of those two sections of the old enrollment act, on the ground that it operated sometimes as an unnecessary hardship, and that it would be better to fill up the regiment than turn its officers out of the service. That amendment prevailed in this House. The Senate disagreed to it. A conference committee was appointed. The gentleman from New York knows, and I know, who were on that conference committee. He knows, and I know, which of us agreed to yield to the Senate on that point as the best thing we could do, and let the law stand as it is. It will not do for any of us to say now that we take the position that no man shall be dropped from the service by provision of law, no matter what may be the emergency or the economical view of the subject; for we have agreed to do what the Senate has done—to consent to that principle of legislation being recognized and retained.

The gentleman's proposition will not hold; it does not hold consistently with what Congress has been doing ever since the organization of the Government; it does not hold with what the last Congress did; it does not hold with what you and I and all of us did at this session of Congress, when we agreed to let the law stand upon the statute-book providing that officers might be dropped if the Government pleases, and finds it necessary to the public good; without any of the formal proceedings which the gentleman from New York now thinks always indispensable. I will tell you where the difference is. A colonel, lieutenant colonel, or major may be dropped, and there is no great outrage perpetrated. They are not likely to be candidates for the presidency. They are not generals, and have not hosts of friends to sympathize with them and to exclaim against a course which the Government finds to be necessary. Yet, sir, these subordinate positions are as important to them, the emoluments, may be as necessary to their subsistence and the subsistence of their families, and they may be as deserving by past services as others of higher grade; but they are merely line or company officers, and it is all right to drop them. But how different is the case when you touch a general, and especially if it can be suggested that some political design is mixed up with the act!

Now I hold that the principle involved is the same, and if we are not willing to apply such a rule of legislation to general officers then we should not let the law stand in reference to officers lower upon the roster. The principle is not only the same, but I have shown that this very Congress has affirmed that principle. It has been in its application to regimental officers a subject of legislation and discussion here, and we have permitted a law to stand upon the statute-book that whenever the Government has no need for the further services of a man it had the right to dispense with those services. Mr. Speaker, it has not been the Committee on Military Affairs, but others, who have brought into view outside considerations and sought to make this a personal matter when it is but a case of open, fair, and not unusual legislation.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. KERNAN] has said that we have no more general officers than we need; that we have employment enough for all we now have in the service, and that however necessary we may find it to drop other officers as supernumerary, we ought not to pass this joint resolution, therefore, to apply to them. I thank the gentleman for the word. Suppose we do need, and I do not deny that we do, as many major generals and brigadier generals as are now allowed by law, to command the several corps, divisions, and brigades of the Army and to fill other equivalent positions, then this joint resolution ought certainly to be passed. It ought to be passed in order that those of these officers, so limited in number, who are not discharging their appropriate duties may be set aside to make room for those to enjoy the emoluments and rank who are in fact now performing those duties. Gentlemen here who are so much concerned for their friends among the generals seem to have no thought for the large number of officers of inferior grade, colonels and lieutenant colonels, who have been commanding brigades and even divisions. But is it not just that those who bear the responsibilities and do the work should be promoted to have also the rank and pay?

I want it understood that while gentlemen are speaking in behalf of general officers as if they alone were to be affected, the committee present something which appeals also for justice to that meritorious class of officers who are to be advanced if you will make room for them. Then the proposition announced by gentlemen that we have no more major generals than allowed by the law comes with renewed and double force in support of my argument. If it were in the power of the President to promote all these colonels without reference to the fact whether all the present commissioned generals remain in the service or not, perhaps it would be more entirely and solely a question of expense. But in this connection it becomes far more than a question of economy merely. We are not only proposing to save to the Government the cost of those who are unemployed, but we are providing the only way by which we can reward and do justice to those who have been doing and doing well their work. Think, gentlemen, when you vote for this measure that you may be assisting to promote according to their rich deserving some of the scarred and war-worn heroes who have helped to illustrate the battle-fields of liberty.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox.]

The amendment was read, as follows:

Provided, That whenever any officer comprehended in this act shall demand a board of inquiry according to the rules and regulations in such cases, and who shall be willing to serve, that such board shall be forthwith convened; and if said board shall find him competent to command in the rank to which he is entitled, he shall be at once restored to active service with full pay: And provided further, That all officers who have received the thanks of Congress during the present war shall be exempted from the provisions of this act.

Mr. PENDLETON demanded the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 46, nays 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Cravens, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Grider, Griswold, Hall, Harrington, Herriek, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, King, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McKinney, Middleton, James R. So the amendment was not agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. J. W. WHITE stated that he had paired off with Mr. ECKLEY.

Mr. ASHLEY stated that Mr. C. A. WHITE was paired off with Mr. DONNELLY, and that Mr. HOLMAN was paired off with Mr. DUMONT.

The question next recurred upon the substitute heretofore offered by Mr. KERNAN, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, as soon as possible after the passage hereof, the President of the United States shall designate and cause to convene a board of competent military officers from those in active service, to consist of three major generals, three brigadier generals, and three colonels, which board shall, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, make a careful examination into the competency, fitness, and efficiency for command of such major generals and brigadier generals in the service of the United States who, on the 1st day of July, 1864, shall not be in the performance of duty or service corresponding with his rank and grade, and who shall not have been engaged in such duty or service for three months continuously next prior to that date, and report to the Secretary of War the names and rank of each of such generals who in the opinion of said board shall be incapable of efficiently and properly performing the duties of his rank in the service. And each officer who by the report of said board is found incapable of properly and efficiently performing the duties of his rank shall, if such opinion and report be approved by the President of the United States, be then dropped from the rolls of the Army of the United States, and all the pay, allowances, and emoluments of such general officers so dropped shall cease from that date, and the vacancy so occasioned may be filled by new promotions and appointments as in other cases. But no officer is to be considered as included in the foregoing provision whose absence from duty shall have been occasioned by wounds received or disease contracted in the line of his duty while in the military service of the United States, or by his being a prisoner of war in the hands of the enemy or under parole; and any major general of volunteers or brigadier general of volunteers who may have been appointed from the regular Army under the authority given in section four of the act approved July 22, 1861, to authorize the employment of volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws and protecting public property, and the acts amendatory thereof, who shall be so dropped from the rolls shall not thereby be discharged from the service of the United States, but shall be reinitiated to his position and duty as an officer of the regular Army.

Mr. KERNAN called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the substitute.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. No. 46) to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John Hastings, praying for relief, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 274) for the relief of John Hastings. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

The committee reported against the propriety of passing the bill. I believe that report has not been acted upon, and I wish now to move to take up the bill for the purpose of recommitting it to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to. Mr. GRIMES. I now move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL HOSPITAL AT KITTERY.

Mr. GRIMES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inform the Senate whether any steps have been taken to erect a naval hospital at Kittery, Maine, or to extend the one already there, and if not, to state to the Senate the reason for the delay and all of the facts and correspondence of the Department in relation thereto.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 38) to authorize the settlement of the accounts of A. Bush, late public printer for the Territory of Oregon, and had also passed the joint resolution of the Senate (No. 21) to provide for the printing of official reports of the operations of the armies of the United States, with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A joint resolution (No. 49) to drop from the rolls of the Army unemployed generals; and

A bill (No. 276) to secure to persons in the military or naval service of the United States homesteads on confiscated or forfeited estates in insurrectionary districts.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 185) to establish a postal money order system.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 370) to appoint certain officers of the Navy; and also that it had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 76) relating to appointments in the naval service and courts-martial.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 172) concerning the disposition of convicts in the courts of the United States, for the subsisting of persons confined in jails charged with violating the laws of the United States, and for diminishing the expenses in relation thereto; and

A bill (H. R. No. 159) for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State.

LIST OF GENERAL OFFICERS.

Mr. WILSON. I submit the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish the Senate a list of all general officers of the regular and volunteer forces appointed since the beginning of the present war, with the States in which they were born and from which they were appointed, designating also those whose nominations have been withdrawn from the Senate; those negatived by the Senate; those which have expired by constitutional limitation, not having been confirmed by the Senate; and those resigned, declined, dropped, discharged, dismissed, or mustered out of the service, and those who have died in the service.

Mr. COWAN. I suggest to the Senator whether it would not be better to insert in place of the words "appointed since the beginning of the present war" the words "now in commission or those who have been in commission since the commencement of the war," so that we shall have a complete list.

Mr. WILSON. The word "appointed" was used for the purpose of having it complete, to include all those who have been appointed. Some have been appointed and had commissions sent them, which were afterwards withdrawn and their names not sent to the Senate. I want to get an entire list to know exactly how it stands. It can be made up without any trouble; the records are all in the office. It will give us that kind of information which will enable us to know the facts when we are called on here.

Mr. COWAN. The resolution only takes in those appointed since the beginning of the war, but there were some in commission before.

Mr. COLLAMER. It evidently does not apply to those who were in commission before the war and have remained in since. We want them, too.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to putting them in, and I will modify the resolution to read in this way:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish the Senate a list of all general officers of the regular and volunteer forces in commission at the beginning of the present war or appointed since, with the States in which they were born, &c.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (No. 49) to drop from the rolls of the Army unemployed generals was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, the consideration of the bill (S. No. 114) to amend section five of an act entitled "An act to continue, alter, and amend the charter of the city of Washington," approved May 17, 1848, and further to preserve the purity of elections and guard against the abuse of the elective franchise by a registration of electors for the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, was resumed as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. COWAN to insert the word "white" before "male," in the third line of the first section.

Mr. MORRILL. Is that open to further amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is open to amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the section by striking out from line nine to line fifteen the following words:

And shall have paid all school taxes and all taxes on personal property properly assessed against him, shall be entitled to vote for mayor, collector, register, members of the board of aldermen and board of common council, and assessor, and for every officer authorized to be elected at any election under any act or acts to which this is amendatory or supplementary.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

And shall within the year next preceding the election have paid a tax, or been assessed with a part of the revenue of the District, county, or cities therein, or been exempt from taxation having taxable estate, and who can read and write with facility, shall enjoy the privileges of an elector.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inquire of the Senator from Maine if he proposes to strike out the words mentioned by him in addition to the word "white" or to retain the word "white"?

Mr. MORRILL. To strike out the word "white."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With this in addition?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then it is an amendment to the amendment, in the opinion of the Chair, and the question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Maine to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. POWELL. I will ask the Senator from Maine to explain the effect of the amendment to the amendment. I do not understand it.

Mr. MORRILL. If the bill should be amended as proposed it will present this case: all citizens of the United States who have been inhabitants of this District for one year, and resident in the particular locality where they propose to vote for three months next preceding the election, and who have been assessed or who are liable to be assessed, having taxable estate, and who can read and write with facility, shall have the right of an elector. Those are the qualifications.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was mistaken in regard to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania. The Senator from Pennsylvania proposes to insert the word "white" instead of striking it out; so that the amendment of the Senator from Maine would not be an amendment to the amendment, and it will be necessary first to dispose of the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. COWAN. I hope that will be disposed of, and that the amendment will be adopted. I may state in connection with it that I should regret such a modification of it as is suggested by the Senator from Maine; because, although the standard which he sets up as a qualification to vote is much less objectionable to my mind than the one contemplated by the bill, it is still obnoxious to this objection: it would have the effect in some cases of admitting negroes to the right of suffrage, which I may say is obnoxious to the vast bulk of the people of the border States, whatever it may be to those States lying upon the extreme frontier, and would also prevent white men who are unable to read and write from enjoying that suffrage.

My principal objection to the introduction of any innovation at this time on this subject is the state of the country. I think it is a wrong time to introduce reforms, and particularly is it a wrong time to introduce any reform which goes to the basis of our institutions, which would strike at the fundamental principles on which they rest.

I hope, therefore, that now this matter will be left as we found it; and hereafter, if fortune should favor us, we shall be better qualified and more at liberty to make such reforms as in our judgment we shall think best for the purpose of securing to all men that measure of liberty which it will be found they are entitled to enjoy, not only with benefit to themselves but with benefit to their fellow-men. I am willing to go as far in this direction, I think, as anybody else; but I am unwilling to depart in any instance from a nu-tional basis. I think this is a high privilege which is intrusted to any portion of the community, and that it ought to be intrusted only to those who have given assurance to the country that it will not be abused in their hands. I know there is very great doubt now pervading the minds of many wise men whether we have not already too many people in the enjoyment of the franchise who are unfit for its proper exercise.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania, first, because it is manifest to the Senate that the bill without that provision in it cannot now become a law. The same question has been submitted to the House of Representatives in the bill passed by the Senate for the organization of a Territory, and it was defeated in the House, and after several meetings of committees of conference it has become perfectly manifest that a bill containing that clause cannot become a law. I have been informed by citizens of the District that it is highly important that the organic law of the District should be amended preceding the coming election, in order to preserve the purity of the ballot-box. I therefore would waive any desire that I may have had to modify or change the character of the class of persons who may be permitted to vote, for the purpose of securing the good that can be effected now.

It is highly important, as I have just remarked, that some bill should be passed on this subject modifying the laws regulating the elective franchise in the District. I have been told, and I believe it to be true, that it is next to impossible to secure a fair expression of the will of the people at the ballot-box under the laws as they now exist. I do not think this evil should be perpetuated out of a desire on the part of any Senator to secure the adoption of a new theory.

I do not think that the enjoyment of the right to vote is a natural right. It is a right conferred on individuals by the community on the ground, as I suppose, of a belief in their capacity to hold the reins of government safely. Those that vote, in deciding who shall hold office, decide primarily the character of the laws of the community in which they live; and under the election laws of all the States very large numbers of the white people are excluded from the enjoyment of the right to vote. All females are excluded, thus excepting one half of the entire community of every State. Then all minors, all persons under the age of twenty-one years, are excluded; and all persons born abroad, and who have not resided in this country for a period of five years, are excluded from the enjoyment of this privilege; all going to show that the Legislatures of the various States hold this right not to be a natural right incident to freedom and the enjoyment of citizenship, but is supposed to be conferred on those who are found to be competent to exercise this privilege wisely and consistently with the safety of civil society.

No one can deny, I think, that a very large proportion of the people in some of the States who have been held as slaves for a century and more could not be safely trusted with the enjoyment of this right. I think that this cannot be doubted; and if not, we ought not to insist on the incorporation of such a provision in an amendment to the election laws for this District, where there are strong prejudices against the modification of the election laws in this respect, especially in face of the fact which I stated at the outset, that it has become perfectly manifest to the Senate that, whatever might be the wish of the Senate in this respect, a majority of the House of Representatives will stand firmly in opposition to its incorporation into any law.

Mr. FOSTER. I agree with the honorable Senator from Iowa that the right of suffrage is not a natural right. It should be bestowed upon those, and those only, who are qualified to exercise it; and that is by no means in my opinion upon every man or every woman in the community. I do not think, however, that color is a sensible or reasonable test of that or of any political right whatever. I think the proper test is intelligence and moral character. A person who has sufficient intelligence and sufficient moral character, I think should be allowed to take part in electing those who are to make the laws, and, in effect, govern the community.

I agree with him also that the great mass of the blacks who are in this District, certainly those who have recently come into it, are by no means qualified to exercise this right. If we insist either upon intelligence or upon moral character, they would probably be wanting in both; and that without charging the absence of those qualifications upon them as their fault. They, in my opinion, are not responsible for it. The responsibility rests elsewhere. Still, though they have been abused and shut out from the light of knowledge, they should not be allowed to exercise a right that they are not qualified to exercise, by way of compensation. That would be punishing those who are not to blame for the faults and crimes of others.

I should therefore be inclined to vote for the amendment of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania but for the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Maine. With the test which the honorable Senator from Maine proposes to apply to this bill, I am perfectly willing that there shall be nothing said in the bill about color; for the qualifications which he proposes go perhaps as far as we can safely go. It is difficult to determine the precise amount of intelligence that a man should possess in order to be qualified as a voter. I think, however, all must agree that if he cannot read he is not qualified; he has not sufficient intelligence to be a voter. He must, of course, if he exercised the right, exercise it almost as the tool of somebody else; for if he cannot read how is he to know that the ballot he puts in the box has on it the names of the individuals for whom he would vote? He must take the statement of another. He himself really cannot know whether he is voting for the persons that he supposes he is voting for or not. I would therefore make the ability to read a test for every man, and I would add to it the ability to write, but not a property qualification. As the honorable Senator from Maine proposes, as I understand, to move that amendment, in the anticipation and belief that it will be adopted, I shall now vote against the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania. If the amendment of the Senator from Maine shall finally fail, there may be after-considerations which will affect my vote on the bill, but at present I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania for the reasons which I have given.

Mr. MORRILL. I was disposed to place this qualification so high that if by any possibility the case should turn upon the question of qualification the judgment of the Senate should be that a man to be entitled to vote should be of full age, a citizen of the United States, a man of probity and of intelligence. These, I think, should be considered qualifications which should entitle a man to the privilege of the elective franchise; and I hoped that by presenting such a proposition we should not be disagreed on this question; and I desired distinctly to place that, as I call, high qualification against the question of color; and that is precisely the question presented by the bill and the amendment of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania and my amendment.

Now, I agree with the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania that upon this question of suffrage there is no uniformity whatever in this country. By the Constitution of the United States there is no formula, there is no qualification whatever stated; it is left entirely to the States. The States may by their constitutions allow such persons to vote as in their judgment they think best. It is no further a concern of the Government of the United States than it applies to this District or to their Territories over which they have exclusive jurisdiction. When you come to this District or to the Territories, of course the Government of the United States has the right, and in a case like this it becomes its imperative duty, to say specifically what shall be the formula or what shall be the qualifications upon which a man shall be entitled to the right of suffrage. I agree with the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania that it is not a natural right; it is a relative right; or in other words it is a privilege, a privilege which the political society in which the man resides has a right to confer or withhold just as it pleases; and so has been the practice of this country; and at best, as the honorable Senator from Iowa has stated, it is but a partial privilege in any of the States of the Union. But we are called upon here under these circumstances to state a principle that shall apply to this District, which is exclusively within the control and jurisdiction of the Government of the United States.

The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania makes color the test; the complexion of a man; every "white citizen" of the United States may do so and so, but by no possibility shall men of African descent exercise this privilege. Is that rational? No man will undertake to defend that on the ground of rationality; no man will undertake to defend such a proposition as that on the ground of right. It cannot be defended. What is the defense? The Senator from Pennsylvania says he does not want any new issue in these troublesome times. He objects to this upon the ground of an innovation; and I have no doubt that when he proposes to put the word "white" into this bill he sincerely does not suppose that he himself is innovating; that he is laying himself obnoxious to precisely the charge he makes upon the bill.

Mr. President, I have said that there is no uniformity on this question of the exercise of the elective franchise in this country. The States are not uniform; no two States are alike in the qualifications prescribed to the citizens for the exercise of this privilege; and, as I have already stated, the Constitution of the United States is entirely silent upon the question. But there is a history on this question. The right of suffrage in this country is historical to some extent, at least to a general intent. How is that? Look to your constitutions; but first go back to your Declaration of Independence. Is there any color in that as against anybody for any political right whatever? Not a bit of it. There is no color in the instrument from beginning to end, either in regard to the elective franchise or in regard to any political right, either absolute or relative; so that the great American declaration of right leaves everybody free in the exercise of all their political rights. When you come to the Constitution of the United States there is no color in that; none whatever as to the exercise of a man's political rights, be they either absolute or relative.

Now, sir, looking at the constitutions of the several States, who had this matter particularly in charge, what is the history on that subject? Take the thirteen original States who adopted their constitutions or frames of government contemporaneous with the Revolution and anterior to the Constitution of the United States; how did they stand on this question? Any color? Look at Virginia, whose constitution was, I think, the first. Was there any color in it? Not a bit of it. There was not the word "negro" from beginning to end. Read that constitution, including the declaration of rights, and you would never dream that the question of right depending on color had entered the head of any mortal man. In eleven of the original States there is no question of color in any one of their constitutions from beginning to end. Following the great formula laid down in the American declaration of rights, they left this question of suffrage as they left every other political right, either absolute or relative, entirely open to the communities and open to everybody without regard to color. There were only two of the original States that put the slightest limitation upon this question, or upon any other question, on account of color, and those were, as you would expect, South Carolina and Georgia. All the rest were free, and so was their law, and under those constitutions, I suppose I need not say to Senators here, freemen, whether colored or not, did vote.

Mr. COWAN. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to correct him in regard to Pennsylvania? And I suspect the correction will involve perhaps the construction of most of the constitutions of the eleven States to which he refers. The earlier constitutions conferred the right of suffrage on the "freemen" of the community; and when a legal construction came to be put upon that word "freemen" it was decided, at least in Pennsylvania, before the amendment which constitutes the present constitution, that that word excluded the negroes.

Mr. MORRILL. My honorable friend will find, if he has paid as much attention to this particular subject as I have, that he is historically inaccurate in regard to the fact. It is not so; it will not be found in a majority even of the constitutions that the word "freemen" is used. I undertake to say, after a most careful examination of the subject, that it will be found that there is no term of exclusion employed in any of the thirteen original States, save only the two I have named, on this particular political right, the right of suffrage, or upon any other either absolute or relative political right of the citizen.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, MAY 13, 1864.

NEW SERIES....No. 141.

Sir, this is the precedent with which our forefathers started. These are the American principles which were inaugurated during the revolutionary era in this country, and which extended to the organic era and were communicated to it, and they were embodied into the forms of government when your State governments were instituted, and they were adopted again at the organization of the Government under the Constitution of the United States; and what then? How did our fathers set off on this subject, this precise question which my friend thinks is innovating now? The Government of the United States, under the Constitution, has jurisdiction over the Territories. The Northwest Territory was supposed to be the only Territory over which she had jurisdiction and could exercise this right. How was this right exercised there? Look into the organic act organizing the Northwest Territory, and you will find that there is no exclusion on account of color. "All inhabitants" is the phrase, "resident" so and so, shall be entitled to participate in the elections. Further, when that Territory came to be divided, and the Territory of Indiana was organized out of it, the same principle obtained again, no limitation as to color, and that was as late as 1799. At a later period, when Illinois came to be organized into a Territory out of this same Northwest Territory, the same principle prevailed; there was no exclusion whatever on account of color.

I have passed the period when Vermont came into the Union, which was in 1793, I think—

Mr. COLLAMER. In 1791.

Mr. MORRILL. In 1793, my recollection is, Vermont was admitted into the Union, and what was the principle in her constitution? Not the slightest limitation. She followed the formula of the Declaration of Independence, and there was no limitation whatever. How was it in regard to Tennessee, the second State born under the Constitution? No limitation in her constitution as to color. When you come to Kentucky, which was admitted I think in 1799, you there find this idea of color first introduced into the constitution in the new States, and from that period down to the present, I agree with my honorable friend from Pennsylvania, the practice has been quite uniform in all the constitutions of the modern States, the States recently admitted into the Union, to introduce the word "white;" but that was an innovation, and the innovation was against the revolutionary era, the innovation was against the principles of the founders of the Government, the innovation was wholly against the organization of the States anterior to the Federal Constitution. And when I propose an amendment of this sort, and resist the proposition of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, I put myself in harmony with the principles of the American Revolution, I put myself in harmony with the practice of the thirteen original States with the exceptions I have mentioned, and in harmony with the action of the Government down to a period as late as—

Mr. WILLEY. Will the honorable Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly.

Mr. WILLEY. I understand the honorable Senator to say that he puts himself in harmony with the practice of the thirteen original States, with the exceptions he names. I should be glad to know what one of those thirteen original States ever allowed the right of suffrage to colored persons?

Mr. SUMNER. North Carolina.

Mr. WILSON. And Maryland.

Mr. SUMNER. And Tennessee.

Mr. MORRILL. If I had had the honor to receive the attention of the honorable Senator from West Virginia, the explanation which he now requires of me I think would not be necessary. I was not speaking of what might have been permitted at the ballot-box, though I think it is historically true that in regard to some of the slave States which had then the character of slave States and have continued slave States, colored men were allowed to vote, and never excluded until a recent date; but my proposition was that in the constitutions of eleven of the thirteen original States there was no exclusion on account of color. The fundamental law in all these States ran in harmony with the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. SUMNER. I would remind my friend that it was so also in Virginia in the beginning.

Mr. CARLILE. The suffrage in Virginia, from the beginning up to 1829, was limited to freeholders; none but freeholders could exercise the right, and slaves of course were not freeholders.

Mr. COLLAMER. But there was no exclusion on account of color.

Mr. MORRILL. All the statements which are made here as historical facts do not run against my principle. I repeat there was no exclusion on account of color. That there were other qualifications in all these State laws I do not doubt. I know that. I know, as the Senator from Virginia has said, that in that State for many years none but a freeholder could be a voter; but that freeholder might be a colored man, and that very qualification would allow him to vote. It was so in some other of the States. I believe there was a moral qualification attached to some of them; I think Vermont, certainly South Carolina, required a belief in the Supreme Being.

Mr. COLLAMER. In Vermont the law requires a man to be of good moral character in order to be a voter, and he may be of good character whether colored or white.

Mr. MORRILL. My proposition was that this idea of using the term "white" in such a bill is an innovation; and the history of the country from the earliest moment, from the day of the date of the Declaration of Independence down through the whole period of the Government until after the organization of the Federal Government under the Constitution and the organization of all the Territories over which it had control, verifies the truth of this proposition.

Now, Mr. President, I do not care to continue the discussion, but will simply repeat my proposition and take my seat. Upon an analysis of the bill with my amendment, it will be found that the first requirement is that a man shall be twenty-one years of age and a citizen of the United States. Then he is required to have been an inhabitant of the District at least twelve months before the election, and a resident of the ward in which he proposes to offer his vote at least three months next preceding the election. He shall either have been assessed in the revenues of the District, or liable to be assessed having taxable property, and in addition thereto he shall have a degree of intelligence, and that degree of intelligence is that he shall be able to read and write with facility.

Mr. COLLAMER. I ask the Senator from Maine whether he offers that as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MORRILL. I did offer it as a substitute for the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania; but as I am now informed by the Chair that that is not in order, I propose, if the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania be voted down, then to renew my proposition as a distinct amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to know why it is not in order to do so now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine first offered his amendment as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania. On examination, however, it does not bear on that amendment, it being an amendment to another portion of the bill and of a different character from this.

Mr. COWAN. Mine is a proposition to insert, not to strike out.

Mr. WILKINSON. Mr. President, I hope that the Senate will adhere to the position it assumed upon the question of suffrage when the bill for the organization of the Territory of Montana was before it, and this question was directly presented for its decision. I do not know but that there may be instances in which I may be willing to yield my opinion upon this question of allowing negroes to vote. I might do so perhaps in a case where my action would have no practical effect, as perhaps in the case of a Territory where there are none of that class; but I never will, under the present condition of things, yield this right where it is of any practical importance whatever.

I am informed, sir, that upon this very ground where the capital of our country is located, by the laws which governed the people residing upon this territory before the District of Columbia was organized, in certain cases negroes could vote. There are to-day in this city a large number of intelligent, thrifty free colored people who have contributed for a long series of years to the support of the city government, who have regularly paid their taxes, and who have contributed their money liberally to raise and to equip and put into the field three regiments of colored troops. Those troops have been sent into the field, and are to-day battling for our common country; and in any law regulating the right of suffrage in this District I never will vote to exclude the patriotic colored people of the District who have contributed their influence, their money, and their exertion to raise and to equip and put those soldiers into the field; nor will I vote to exclude the scarred veteran who may return home from the war from participating in regulating the Government which he has made such great sacrifices to defend, merely because his skin happens to be a little darker than my own.

The honorable Senator from Iowa, for whom I have great respect, has stated that he will support this amendment because a reform in the laws of this city is necessary, and unless the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania be adopted the House of Representatives will disagree to our proposition and reject the bill. I submit whether this is a good reason for the Senate, whether it is a proper and sufficient justification for the Senate to adopt a wrong principle for fear the other House will reject the right one if we adopt it. It will be time enough for us to adopt this amendment when the disagreement of the House of Representatives shall have been made known to us in an official and formal way.

I may consent to support, when it is offered, the proposition of the Senator from Maine, not because I would vote for so stringent a law if it was to be applied in my State, for I think it goes further than I should be willing to go in the State of Minnesota; but I am willing to go for it here in the new condition of things which is existing here and everywhere in the border States, when as we hope the institution of slavery is to be overthrown, and when a vast number of those who have been heretofore held in bondage shall become free men. I am well aware that many of them will be incompetent to vote on account of the wicked and pernicious influences which slavery has had upon them. In view of this fact, I regard the proposition of the Senator from Maine as a wise and proper one to be adopted here. Fix that limitation to the law, require of them intelligence and the other qualifications which he proposes in his amendment, and there is no human reason, there is no moral principle, there is no justice or right in saying that a man who is a patriot, who is an intelligent citizen, shall, because of the color of his skin, be excluded from the rights which are extended to other men no more intelligent and no more worthy than he.

The Senator from Pennsylvania says it is not time for us to do these things. Why, sir, that honorable Senator a year or two ago thought that it was not time to employ negroes in the service of the Government, and it was not time to do a great many other things—

Mr. COWAN. Will the Senator allow me to correct him by saying that I never expressed any such opinion? I have uniformly from the first, at all times, expressed the opinion that that was a question for the President, and not for Congress. The Senator is utterly mistaken.

Mr. WILKINSON. I do not remember the particular phase which the honorable Senator's objection then assumed—I mean his objection to passing any law for the organization of colored troops.

Mr. COWAN. The honorable Senator, I think, understands the ground that I have always taken, and that is that the negro is a citizen of the United States in that sense which makes him owe allegiance to the United States; that having been afforded protection he owes military service; but being in the opinion of some barbarous, in the opinion of others semi-barbarous, and in the opinion of others civilized, it was a question for the Executive to know whether he could be employed in our armies as a civilized soldier. That has been the ground which I have taken from the outset.

Mr. WILKINSON. I know that during this present session the honorable Senator has taken that view, and very justly, as I conceive. He assumed in a discussion here some few weeks ago that even the slave was a citizen and owed allegiance to the Government, and that that allegiance was a primary allegiance greater than that which he owed to his master or anybody else. In that I fully concur with the honorable Senator. But, sir, I cannot assent to the idea that it is not time to do right, that it is not time to extend to these men who are now giving their support to this Government their rights; or rather that it is not time to cease insulting and abusing and degrading them; that it is not time to cease and withdraw our opposition to this class of persons. After we have got those hands upon thousands of them fighting for their country, we in our legislation are discriminating directly against them, and aiding to keep them as far as we can in a degraded and servile condition.

I look upon it as the highest duty of this nation, as long as this Government will accept the services of these men in the field, to strike out all language in every law which tends to discriminate against and to degrade them and the class to which they belong. By inserting this word "white" into the law as now proposed, we are yielding to a wicked prejudice that slavery has inaugurated on this continent and among our people; we are yielding to a wicked prejudice which has grown up within the last thirty years, grown up under the influence of the arch-traitor, John C. Calhoun, and perpetuated by his adherents all over this country; and it is time that that influence should be crushed under our feet, particularly since we have accepted the military service of this class of people, and accepted it at a time when we cannot very well afford to let that service go.

Mr. President, it was a short time ago, and even since this session commenced, that it was difficult to get a bill through Congress giving these men any reasonable pay for their services in the Army. It was within a very short time that we could pass a bill through the Senate paying them thirteen dollars a month for the services which they were rendering to the country. Senators, patriotic, honorable Senators, wanted some discrimination; they wanted to degrade these men; they wanted them to fight for the country, but they must fight for ten dollars a month while white soldiers fight for thirteen dollars a month. Now I think it is time that the American people should rise above such prejudices and be willing for once to do justice. There are a great many people in this country who think—and I admit that I share somewhat in that belief—that we shall never get out of this war until we are converted, until we can afford to be just, until we can see the right, and seeing it pursue it without any variability or shadow of turning. We are not entitled to success unless we are just ourselves.

In this District I think that the proposition of the honorable Senator from Maine, although it is not directly before the Senate now, is eminently practical. It can be carried into effect. It will not create any disturbance in the municipal government of this District. It will not derange the city government. There will be no great inconvenience in carrying out this measure, nor will the ordinary affairs of the District be disturbed.

Why, Mr. President, this population have been from the very commencement of this war the most quiet, law-obeying, orderly people we have among us. It was conjectured all over the country, it was predicted that if we freed the negroes, if we abolished slavery in this District, they would become insolent and turbulent, and the peace of the city would be disturbed. It was predicted by people North and by people South that when the war commenced there would be an insurrection, and we have been enlightened on this floor by the hour as to the horrors of a negro insurrection. I defy any man to show me a single case, to point me to a single instance where the colored people of this country since this war broke out, or since we have commenced to treat them as men and as human beings, have violated the law, where they have sought in any wise to pursue any course that was inconsistent with the most exalted humanity and reverence for the institutions of their country. There is not a single instance of it from the southern boundary of Pennsylvania to New Orleans. Where in whole districts of country the women and children have been left in the hands of negro slaves, all of them Union men, ignorant as they are, uneducated, without any of the advantages which free people of color possess, they have never shown any disposition to violate the law or commit any act of cruelty or impropriety whatever. There is no single instance of it. There is a sublimity in the conduct of these people in this present emergency such as history furnishes no parallel to; all of them for the Union, all of them waiting to receive the Union armies, all of them taking care of the people who are unprotected when they are left in their hands, all of them showing that they have a faith in the triumph of the cause of their country, and all of them looking by the triumph of our arms to their own emancipation. And, sir, whenever the Government calls upon them, they are ready to respond, and they do it with a confidence and with a spirit of obedience such as you will find in no other class of people in this country. With these great facts before us, is it not strange that we as a people should refuse to observe them, but continue on in our blind prejudice to persecute and degrade this people?

In this condition of things, whenever a law comes up here it is supposed to be necessary, in order to prevent some disturbance, in order to conciliate somebody, that you must put in an offensive clause against colored people; you must insert some word in the bill that will show that they are not human beings as we are, that they are not entitled to the rights and to the privileges and to the immunities of other men who fight for and maintain the interests of their country. So far as I am concerned I will never do it wherever any practical result is to be attained by either inserting or striking out any such proposition. I hope that the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania will not be adopted. Let us at least strike out from the national statute-book everything which is inconsistent with the great truth of the equality of all men. Let us not while we are struggling to protect and perpetuate our own liberties be guilty of the giant wrong of attempting to deprive black men of theirs; nor should we be guilty of perpetuating a wicked prejudice against this people, which had its origin in slavery, and is one of the vilest features of that accursed institution.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Mr. President, perhaps it will not be amiss, at least it does not appear to me to be so, to make a few remarks on this matter after the general declaration of the Senator from Minnesota that Senators here who do not sustain or act with him in relation to measures of this description intend and design to degrade this class of colored persons.

Mr. WILKINSON. I will state to the honorable Senator from New Jersey that I meant to say that it is perpetuating a wicked prejudice that was inaugurated by slavery, and which ought, in my judgment, to be abandoned. I did not mean to assail any particular Senators.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I do not know what the Senator meant; I understood distinctly what he said.

Perhaps the amendment of the Senator from Maine theoretically is right; because, as I understand it, the right of suffrage in a republic like ours should be based upon intelligence and citizenship; and, everything else being equal, with no opposing element to control the mind in coming to a different conclusion, that should be the rule of action; but it never has been so, and I suppose it never can be so. If the question is to be determined by this rule, then some of the ablest, purest, and most patriotic citizens of the country who are now deprived of it—I mean the "better portion of creation"—will be entitled to the right of suffrage; and some of our noble youths who with hearts and hands are joining in the noble fight for freedom, whose minds are beaming with intelligence, should be entitled to the exercise of the elective franchise although the mystic period of twenty-one years of age may not have yet arrived.

But, sir, at this time it seems to me that the proposition of the Senator from Maine is not only inexpedient but full of mischief, and would be most disastrous. I often think that from our want of active recollection and unconsciousness of things about us that we hardly realize the state in which we are. Why, sir, let us remember that we are in the midst of a war the most terrible and dreadful that has ever shaken the surface of the earth, the issues of which are this day trembling in the balance. The evidence of it is in the death of thousands of our noblest and our best, who fall like leaves before the winter's blast, and whose mangled forms now bleeding lie within the "Wilderness."

Sir, we must have unity. "Unity is strength." If we divide upon unnecessary questions, questions not of vital import to the country, I fear the banner of the country will be trampled beneath the armed heel of traitors. I fear the effect of this measure will be like that of many other measures now agitated; such a measure as was discussed in the House of Representatives yesterday—I speak with great respect—to parcel out the lands of rebels, which very lands are drinking at this hour the best blood of our bravest men in a death-struggle to maintain their hold upon that very soil.

Sir, all questions of this kind serve only but to hurt and injure us. We had better wait until we have secured the conquest before we undertake to parcel out these lands. It will be time enough to do it then. All these things tend to drive far from our standard many men who were at first inclined to rally round it. Everything of this description just at this time, in this fierce struggle, goes to weaken, not to strengthen, us.

Our troops are patriotic; they need not such incentives to urge them forward to the field. Let rebel owners first be overcome before you undertake to share their lands among our worthy soldiers; this is more judicious.

But, sir, if I understand the proposition of the Senator from Maine, it is not simply to extend the right of suffrage to colored persons, but to restrict it in the case of whites. The rule proposed by him is that no citizen shall be entitled to the exercise of the elective franchise unless he can read and write with facility. That has not been the requirement heretofore. That has not been the law since the establishment of the government of Maryland, which has been succeeded for the last fifty or sixty years by the General Government in this locality. Is this a time to strip a white man, although he may not read and write with facility, of this great right—the right of voting—and thus excite him and his friends to hate and violence against the Government? The Government should foster and protect his rights while he is struggling to maintain it. Sir, this is not the time to do this thing. We cannot afford to do it now.

The Senator from Minnesota says it only applies to this District. Sir, it is the principle that is objectionable. This is the center; strike this chord here and it will vibrate to the utmost limits of the Republic and agitate the country almost as deeply and profoundly as the rebellion has itself. Sir, it is madness now to do this thing.

Then, sir, conceding it to be theoretically right, is this a proper time to press upon the country such a measure? There are many things in ethics and in morals which, although abstractly right, cannot practically be used under all and every circumstance. What will be its effect upon our soldiers? The sympathies of my friend from Minnesota embrace these colored troops. He cannot see why men rushing to the ranks to preserve the blessings of this Government whose skins are black shall not have the right to exercise this franchise. Sir, why should men whose skins are white, residents of this District, unable to read and write, who have listened to their country's call, gone forth to battle, and bathed the land with their best blood, be forgotten by the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WILKINSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TEN EYCK. I have observed this rule for my own conduct: I never interrupt a Senator. When I shall have concluded the few remarks I desire to make, it will give me the greatest pleasure to answer any question the Senator may see fit to ask; that is, if I can.

Mr. WILKINSON. I simply desired to ask the Senator how many white soldiers have gone from this District and how many black ones.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I have not consulted the statistics. I know that a considerable number of both white and black have gone into the ranks, according to the newspapers and to the current information of the day. The exact number I am unable to state.

Mr. President, Senators may say this measure is to be confined to this District; but, sir, the principle will strike the mind of every man throughout the limits of the land. Every father, every brother, every relative of every pure and noble-hearted soldier who has not learned to read and write with facility, who has gone into the Army and offered freely his life, need be, for the safety of the country, will hear of this amendment with a scowl of indignation. I speak it respectfully; I do not wish to characterize the proposition of my friend from Maine, for whom I entertain a very great regard, with terms of harshness; but, judging from my knowledge of mankind and the way in which the human heart is constituted, that is the way in which this thing will be received by that large class of men who go to form our legions, beneath whose banners they now, I trust, are marching on to final victory. Sir, it will freeze the blood within their veins, and, like the touch of the magician's wand, will turn them into stone; it will arrest their movements, and in the future nothing but the inexorable power of a draft will force this class of men into the ranks. Sir, how is this? A soldier comes from battle wounded, torn, and mangled; he hobbles on his crutches up to vote; he cannot read and write; he is driven from the polls! While absent in the war he has been disfranchised. He took the field a freeman; he returns a slave. He went to save the nation; the nation has destroyed him. Sir, Senators may vote for such a measure if they choose, but while I live I never, never will.

Mr. President, the same reason does not apply to the class of persons alluded to by the Senator from Minnesota; for colored men within this District and in several of the States never have enjoyed this privilege; you do not rob them of it, as you propose to do white men who have enjoyed it, and who it is proposed by this amendment to disfranchise, although fighting in the ranks at this very hour. Sir, it is a very different thing to refuse a colored man a novel grant like this, a grant which he never has enjoyed, or strip a white man of a right which was his birthright, and at the very time when he is rendering the most energetic and patriotic service that a man can render to his country. I see a vast difference and distinction between the two cases now before us.

Sir, I regard this measure at this time as most dangerous and disastrous. It is not necessary for me to refer to any former action of mine to prove my indisposition to degrade the colored man or disregard his situation. I have done perhaps as much as any other man, at least on this side of the Chamber, and at as great a sacrifice—I will not say a sacrifice, because I do not so regard it—but I know I might have had some benefit under acts of Congress connected with this class of persons; but, sir, I would make up my mind to as soon touch the price of blood as touch the price of human bondage; I so have always felt, and acted on it. I oppose this proposition. Our armies must be full, and so be kept. I believe that if you pass the amendment I have spoken of, that in addition to the whizzing bullets of the foe which sweep our soldiers down in horrid winnows, you will keep regiments of men out of the ranks which they have filled so well in former times, and that our troops will waste away like snow before the breath of spring.

Sir, these are my reasons for opposing the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. CARLILE. I do not rise to take part in this discussion, but merely to correct a statement which has been made as to a historical fact said to have existed in my own State. It is due, I think, when a statement is made in this body which is accepted in the country as true, coming from the source it does, that we should be careful to ascertain that we are correct. The facts show that the right of suffrage in a negro never existed in the State of Virginia. They were expressly excluded by law. The constitution adopted in 1776 by the government of Virginia as a State, limits the exercise of the right of suffrage to such persons as at that time had the right under the law to exercise it. The act of November, 1762, 3 George III, defines the qualifications of voters. After requiring a life estate in at least fifty acres of land, the seventh section of that act provides as follows:

"That no female, sole or covert, infant under the age of twenty-one, recusant, convict, or any person convicted in Great Britain or Ireland, during the time for which he is transported, nor any free negro, mulatto, or Indian, although such persons be freeholders, shall have a vote, or be permitted to poll, at any election of burgesses, or capable of being elected; and if any person, not being a freeholder, qualified as by this act is directed and required, shall presume to vote," &c.

This act was reenacted in 1818. The constitution of 1829 followed, which defined the qualification of voters; so that it will be seen that never in that State has the right of suffrage been conferred upon a negro.

Mr. HOWE. I would have contented myself with a silent vote against the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania now pending, but for the position taken by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. HARLAN.] I feel a little embarrassed at that. Every one knows that in the recent classification of parties the Senator from Iowa is ranked as a radical. Everybody knows that in that same classification I am ranked as a conservative. I had the pleasure the other day of seeing my name in a list with other Senators in one of the newspapers of the country surrounded with very heavy black marks. I regard that as conclusive evidence that I am conservative; and when I find myself on a question of human equality standing in advance of the Senator from Iowa, I feel bound either to step back or to apologize. It happens that upon this precise question now pending before the Senate I have been so long committed to a position antagonistic to that occupied by the Senator from Iowa that I cannot step back; and so I feel called upon to apologize. [Laughter.] I am really afraid I shall lose caste. I shall be taken out of the black list and get in among the radicals.

My apology is this: I differ from the position assumed here by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and assented to by the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Connecticut. I believe this right of suffrage to be a natural right, as much so as the right to practice law, as much so as the right to eat or the right to breathe. I agree that, notwithstanding it is a natural right, it is a right which the governing power may deprive any one of for special reasons, just as they can deprive any one of the right to practice law, or the right to practice medicine, or the right to eat, or the right to breathe; but there ought to be a sufficient reason for depriving any human being of any of these rights.

The only reason which the Senator from Pennsylvania suggests for depriving any one of the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia is that he is black. I do not and I never did consider that an adequate reason. Twice in the State of Wisconsin I have been called upon to vote on this very question, and both times I voted to extend the right of suffrage to people of this color, and both times I did it before the negro was much in fashion. I did it when black was not the popular style, [laughter,] and having done it then, I beg leave to have the advantage of the fashion, now that it has come in vogue. That is another reason why I do not wish to vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

I am willing to deprive those who are not males of the right of suffrage, because they exercise it by proxy, as we all know. Females send their votes to the ballot-box by their husbands or other male friends. We may affect to deny it, but in legislating upon grave matters like this it is better to tell the truth about it. We go there to carry votes. We are instructed to carry them before we leave home. [Laughter.] Therefore I am willing to exclude females from this privilege of going to the polls themselves. I think they ought not to vote double; and inasmuch as their husbands vote once for them they ought not to vote at all.

I am willing to exclude those who are not twenty-one years of age, because they have not a mind of their own; they are not emancipated by law anywhere. They cannot contract. They are supposed to act under the guidance of others. They are not emancipated in any sense under any law; and if they had the right to vote they would be, as they are in everything else, in all their daily avocations, executing the will of others, not their own.

Therefore I like the proposition submitted by the Senator from Maine much better than that submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I am willing to exclude those here in this District who cannot read and write from the right of suffrage, because really, if I am compelled to tell the truth, I do not think a man can be qualified to exercise this very delicate power or prerogative or privilege—whichever you call it—of supervising the whole action of the Government who cannot read the first syllable as to what the Government does. I think he is as incompetent to exercise the right of suffrage as the man who has never read Blackstone or any other work on jurisprudence is to practice law.

But the proposition submitted, of which we are told will be submitted in due time by the Senator from Maine, proposes to exclude all those living within the District who have not a taxable estate from the exercise of this right. I dissent from that idea. Persons are as much to be protected by Government as property, and there are thousands and millions in our land—I am afraid millions; thousands we know—whose personal rights they feel as precious to them as any rights of property can be; and since these rights of persons are as necessary to be protected as the rights of property, I am for giving to all those who are competent in other respects to exercise this privilege or this right, the right, notwithstanding they have not any taxable estate. With that modification, I should be glad to vote for the proposition of the Senator from Maine.

The Senator from Pennsylvania the other day spoke with considerable force and earnestness upon the necessity of our guarding the elective franchise and the dangers to which we were exposed from not guarding it. I listened to all that with a great deal of interest and with a great deal of appreciation; but I put it to him to-day whether the limitations proposed by his amendment are better, wiser, juster, or safer than those proposed by the Senator from Maine. If he says they are, I must be allowed to differ from him. I think the limitations and restrictions proposed by the Senator from Maine are much the safest, much the wisest, and the justest.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I cannot vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, nor can I ever vote for the amendment suggested by the Senator from Maine. While I am anxious to extend to colored citizens in this District, and especially to those who are bravely fighting the battles of the country, the right of suffrage, I am not willing to take that right from those who now possess it. I never have voted, I never can vote to take from any man the right, the inestimable privilege of the suffrage. Whenever I have been called upon to vote upon questions pertaining to the right of suffrage, I have ever voted against all restrictions upon that right. Sir, I see nothing in the events now passing before us, nothing in the bloody drama upon which we are now gazing with intense interest, to shake my faith in the toiling men of my country. This work of death, this appalling civil war is not the work of the poor, the ignorant sons of toil, black or white. It is the work rather of men who scorn and despise the toiling masses and the republican institutions that guard the rights and foster the interests of the poor and dependent many. These bloody scenes through which we are passing shake not my faith in the poor, the toiling masses of my countrymen, but they do increase my distrust of classes who are ever controlled by their own personal interests. The lesson taught by this rebellion of the slaveholding aristocracy is not distrust of the unprivileged many, but the privileged few.

I cannot therefore say to the white men of the District of Columbia, who are now in full possession of the achieved right of suffrage, "You can no longer vote unless you can read and write, or unless you possess estates upon which taxes may be levied." I would elevate the black man, but I can never, no, never, vote to degrade the white man. I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania to insert the word "white" into the pending bill, and against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine to restrict the right of suffrage for white men. Let the white men of the District, who now possess the right of the ballot, retain that great privilege unrestricted, though they may not be able to read and write, and do not possess property upon which taxes may be levied. Let us, if we can, extend this invaluable privilege of the ballot to colored men; if not to all, to a few, to men who are fighting the battles of our periled country, to men who possess property upon which taxes are levied and collected. Confident that we cannot extend the right of suffrage to the masses of colored men in the District upon the conditions upon which white men exercise the right, anxious to begin the work of elevation which the extension of the ballot to colored men would give to that long-oppressed race, I have prepared an amendment based mainly upon the constitution of the great State of New York, which I propose to add to the bill if the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania shall prevail, as I fear it will. I intend to propose this amendment:

But any man of color who shall have been for three years a citizen of the District, and shall have borne arms in the military or naval service of the United States, or shall have been seized and possessed of a freehold estate of the value of $250 over and above all debts and encumbrances charged thereon, and shall have been actually rated and paid a tax thereon, shall be entitled to vote at such election.

Sir, this amendment if incorporated into the bill will give the right of the ballot-box to the men who are using the cartridge-box; it will give this exalted privilege to men who possess real estate valued at $250, and there are many such. The adoption of this policy will tend to the elevation of the colored man, recognize his valor in the field, and it may incite him to secure the possession of a home, humble though it may be. At any rate the adoption of this amendment will begin the work in this District of clothing the colored citizen with the most exalted of all the rights and privileges of citizenship in America.

Mr. COWAN. I have a single word to say in reply to the argument of the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. Morrill,] in which he criticized at some length the assertion made by me that the present bill without amendment would be an innovation in this District; and, in support of that proposition, he argued, or attempted to argue, that originally in the thirteen States constituting the United States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, there was no limitation upon the right of suffrage in regard to color. It is true there was no such limitation at that time, and there was no such limitation perhaps for a very obvious reason. A question is never decided until it is raised; and it is more than probable that at that time no such question had ever been raised, and was not raised for some time after. I have taken the pains to examine the original constitutions of some of the States, and it will be found that this right of suffrage in all of them, except, perhaps, in the State which I have the honor to represent in part, Pennsylvania, was restricted by a property qualification. In that State it was only limited by the payment of taxes previous to the time the voter asserted his right. The first State to which I shall refer is Massachusetts. In her constitution—I do not know the date of it; it is not given in the book before me—

Mr. SUMNER. 1780, during the revolution-ary war.

Mr. COWAN. That constitution provided:

"That every male person being twenty-one years of age and resident in any particular town in this Commonwealth for the space of one year next preceeding, having a freehold estate within the same town, of the annual income of £3 or any estate of the value of £60, shall have a right to vote in the choice of a representative or representatives for the said town."

This bill you will observe allows all male citizens to vote without any qualification whatever, and it is therefore an innovation even upon the principle established in the times of the Revolution by Massachusetts herself.

The next State to which I refer is Rhode Island. That was governed by the charter of King Charles II, which provided that certain persons by name, "and the rest of the purchasers and free inhabitants of our island called Rhode Island," should have the right of suffrage; and I suppose that negroes were always excluded under that language.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him. He is mistaken. They were not excluded under charter, but were excluded for a period by a law of the General Assembly, the General Assembly having authority over the right of suffrage as all other rights under the charter. Under the present constitution they vote precisely the same as white people.

Mr. COWAN. I am glad to be corrected. I supposed they had always been excluded under that phrase, because by the uniform construction given to it in our courts of common law it would have excluded them.

The constitution of New York originally provided that:

"Every male inhabitant of full age who shall personally have resided within one of the counties of this State for six months immediately preceeding the day of election shall at such election be entitled to vote for representatives of the said county in the Assembly if, during the time aforesaid, he shall have been a freeholder possessing a freehold of the value of £20 within the said county, or have rented a tenement therein of the yearly value of forty shillings, and been rated and actually paid taxes to this State."

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator will observe there is no discrimination of color there.

Mr. COWAN. There is no discrimination of color any where in these ancient constitutions; and I suppose that that discrimination is not here for the reason I have stated: the question could not be decided until it was raised. It very often happens that the halls of Westminster are silent upon a particular point of law simply because nobody ever raised the point.

The constitution of New Jersey of 1776 provided that:

"That all inhabitants of this colony of full age, who are worth £50 proclamation money, clear estate in the same, and have resided in the county within which they claim to vote for twelve months immediately preceeding the election, shall be entitled to vote for representatives in Council and Assembly."

Mr. SUMNER. "All inhabitants."

Mr. COWAN. Yes, sir. All inhabitants who are worth £50. Pennsylvania provided that:

"Every freeman of the full age of twenty-one years, having resided in this State for the space of one whole year next before the day of election for representatives, and paid public taxes during that time, shall enjoy the right of an elector: Provided always, That sons of freeholders of the age of twenty-one years shall be entitled to vote although they have not paid taxes."

Which latter provision is still retained in our State. Between the ages of twenty-one and twenty-two an elector is not required to show that he has paid taxes.

I might go on and refer to the constitutions of all the remaining States, and in all it will be found that they have qualifications of various kinds, and in no one of them is the proposition stated so broadly as it is in this bill; and therefore I was warranted in saying that it was an innovation, an innovation generally; but what I mean to say now is that I think it cannot be denied that it is an innovation in this District, and one not at all palatable to the vast majority of its people; and, treating it as a distinct and separate community, with the same rights that are possessed by any other separate community, their wishes ought to be attended to in this behalf as we here profess to represent them. We are quasi their representatives and not their masters, as I understand the position we occupy. Therefore I think that this would be an innovation in every sense of the term, and as such I would deprecate it.

I have stated my objection to the amendment of the honorable Senator from Maine which he proposes to insert in the bill, because I think it would be mischievous in setting up at this time a new standard which would have the effect of excluding and taking away rights from people which they have heretofore enjoyed without question.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I propose to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I am unwilling to say by any vote of mine that a man defending his country and this city shall be excluded from the ballot-box of the city, while copperheads, traitors, who were yesterday rejoicing over the bad news that we received from the army of the Potomac, have the right of suffrage. I am unwilling to make a distinction for the one and against the other. I will vote for the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] with an amendment, and when it comes up I will propose an amendment to strike out the property qualification. I think it is proper that we should give the men who have been freed from slavery time for preparation to exercise this great right of suffrage. A property qualification is to me ridiculous. I remember reading somewhere an anecdote said to have emanated from Benjamin Franklin on this subject. In addressing an audience he said, "This property qualification is £10; a man to-day owns a jackass worth £10, and he is entitled to vote; the jackass dies to-morrow, and he is not entitled to vote; who enjoys the right of suffrage, the jackass or the man?" [Laughter.] I repeat, that to my mind a property qualification for the right of suffrage is ridiculous; it is giving the right of suffrage to the property and not to the man. So regarding it, when the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts comes up I shall move to amend it by striking out the property qualification, leaving the freedman the right to vote after he has had three years to study our institutions.

So far as I am concerned, I hope the time may come, and soon come, when we can safely extend to the colored men of our country all the political rights that we enjoy ourselves. It is known to the members of the Senate that I have believed, and have so expressed myself, that they cannot obtain real liberty with us where we are in the majority. I have therefore introduced before the Senate a proposition to separate them from us, to give them the opportunity of occupying a country where they can be the majority race and enjoy all the liberties both social and political that we enjoy. The people I represent are opposed to granting to freedmen the right of suffrage at once. It was tested before our last Legislature. We are unwilling to extend to them the right of suffrage at once, but I believe they will sustain me in voting for a proposition to give to all men over twenty-one years of age the right of suffrage after sufficient time has been allowed them to qualify themselves to exercise that right.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, when this proposition to amend this bill was under discussion the other day, I was stopped in the course of my remarks by the arrival of the hour for the order of the day, and I supposed that I was therefore entitled to the floor when the matter came up again for discussion; but I had in the mean time had assurances from sundry Senators that the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania would no doubt prevail; and that being the only object which I had in view, I did not feel myself authorized, when it was not awarded to me, to claim the floor to discuss a proposition which I had been given to understand and led to suppose would meet the general approbation of the Senate. But, sir, the indications now are that in this information I am about to be mistaken, and that in all probability this amendment will be voted down. There are various other propositions suggested here, which Senators say if this amendment should be rejected they will introduce. But, sir, the only proposition before the Senate now, as I understand it, is the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania. How these contingencies may turn out I do not know; and therefore, without proposing to detain the Senate for any considerable length of time, I propose to submit a few reflections in regard to the naked amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Shall persons of color in the District of Columbia be entitled to the right of suffrage under existing circumstances and at this time? When I was addressing the Senate the other day I had arrived at the conclusion which has been adverted to by Senators here on all sides to-day, and which seems to be agreed to on all hands, that the right of suffrage is a conventional right; that the political community where it is to be exercised have the right of fixing the rule that shall regulate it; that it is not a natural, or, more properly speaking, not an original right, and that every community, in the exercise of its own discretion, has the authority to say who shall vote and who shall not. The proposition, then, if this be correct, is whether the community of Washington city shall, in the exercise of the authority which they possess, as is admitted on all hands, extend this right of suffrage to persons of color.

Now, sir, what is the rule by which this discretion is universally regulated? What is the only wise rule by which it should be regulated? As I said the other day, there are two principal elements entering into this consideration: one is identification of interest with the political community into which a class of persons is proposed to be introduced by extending to them the right of suffrage. Let us apply that rule. It is a good one, because certainly every individual who proposes to exercise the right of suffrage in the selection of officers who shall make or execute the laws of any political community should have some interest in the welfare of that community. There should be some evidence by which his interest in the community could be recognized and demonstrated. What is the character then, I ask, of the colored population of the District of Columbia? Is it not transient? Have not many of them but recently come here, many of them to remain but a few years at furthest; perhaps here to-day and gone to-morrow; here long enough under the rule as now prescribed to acquire the right of casting a vote, but who so soon as it is cast will go away; no permanent interest in the welfare of the city; nothing to identify them with it, neither property nor kindred nor the ties and associations of friendship and society generally?

Another rule, and the fundamental rule, is, in my opinion, intelligence to understand and appreciate this great duty and fundamental right. The voter elsewhere selects the man who makes the laws. In that respect this remark has no application to this District, for it is in the anomalous condition that it has no voice in enacting the laws which govern it. Not even has it the advantage of a Territory with a Delegate upon the floor of Congress to represent its interests without any vote; but then the voter here does select the officers who are to execute the laws which Congress imposes upon the District, and the voters select the local authorities who make the ordinances that come home to the firesides and the more intimate and every-day interests of the community; and in that respect it is very material to the interests of the city that those who make the selection of the officers should have intelligence enough to do it discreetly and with propriety.

I have no doubt that if this amendment be adopted it will exclude from the polls a number of persons of color just as well qualified to exercise the right of suffrage as many white men in the District. Nay, sir, I will go further, and say that I have no doubt, if this amendment be adopted, it will exclude from the exercise of the right of suffrage many persons of color who are better qualified to exercise that right than many white men in the District who now have a right to vote. But, sir, in the regulations of Government in every department there must be general rules, and therefore individual instances of inequality and hardship must necessarily occur. The fact is that there are many white persons excluded under the age of twenty-one years who are much better qualified to exercise the right of suffrage discreetly and judiciously than many who are over the age of twenty-one years who do now exercise that right. But there must necessarily be some general rule by which this matter is regulated, for it is impossible to graduate the qualification of the voter to meet every contingency.

This amendment, if it be adopted, will exclude all persons of color from exercising the right of suffrage at this time in the city of Washington. Upon the whole, however, would not that be an advantage to the city? What is the general character of that class of population in the District of Columbia? Who are they? Whence came they? It was well remarked a while ago by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. TEN Eyck], that their abject condition was not their own fault, and that reproach for it did not attach to them, but more properly belonged to the institutions that have kept them in a state of degradation; but that does not alter the fact that they are ignorant, that they are servile, and in a majority of cases disqualified for the intelligent and judicious discharge of the great offices of freemen. They never read our Constitution. They cannot read our Constitution. They have not the first elementary idea of constitutional law or constitutional obligation. That such is the fact no Senator on this floor, I undertake to say, will candidly deny. And yet, sir, it is proposed to extend the right of suffrage to a class in this community of that character, of that character by no fault of their own, but the fact is they are nevertheless of that character.

It is gravely proposed to extend the right of suffrage in this city to a large number of persons in that condition of ignorance and disqualification. Now, sir, what is the number of the colored population in the District of Columbia? How many were lately emancipated resident there, lifted up out of the degradation of their bondage and placed on the platform of freedom, but nevertheless as ignorant to-day as they were when the manacles first fell from their limbs, as incompetent to exercise judiciously and discreetly the right of suffrage, as incapable of saying who is and who is not a proper man to execute the laws of this city as they were when they were slaves? I ask again, what is the number of that class of population in this District? It is now large, and it is growing larger every day. Refugees from Virginia, refugees from Maryland, from all the slaveholding counties around us, are congregating here in the District of Columbia, and if the proportionate increase of colored population be as great during the ensuing five or six years as it has been for the last two years, one half of the population of this District at the end of that term will be colored population, and one half of the voters of this District will be colored voters if the proposed amendment fail; men who never read your Constitution, men who have not the first idea of law or liberty regulated by law. Is it to this class of population that you propose to extend the right of suffrage? Are the destinies and welfare of this great seat of the national Government to be committed to such custody?

Sir, as I have said already, suffrage is not a natural right. The persons of color here have no natural claim to it. They have no original right to it. The right exists, properly speaking, in the people of the District; but by the law as it actually exists Congress has the power to say who shall and who shall not exercise the right of suffrage. Then let us be governed by the principles of a sound discretion, and only extend this great fundamental privilege of republican liberty to those who are by habit and education capable of exercising it judiciously. That is the ground on which I place my vote. It is not because I am not friendly to the negro race. I take it upon me to repel any such insinuation. It may do for Senators to talk of liberty; they may impugn the motives of those who favor this amendment. Sir, against this talk about liberty I can (since I am in a manner compelled to do so) point to more substantial evidences of my regard for the principles of freedom. I can point to men and women whose shackles have been broken from their limbs by the means earned by my own labor, and who are walking God's earth under the sunlight of heaven, freemen to-day, that never else had been freemen. I say, sir, it is easy for Senators thus to talk about liberty; but until Senators who cast their insinuations can meet me and say that they too have given liberty to slaves by their own means and instrumentality to the same extent, I shall disregard their reproaches and their rebukes.

I am opposed to this measure on another ground, and that is, upon the ground of the welfare of the emancipated slave himself. The time may come, and I hope it will come, when it may be prudent to extend the right of suffrage to him; but is there no danger to the emancipated freeman himself by too much haste in this measure? Will there not be a liability of injuring his interests in the ultimate result? It will not do to ignore the fact that there is a prejudice against him; and that when he shall be elevated to the condition of equality at the polls with the white man, in whose bosom this prejudice, whether justly or unjustly, exists, it will bring down on him the hostility of those who entertain such prejudices. Will he be as likely to be received as cheerfully into the community as if he were to come simply as a freedman, and abide his time until he is qualified to exercise the right of suffrage? What will probably be the result of extending this great right to him too early? He will be marked at every step he takes. Those in whose bosoms this prejudice exists—and it is almost universal, let me assure you—will mark and magnify every failure and fault he commits in the exercise of this right, every impropriety in the conduct of the colored voter; and if at last the evils of extending the right of suffrage to this ignorant population become apparent and intolerable, as I think they will, then these enemies of the African and the enemies of his freedom will point the finger of scorn, and say, "See there, we admonished you that such would be the result; it is a failure, as we predicted"—a failure, however, because the enterprise was commenced too soon, because the privilege was conferred upon him before he was prepared to appreciate it and to discharge the duties it involved faithfully and judiciously. The failure will demand a remedy, and the result will be, perhaps, under the operation of public opinion, that the precocious voter will be remitted again to the disfranchisement from which he was inopportunistly elevated; the failure, in short, will be regarded as attestation and demonstration of the fact that the negro is incurably incompetent to be a trustworthy voter.

But, sir, I am extending my remarks further than I intended. I merely rose for the purpose of suggesting to Senators the propriety, in the exercise of the right which we all acknowledge belongs to us, of extending or withholding this privilege from this new class of persons whom it is proposed to introduce into the body-politic, of bestowing this franchise only upon those who are qualified to exercise it. That is the true rule. As a general rule the colored race in the District of Columbia are grossly ignorant, and therefore incompetent to discharge the true functions of a voter; and therefore it would be unwise to confer on him the privilege.

My friend from Minnesota has mentioned a case of hardship. There are soldiers, he says, in the Army to-day from this District, pouring out their blood in defense of liberty. I understood that they were held in reserve down on the Rapidan the other day. It may be, however, that they will yet pour out their blood; and if they are capable men, intelligent men, competent to understand how to exercise the right of suffrage, it would be, I admit, a little hard to withhold it from them; but, sir, let me tell you that to-day, as the Senator from New Jersey has intimated, there are more white persons in the Army of the United States deprived of the right of suffrage than there are negroes there. This day, sir, there are, I suppose, one hundred thousand of our brave soldiers under twenty-one years of age dying and ready to die, who have not the authority or the right to exercise this great privilege. Why? Because it became necessary to fix some rule which should limit the exercise of the right, and the age of twenty-one years has been prescribed. It is supposed that when white males arrive at the age of twenty-one years they will have attained discretion and education and understanding sufficient to exercise the right judiciously. All I wish is to postpone the time when the right of suffrage shall be given to the colored race until they arrive, as it were, at twenty-one years of age—I mean to say at a period of mental and moral improvement and discretion when they shall be able to vote understandingly and judiciously.

Sir, we have been told of the danger of reaction, and it has been said that unless we elevate the negro at once up to the true dignity and stature of a freeman there will probably be a reaction against his elevation. Sir, I have not so read human history; I do not so understand human nature; I have not so observed the operation of public sentiment. The danger of reaction, in my judgment, lies in another quarter. It lies in pushing even a good principle too fast. It lies in thrusting it upon public sentiment when the public sentiment is not willing to receive it; and all history and all philosophy show that the danger of reaction is not in not going fast enough, but in going too fast and too far. This fact has often been verified in politics and in morals, as well as in the physical world. History is full of the tendency of "extremes beget extremes." It would be well, I think, to observe this old but valuable maxim; and statesmen and Senators here would do well in this revolutionary hour of our experience to pay some heed to its lessons written upon every page of human history. In the religious world, in the political world, in the physical world, in every department of society, and in every interest of humanity we have received greater detriment from the reaction of extreme hurried and radical policies and action than from any and all the supposed evil tendencies of a conservative progress and prudent and carefully considered advancement. Rashness has ruined many a good cause, and many a good man. It is never wise to disregard the lessons of experience.

Take the case of France for illustration, which just now occurs to me. Prior to the Revolution her people through the length and breadth of the kingdom were crushed into the dust under the tyranny that rested upon her bosom; but human nature could not endure it, and revolted at last. She aroused herself from her lethargy; she threw off the shackles that bound her; but she did not stop at the proper point. Released from the despotism that had crushed her to earth, and intoxicated with the spirit of her new-born liberty, she swung over to the other extreme of revolutionary license and revolutionary licentiousness; and the ignorant mob, suddenly endowed with the privileges of freemen, suddenly clothed with the very franchise which it is now proposed to confer on the still more ignorant negro, instead of establishing liberty upon a rational and permanent basis, plunged the country into the wildest and bloodiest disorders that ever afflicted a nation. What then? This was the first reaction, the extreme result of a revolt against extreme tyranny. But what then? The people sought for a refuge from the ever-smoking guillotine reeking with blood, from the ever-groaning dungeons filled with the victims of mobocratic violence, from the licentiousness of infidelity, from all the intolerable disorders of the State. The reaction began. The pendulum swung back toward the old dynasty. First they made a consul, then an emperor, and finally came back the old Bourbon, with all the ingrained, hereditary despotism of a thousand years, and sat down again on the throne of his ancestors reestablished on the crushed liberties of the people.

That was one instance of reaction, and of the result of reaction from extreme measures. It is only one illustration out of a thousand; and God knows that wise and thoughtful men must see in our own times most portentous tendencies toward these extremes in our own country; and now, surely, is not the time when we should throw into the political caldron a mass of ignorant, servile population even in this District, that will become the tool and toy of demagogues and time-servers.

Sir, it will not do to tell me that the exercise of this right of suffrage in some of the free States where colored persons have the privilege of voting works no evil. The free negroes there are men of education to some extent; they have grown up in the midst of free institutions and subject to their influence, and they are in number but as an atom in the great mass. But when you come to a community full of contrabands, utterly ignorant, utterly incapable of understanding the nature and duty of suffrage, and who compose a fourth, or it may be ere long a half, of the entire community, it is a very different matter. Sir, you cannot wipe out the servile instincts of the emancipated slave by a dash of the pen. He is as ignorant to-day as he was yesterday before he was emancipated; as incapable to-day as he was yesterday of exercising this great franchise of a freeman. You cannot elevate this mass of ignorant persons in our community to the true platform of republican equality and liberty by a simple statute of Congress. It will take time; it will take education; it will take the influences of religion and of science and of habits of social equality, before they will be competent guardians of this great principle of free institutions.

Mr. President, I ought, perhaps, to ask pardon of the Senate for detaining them so long on a matter which it was not my intention to discuss at such length; but I must nevertheless respond to the suggestion of the honorable Senator from New Jersey. Coming from a border State, from the border State that has the proud right to claim to be the first portion of the States in rebellion to rescue herself from its power, whose soil drank the first blood shed in defense of our old flag, which was the first State to emancipate her slaves; coming from that State, and having myself, I say it with all humility, taken an earnest part in accomplishing that result, I warn Senators, I beseech them, not to urge this measure upon us. If they do they will create a public sentiment and a public excitement along the border States, the effects of which they can little anticipate to-day; and as the honorable Senator from New Jersey said, you cannot afford, in this hour of our country's peril, to endanger the full united force and influence of the Union sentiment everywhere. I beseech you, therefore, not to press this matter, not to defeat the amendment proposed.

Sir, when our white men are dying by thousands in defense of their country, and when the fate of the nation is trembling in the balance, why should we disturb the equanimity of the whole nation, as this question will through its moral influences, by discussing whether or not a few contrabands, a few emancipated slaves, shall now have the right of suffrage in the District of Columbia? Let us postpone it till the proper time, until they are qualified to exercise it, and then I shall have no objection. But, sir, as I reflect on this subject many considerations crowd upon my mind. This is a fundamental right; it lies at the foundation of republican institutions; and let me ask you where was there a community or a State in this Union where the people did not regulate the right for themselves? Shall we, therefore, coming from the various quarters of this country, with no interest in common with the people of the District of Columbia, we who are not to be affected for weal or for woe by this legislation, undertake, without knowing that the will of the people of this District is in favor of it, to fix the right of suffrage for them by admitting negroes to its enjoyment? Sir, this right belongs naturally and fundamentally to the people where the franchise is to be exercised. Shall we, therefore, assume to say who shall be endowed with it here? Shall we, without any petitions from the people of this District, without anything before the Senate to indicate that this bill, in any of its parts, is required by the people of this District, undertake to say of our own volition that we will impose upon them a provision which is odious to them and will, in my estimation, be disastrous in its results not only here but in its influence on popular opinion everywhere in this nation?

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, slavery dies hard. It now stands front to front with our embattled armies, still holding them in check. It dies hard on the battle-field. It dies hard in the Senate Chamber. Sir, we have been compelled during this session to listen to various defenses of slavery, sometimes in its most offensive forms. Slave-hunting has been openly vindicated on this floor. And now, to-day the exclusion of colored persons from the electoral franchise, simply on account of color, has been openly vindicated, and the Senator from West Virginia, newly introduced into this Chamber from a State born of freedom, rises here to uphold slavery in one of its meanest products.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, I cannot pass that assertion without giving it an unequivocal, categorical denial. I have not vindicated slavery in any of its aspects. I said to the Senator, what perhaps he did not hear before, that when he has liberated by the sweat of his brow as many slaves as I have, he can get up and make such a remark in regard to me.

Mr. SUMNER. I said, sir, that the Senator vindicated slavery in one of its meanest products. I repeat what I said. The Senator has spoken, I do not know how long by the clock, to vindicate an odious prejudice bequeathed by slavery, having its origin in slavery, and in nothing else. Had slavery never existed in this country there would have been no such prejudice as that of which the Senator now makes himself the representative. Far better would it have been for that Senator, who comes into this Chamber as a representative of a newly made free State, had he surrendered himself generously to the sentiment in which his new State had its birth. But instead of that he comes forward and labors with un-wonted earnestness to fasten upon the national capital something of that odious character which is derived from slavery. The Senator says he has not vindicated slavery. He has not used the word; but he has vindicated the thing in one of its most odious features. He seeks to blast a whole race; and why? Merely on account of a distinction of color! Would he have ever thought of proposing such an injustice but for the prejudices nursed by slavery? Had not slavery existed would any such idea ever have found place in a Senator naturally so generous and humane? No, Sir, he spoke with the voice of slavery, which he cannot yet forget. He spoke under the unhappy and disturbing influences which slavery has left in his mind.

Now, sir, I am against slavery wherever it shows itself, whatever form it may take. I am against slavery when I am compelled to meet it directly, and I am against slavery in its products and in its offspring. I am against slavery when I am compelled to meet the beast outright, or when I am compelled to meet only its tail. The prejudices of which the Senator from West Virginia has made himself the representative to-day, permit me to say, are nothing but the tail of slavery. Unhappily, while we have succeeded in abolishing slavery in this District, we have not yet abolished the tail; and the tail has representatives in the Senate Chamber as the beast once had representatives in the Senate Chamber.

We have been reminded more than once that we are engaged in a fearful conflict. The Senator over the way [Mr. WILLEY] has reminded us of it. Senators nearer to me have reminded us of it. This is too true; and now, as that conflict lowers upon us, I invoke the spirit of our fathers. They went forth to battle with the Declaration of Independence on their lips. They solemnly declared that all men were born equal, entitled to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. They did not introduce any discrimination of color into that sacred text; nor did they introduce any discrimination of color into the contemporary Articles of Confederation; nor again did they introduce any discrimination of color into the Constitution of the United States, which was the work of their hands. I am content now to be guided by their great example. As they went forth to meet the enemy they placed themselves under the protection of the God of justice. Let us imitate their example.

I had not intended to say a word on this occasion, but I could not listen to the remarks of the Senator from West Virginia, so harsh and unfeeling toward a whole race, belonging to the human family, like himself, without interposing a solemn protest.

Since this debate began I have sent to the Law Library for a volume which contains the authoritative words of a very eminent southern magistrate, a slaveholder, with regard to the electoral franchise. It has been a question in what States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution colored persons enjoyed this franchise. I say nothing now about the more northern States; but there is a State which has been referred to, with regard to which there is peculiar evidence, I mean North Carolina. The enjoyment of the electoral franchise by colored persons in that State for a long time after the Constitution was not a matter of doubt. Her most eminent magistrate, the late Chief Justice Gaston, accomplished as a jurist and as a man, has laid down the law of his State on that subject in most emphatic words. Giving the opinion of the supreme court of North Carolina in the case of The State vs. Manuel (4 Devaux's and Battle's Reports, page 20) he said:

"Slaves manumitted here became freemen, and therefore, if born within North Carolina, are citizens of North Carolina, and all free persons born within the State are born citizens of the State. The Constitution extended the elective franchise to every freeman who had arrived at the age of twenty-one and paid a public tax; and it is a matter of universal notoriety that, under it, free persons, without regard to color, claimed and exercised the franchise, until it was taken from free men of color a few years since by our amended Constitution."

There is still another case, that of The State vs. Newcomb, (5 Iredell's Reports, page 253,) which was decided in 1844, where the supreme court of North Carolina, after referring to the opinion of Chief Justice Gaston from which I have just read, said:

"That case underwent a very laborious investigation, both by the bar and the bench. The case was brought here by appeal, and was felt to be one of great importance in principle. It was considered with an anxiety and care worthy of the principle involved, and which give it a controlling influence and authority on all questions of a similar character."

Therefore not hastily or carelessly did the supreme court of North Carolina declare colored persons to be electors under the State constitution.

That was the constitutional law of the State of North Carolina fashioned by our fathers under the influence of the Declaration of Independence. Sir, I am content with that law. I do not think that the Senator from Pennsylvania, though he represents a northern State, can mend that law from a slave State. Nor do I think that any of us on this floor can feel humbled if our judgment is postponed to that of Chief Justice Gaston of North Carolina, who did not hesitate to declare positively that constitutional law of human rights, by virtue of which colored persons are citizens. But if they are citizens how can you deny to them the electoral franchise?

I am content to leave the question here. I will add that, as I understand the subject now, I shall deem it my duty to vote against all propositions creating any discrimination of color. At this moment of revolution, when our country needs the blessings of Almighty God and the strong arms of all her children, this is not the time for us solemnly to enact an injustice. In duty to our country and in duty to God, I plead now against any such thing. We must be against slavery in its original shape, and in all its brood of prejudice and error.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, I must beg the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments, while I give a more explicit contradiction to the allegation of the Senator from Massachusetts, when he said that I was the advocate of slavery in any form, whether body, soul, or "tail," to use the classical and senatorial language of the distinguished Senator. My whole life is a standing contradiction of that allegation. Before I was out of my teens, in my humble, puerile efforts to put myself in print, I stood upon the record as an essayist arrayed against the institution of slavery. From that day to this I have been opposed to it not only in principle but, as I have already stated—perhaps I had better not have adverted to it—in fact. While the honorable Senator, with his great abilities, and learning, and eloquence, has been talking about the freedom of slaves, I have been actually setting slaves free. How many has he set free? And yet, sir, that honorable Senator tells me that I am the advocate of slavery! When he gets his other law in force, making persons of color witnesses in the Federal courts, I can bring half a dozen negroes, liberated by my own personal means, to testify that I am a better emancipationist than he is.

But, sir, I wish in addition to show the inconsistency of the Senator's own argument for a moment. Our fathers, he says, went to battle with the Declaration of Independence upon their lips; and he calls upon us to-day to carry the principles of that instrument into effect. But yet, sir, the author of that Declaration of Independence and the leading lights whose luster that Declaration of Independence reflects, were also the authors of the Virginia constitution, which prohibited every white man in that Commonwealth from voting who did not own fifty acres of land or a lot in some city, thereby disfranchising in the old Commonwealth of Virginia at one time more than half the white persons over twenty-one years of age. Why did they do it? Because in the exercise of the very right which I claim we ought to exercise here, to fix the rule judiciously, they thought the right should be restricted in that way. And yet the Senator has no word of reproach for them!

Why did he pass over the honorable and distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] to rebuke me, when the very amendment of the Senator from Maine which he proposes as a substitute for that under consideration will disfranchise more white men in the city to-day than there are negroes to whom it will give the right of suffrage? Why, sir, it just comes back to this, that every community has the authority to fix the time when and the terms upon which persons shall be allowed to be introduced into the body-politic and to exercise this great privilege. I did not say the time would never come when this right should be exercised by colored persons.

I intimated that the time probably would come; and whenever the community, which alone has the authority to say who shall compose a portion of that community, sees proper to allow persons of color to vote, I shall have no objection. All I undertake to say now here is, that without any knowledge of what the wishes of the people in the city of Washington are, we should be governed by the principles of discretion which should actuate every man, it seems to me, in the ordinary transactions of life, and not intrust to the agency of persons incompetent to execute it judiciously the great interests which would be involved in the extension of the right of suffrage to persons of color in this District. If the time shall come when they will be educated, and when they will understand and appreciate the privilege, and exercise it judiciously, I shall have no objection, most assuredly, to its being conferred on them.

Mr. WILSON. It is very important to have an executive session to-day.

Several SENATORS. Let us vote on this bill.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senate is ready to vote, I shall not interpose; but we have some very important business to do in executive session, which should be attended to.

Mr. CONNESS. I merely rise to suggest that I think there will be no more discussion, and I hope we shall get done with this subject; otherwise we shall consume day after day with it to the exclusion of other business.

Mr. COWAN. I have a very few words to say, Mr. President, and I am free to declare that those which I shall say will be said "more in sorrow than in anger." I have waited patiently for a long time, but have felt offended and hurt at the tone which is continually assumed in debate here on the part of certain gentlemen who profess to be orthodox par excellence on this subject of human freedom. I should like to know by what warrant the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] or any other Senator declares upon this floor that when I and the Senator from West Virginia and other Senators oppose the extension of the electoral franchise to negroes we are advocating slavery. Is that the language to be used in the Senate of the United States, where it is supposed that of all other places in the country there is to be least of buncombe, least of claptrap, least of that which is calculated to deceive the idle and the gaping crowd? Does the Senator from Massachusetts or any other Senator on this floor however long he may have labored in this cause and however many and violent speeches he may have made on the subject of slavery, profess to be more opposed to human slavery than we are? Sir, the assumption is idle and ridiculous, and it only betokens weakness when it is asserted.

"Slavery dies hard." Then "slave-hunting dies hard," and "West Virginia, the offspring of the sentiment of freedom," is to put herself under the guidance of the Senator from Massachusetts, subjugate her will to his, say what he desires her to say, vote as he desires her to vote, and then she will be in the safe line of precedent!

Mr. SUMNER. Vote for freedom: that is all.

Mr. COWAN. Vote for freedom, Mr. President! What is freedom? I have no objection on this floor that any Senator may take my arguments and combat them. He may make them absurd if he pleases. I have no objection to the reductio ad absurdum. He may make them ridiculous. He may make them fallacious. But, sir, when any man rises here and assails the motive, the intention, the secret purpose which moves a Senator in this body to take his position and assume the ground that he does assume, then I say that if that Senator is not out of order under the rules of the Senate, he is out of order as among gentlemen.

Mr. SUMNER. I did not assail the Senator's motives at all: I made no allusion to the Senator except generally.

Mr. COWAN. I hope that hereafter the Senator from Massachusetts and all other Senators will allow that when we do not happen to believe in all the articles of the creed of that school which calls itself radical on this floor, we are not to be set down as rogues and knaves and villains advocating and desiring to advocate the cause of the enemies of the country. Can we not be treated at least with that common decency that is due from one gentleman to another in the ordinary intercourse of society?

And, sir, I have another word to say in that respect. That may be done here; but it is never done upon the avenue, it is never done out of doors in our outside walks.

Now, sir, one word further. Mr. President, I am as much in favor of human freedom and the universality of human freedom everywhere as the Senator from Massachusetts dare be; but does he suppose that when I advocate that sentiment I ignore all history, all science, all fact? Does he mean to assert upon this floor that there is no distinction between the Indo-European and the Mongolian races of men? Does he suppose there is no distinction between the Caucasian race and the Malay and the African? Would he admit to the enjoyment of the electoral franchise the inhabitants of New Zealand or of Australia, were they to come here? Has he ever advocated the admission of our North American Indians to the right of suffrage? He says that the objection that we have to negroes voting is an "odious prejudice." Has the gentleman a wife, has he a daughter? If he have, would he not recognize this thing which he calls an "odious prejudice," and would he suppose that he was to be arraigned for his taste in that respect? We cannot ignore the facts of tribal antipathy; we must recognize them; and, Mr. President, we must legislate too with an eye to them. I would be willing, and have been willing—and I feel perhaps as little of them as any other man—to override these prejudices, but they are there, they exist as a fact, and they will exist as a fact despite all our legislation and all our efforts to smelt down in one great whole the mass of the human family. Is a man to be denounced, is a man to be said to be against his country and in favor of an obnoxious institution of his country, because he suggests these difficulties in a question of this kind?

Now, Mr. President, I have another word here to say to gentlemen who advocate the introduction of these new things, who are sighing for these reforms. They are in favor of the perpetuation of the power of the present Administration or of the party which wields that power. I suppose nobody will deny that. By what tenure do you hold that power? From the people. The honorable Senator represents Massachusetts; and when I desire to know the will of Massachusetts, I will listen with the greatest deference to the utterances of the Senator from Massachusetts. He is one of her accredited organs upon this floor; and I have never, and I trust that I never shall rise here and contradict or deny what he may choose to assert about the sentiments of her people; and I trust, Mr. President, that so long as he and I act together in the same political organization I will never be unkind enough, unjust enough, selfish enough to attempt to thrust in his way in his State that which would be calculated to destroy the political power which his party now enjoys. Will he not yield that to me? Will he not yield it to the honorable Senator from West Virginia? Is this Government a Government of the people or not? Are we the representatives here of the sentiment of the people, or not? Are we here to reflect their opinions, or are we not? Are we to go out into the wide realms of speculation and think and do for ourselves as we deem fit? If that is to be the rule, then I can understand and appreciate the motives which move the Senator from Massachusetts.

But, sir, what I was going to say was this: if he and those of his friends who insist on this innovation in this District, who insist upon extending the mantle of the elective franchise until it is broad enough to cover the negro, expect this fall to perpetuate the power of this Administration and of the party which supports it, they will be very much mistaken if they resort to measures of this kind, whatever Massachusetts may think, whatever Minnesota may think, whatever those people may think who have not more than one or two negroes at most in an election district, whatever those people may think who know nothing about a community surcharged with an idle, dissolute, vicious, ignorant negro population just emerged from slavery, to enjoy the high prerogatives of freedom, and the broad political rights which we enjoy alongside of us.

I beg Senators to think of this. If you love your country, if you believe that in our hands and the hands of our party alone the power of the country can be wielded to save it, to restore the Union and to put down the rebellion, I beg of you do not throw firebrands of this kind among us, do not send these foxes into our standing corn, because if you do you will reap the rewards, and they will be reaped in sorrow.

How does this question stand? Take the State of New York. A few days ago she voted broadly on this question, and what was the consequence? Out of six hundred thousand votes but about seven or eight thousand were for admitting negroes to the right of free suffrage. If I am mistaken as to facts, I stand ready to be corrected. Take the State of Illinois, which it is quite as necessary that you should carry as that you should carry New York, and what was the consequence there? The honorable Senator ignores the fact of tribal antipathy. What was the result of the vote in Illinois two years ago, where that "odious prejudice" of race prevailed to such an extent that about ninety thousand of a majority of the citizens of Illinois voted, not that the negro should not vote, but that the negro should not set his foot upon her soil. Whether this is right or wrong is not the question; but representing the people, as wise and prudent men desiring to do the best we can here for the people, are we not to take this into the account? Are we to ignore this "odious prejudice" that brought about that state of things in Illinois? Put the vote in my State to-day, and I would not be answerable for the result in Pennsylvania. I may safely say that there would be over one hundred thousand of a majority against this proposition; and my people are as liberal, as beneficent, as humane, and, as is evidenced by their earliest charter, their earliest constitution, and the constitutions from that day to this, as much in favor of the broadest exercise of human liberty as any other State in the Union. And yet, sir, would she agree to give away this inestimable privilege to negroes, who, in the language of the honorable Senator from Iowa, [Mr. HARKLAY,] who, I am free to say, although I have often differed from him, always speaks sense, always speaks moderation, always speaks reason, and reason is triumphant to-day in what he says, who, in his language, have just emerged from slavery; and I am told his State has refused the same boon.

Mr. President, can we not meet on this floor upon terms of equality? Are our motives to be assailed and impugned here? Is it the fact that because we cannot agree upon details we are to be assailed as slave-hunters, and as the last relics of slavery which refuse under the trampling of this modern march of revolution to give up the last breath? Is that to be the case? I trust not. I trust honorable Senators will see this in another light. Why should not I and why should not my friend from West Virginia and my friend from New Jersey be quite as much interested in the safety, in the liberty, and in the happiness of the American people as my friend from Massachusetts or my friend from Minnesota? Can any man give a reason? I put it to my friend from Minnesota, who bases himself upon reason, can he give any reason for it? We have wives, children, kindred, and ties, property, hopes, and aspirations. Are we to give up all these, trample them under foot, and, blindly and without any cause whatever, jump into the jaws of Tophet? To me the assertion is absurd, the assumption is wrong; I had almost characterized it by a harsher term, but I am very well aware that from the license of debate, and from the habit men get into, it too frequently happens that the argument is forgotten and the speaker is assailed. What matter is it to me if the Senator from Massachusetts in past times had covered himself with sins and enormities, if peccadilloes thick clustered about his head, out of which I could split the groundlings, if you please, what has that to do with his argument? Has the argument been met in this case? Has it been attempted to be shown by anybody that these negroes just emerged from slavery are the fit recipients of the political power of the community? Is there a Senator present here who does not know that the surplus virtue of this community is now burdened with just about as much as it can carry, by having to overcome the vicious influences of the bad white men who are among us? Is that surplus virtue which has so far carried along the vicious element, and neutralized it, to be burdened again with the negro element? If the honorable Senator had satisied me that these were wise men, that they were prudent men—and, above all, that they were independent men—which, perhaps, is the scarcest kind of man upon the earth at this present speaking—then I would agree to extend to them the franchise with all my heart, and hope that it would be a healthy infusion into the mass of our electors. That, however, is not the question.

But it is said that these men are black, and therefore they are excluded. Mr. President, I would exclude no man simply for the reason that he is black. I exclude a black man because black is the evidence that he is an inferior man, of inferior education, of inferior means of knowledge, and perhaps he has been a slave. It is not because he happens to be black; that is not the reason of it; but it is because there is evidence in that color of his condition.

I have further, too, admitted on this floor over and over again that I have no doubt in the world there are many black men who are quite as well and much better qualified to exercise this right of the electoral franchise than many of our white men; but how are you to select them? How are you to pick them out? The honorable Senator from Maine, feeling the importance of this peculiar difficulty in the way of the operation of the bill, has invented a mode by which he proposes to separate the wheat from the tares, to winnow the grain from the chaff; and he says, "Admit all those who can read and write." I am not so certain that I would not close in with that proposition at some future day. At this day, however, I am decidedly of opinion with the honorable Senator from New Jersey who said that that involves the proposition not of conferring privileges but of taking them away; and when you go out to canvass among the people you meet this phrase constantly in your teeth, "You gave the right to negroes to vote, and you took it away from white men." Suppose it is an "odious prejudice." If it be an "odious prejudice" I would ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts how he, with all his power and all his learning and all his eloquence, would answer that upon the stump? How would he go into a neighborhood and argue down a prejudice? Everybody knows that the peculiar characteristic of a prejudice is that it will not down at the bidding of either eloquence or argument. And yet we of the border States, we of those States which will have to bear, if the struggle comes, the brunt of it, are to be loaded with all these issues; we are to be driven into the canvass under all these disadvantages; and we are expected to carry out the flag of the present Administration or of its party triumphant from the contest. Mr. President, I beg gentlemen to reflect for one moment upon the difficulties and the danger of putting us into that category. Look at my own State. What is the difference between the two great parties there? What was the difference last fall? Fifteen thousand. Divide that fifteen thousand by two, and then you can ascertain how many men we must lose, or how many men the other side must gain, in order to throw victory into the other scale.

Mr. President, I have from the beginning protested against new issues. When this rebellion broke out, it was our business to make war, and put it down by war. It was our business to present to the loyal people of the North that single issue, war or separation, war or a dissolution of the Union; and I say that in my judgment, if we had stood upon that single idea, if we had presented that single issue and let all other things abide, we should be to-day in a hundred times better position than we are now, and I might say, too, that to-day we should have been in a hundred times better position in regard to that peculiar institution, which some of our friends are so anxious to have destroyed, than we are to-day.

What has been the consequence? From what shrub, from what source, from what flower does the copperhead distill his venom? Where does he get the poison with which he infects the community? I was going to say, ask the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL.] He derives his capital, he extracts his noxious juices from these side issues which we get up here without any cause or any hope of reward whatever, and which never have done us any good and never will do so. This is one of them. Of what great benefit would it be to this nation that a few ignorant negroes in the District of Columbia should exercise, or, I beg pardon, should abuse the elective franchise, if the country is to be lost and the Union is to be dissolved, and all the elements of this empire let loose to take such direction as their weight may incline them to take? Of what avail, I say, would that be? And yet this great result is put in peril by introducing constantly this and cognate schemes which are of the most minute importance when thrown into the great scale.

Mr. President, I speak warmly upon this subject. I have a right to speak warmly upon it. I have sat here day after day, week after week, and month after month, in the hope that at last this nation would turn itself wholly, mentally, physically, and morally upon the great issue which is to be fought to-day, to-morrow, and next day, down, if you please, on the banks of the Rapidan. Is there a man upon the earth so insensate and so foolish as not to know that if we fail in that great battle, if we fail in putting down this rebellion, all this that we are doing is the merest idle nonsense which the world has ever seen, and nonsense, too, which will come back to haunt us and disgrace us to the last day of our lives?

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question here?

Mr. COWAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask him whether it is nonsense for the Government of the United States to defend its honor, at any expense, against a wicked and causeless rebellion? Is that nonsense?

Mr. COWAN. I answer emphatically, it is not. It is the thing I desire to have done, and I want neither the honorable Senator from Michigan nor any other Senator to attempt to turn the Government aside from the defense of its honor and its territory and its authority and its jurisdiction by attempting to settle whether a few ragged, idle, dissolute, ignorant negroes, incompetent, unqualified, shall vote in the District of Columbia.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts the other day alluded to a most extraordinary scene at the close of our revolutionary struggle, when the whole country was jubilant, when all hearts were swelling, when every soul was exultant over the success of our Revolution, and John Hook came in and put in a claim for beef, beef, beef. I hope that the Senator will not charge me with stealing his thunder, but that he will excuse me for imitating his example. All that I desire here is that the intent of the nation, the will of the nation, the soul of it, its force shall not be diverted away from the great end and object of putting down this rebellion by war, by any such cry as that which is raised by this bill, Suffrage for negroes, suffrage for negroes, suffrage for negroes—quite as ridiculous to me as that "beef, beef, beef," of John Hook.

I would have the whole energy of the nation bend to it. I would not allow a single stray thought to diverge from the main line which leads directly to the "Wilderness" to-day. I would not sit here and manufacture capital for ignorant, sore-headed, disaffected politicians to worry us at the next fall elections. I would as carefully eschew that as I would eschew the putting of imperfect ammunition into the cartridge-box of the soldier. Everything that we have, everything that we hope for, everything that we expect to be, all the glorious memories of the past, all the bright anticipations of the future, lie in that one word war, successful war. I would not divert away a single brain from that issue; I would not waste a single ounce of strength; I would not take away a single dollar, or a single musket, or a single cartridge; but devote them all to war, war, war, until victory crowns the war, and our eagles come back triumphant. Then if there are rewards to make, if there are meritorious soldiers to be rewarded, if there are troops in the field which have sustained our great and glorious old flag and who deserve to have broad privileges granted to them, mark me, sir, no man shall be before me in the performance of that pleasing task. But now, when as has been said here the very fate of the contest is trembling in the balance, when no man knows, when no man dares predict the final result, to throw in an element of discord, to throw in the face of a patriot something which in his own State will cause him to despair even of a single vote, looks to me very foolish. For my part, though I have all deference and respect for other men's opinions, I cannot conceive of anything which to me looks so foolish and so fatal.

Mr. President, I have reflected upon no one, I have rebuked no one except in so far as I think certain Senators on this floor sometimes in the strength of their convictions, in the force of their opinions, use what seem to me unjustifiable modes of putting down their adversaries. I think my venerable friend from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] at one time called it "the crack of the whip" of the majority over him. I hope there will be an end of that. Why should there not be? Is there a man on this floor that desires for a moment an empty triumph over an adversary? Is there a man upon this floor who desires for a moment that it should go forth in the newspapers that he had said a smart thing of his antagonist, that he had said a cutting thing, that he had said that thing which would wound, or hurt, or silence, or if you please paralyze the free brain of an antagonist? Surely not, Mr. President. Then I suggest what I have meant to suggest from the beginning, and what I rose simply to suggest, that our opinions may be free, that our arguments, if they be arguments, may be met, that our past lives, our persons, whatever relates to the person, may be kept out from the discussions in this Chamber; and then if we confine ourselves to what I think is the legitimate duty of the hour, war, and war only, the North will be a unit, or so nearly a unit that its differences will sink into nothing and will be inappreciable, and then and then only we may hope for victory—victory I mean not only on the field of battle but victory at the council table, victory which will save the Union, and victory which will inaugurate reforms, victory which will punish past offenses, and victory which will secure us against future aggressions.

Mr. WILSON. It is very important to have an executive session, and as it is evident that this bill cannot be disposed of to-day, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARLAN. Before that motion is put, I desire to submit an amendment to this bill, which I shall offer when it shall be in order to do so, and I move that it be printed.

The amendment was received informally, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him; which was received informally, and ordered to be printed.

The motion of Mr. WILSON was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 12, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RED RIVER DISASTERS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a concurrent resolution from the Senate directing an investigation into the causes of the recent disasters on the Red river, &c.

The resolution was concurred in.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OFFICIAL ARMY REPORTS.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution No. 21, providing for the printing of the official reports of the operations of the armies of the United States.

There was no objection; and the joint resolution was taken up, and read a first and second time.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I move to substitute for the Senate resolution that the Secretary of War be directed to furnish the Superintendent of Public Printing with copies of all such correspondence, by telegraph or otherwise, reports of commanding officers, and documents of every description, in relation to the existing rebellion, to be found in the archives of his Department since the 1st day of December, 1860, to the present time and during the continuance of the rebellion, which may be, in his opinion, proper to be published, which said correspondence, reports, and documents shall be arranged in their proper chronological order; that the Superintendent of Public Printing shall cause to be printed and bound, in addition to the usual number, ten thousand copies of such correspondence, reports, and documents in volumes of not exceeding, as near as may be, eight hundred octavo pages each, which shall be distributed by the Secretary of the Senate as follows: five hundred copies to the War Department, one complete copy to each State library of every State in the Union, and five complete copies to public libraries in each congressional district of the United States, to be designated by the Representatives of the present Congress from such districts; and of the remaining copies three thousand shall be for the use of members of the present Senate and six thousand for the use of the present members of the House of Representatives; that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to cause a complete index to the matter contained in such volume to be prepared and inserted therein; and that all resolutions adopted by either House of Congress at its present session directing the printing of any of the correspondence, reports, or documents, as above contemplated, be rescinded.

The substitute was adopted.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

A. BUSH.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Printing, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, an act (S. No. 38) to authorize the settlement of the accounts of A. Bush, late public printer for the Territory of Oregon.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the proper accounting officer to audit the accounts of A. Bush, late public printer for the Territory of Oregon, for printing, binding, &c., in 1855, five hundred copies of the statutes enacted by the Legislative Assembly at its session of 1853-54 and 1854-55, and allow for the same such prices as were by law allowable for such services at that time, and that the amount so found due shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE NAVAL SERVICE.

Mr. PIKE, from a committee of conference, made the following report:

No. 76, "An act relating to appointments in the naval service and courts-martial," having met, after full and free conference have agreed, and do recommend to their respective Houses to agree, as follows:

That the House recede from its vote striking out the first section of the bill, which shall be amended so as to read as follows:

Hereafter all appointments in the volunteer naval service of the United States, above the rank of acting master, shall be submitted to the Senate for confirmation in the same way and manner as appointments in the regular Navy are required to be submitted.

JOHN P. HALE,
W. T. WILLEY,
ALEXANDER RAMSEY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
F. A. PIKE,
IGNATIUS DONNELLY,

The report was agreed to.

Mr. PIKE moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. PIKE also, from a committee of conference, made the following report:

The committee of conference appointed to take into consideration the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 370) to appoint certain officers of the Navy, having met, after full and free conference have and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House concur with the first amendment of the Senate, and that the Senate recede from the other amendments made by it to the bill.

JOHN P. HALE,
W. T. WILLEY,
ALEXANDER RAMSEY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
F. A. PIKE,
IGNATIUS DONNELLY,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. PIKE moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SEAMEN IN UNITED STATES SERVICE.

Mr. ELIOT. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee on Commerce a bill to repeal certain acts in relation to the employment of seamen in the service of the United States.

Mr. COX. I object to it now.

HOMESTEADS IN REBELLIOUS STATES.

The House proceeded, as the regular order of business, to the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands in reference to homesteads in the rebellious States, on which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker, I propose this morning, after briefly referring to some of the objections which have been urged against this bill, to call for a final vote upon it. I discussed its principles and policy several weeks ago in a somewhat carefully prepared speech. Other gentlemen have since resumed the argument; and believing the House now prepared to vote upon the proposition, I do not wish to hinder other important legislation by needlessly prolonging the debate. If there is any besetting sin which can fairly be charged to this Congress it is a redundancy of talk.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] objects to this measure because, as he asserts, it assumes that the Union is never by any possibility to be restored. He thinks it recognizes and aims at the destruction of the Union, and says he never will do anything to hinder its restoration.

Sir, I do not understand the force of the gentleman's objection. I do not see how the confiscation of the lands of rebels in arms against the Government, or the sale of abandoned estates for the non-payment of taxes by the villains who have forced the Government to levy them, can in any degree harm the integrity of this Union. On the contrary, if the Union is to be saved at all, the best practicable mode of doing it is to lay hold of these confiscated lands and these abandoned estates and make such disposition of them as is proposed by this bill.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I am very sure the gentleman from Indiana would not intentionally represent me as saying what I did not say. I said the bill was an obstruction to the restoration of the Union. That was one of the objections I made to it.

Mr. JULIAN. I accept the gentleman's qualification, but I do not see how it relieves him. I wish he had explained in his speech on yesterday how the passage of this bill could in any way obstruct the restoration of the Union. On the contrary, I think it would do more to cement and perpetuate the Union than any legislative measure that could possibly be devised. Here, for instance, are lands belonging to Toombs, of Georgia, a conspicuous rebel. He owns, as I understand, some forty thousand acres of rich land in the State of Texas; enough to furnish an independent homestead of one hundred acres each to four hundred soldiers of this war. How will it militate against the restoration of the Union to parcel out these lands in free homesteads to the soldiers and sailors now fighting for the life of the Republic? Can the gentleman tell?

Let me state another fact. Mr. Thompson, one of the Cabinet ministers of Jimmy Buchanan, owns lands which are said to be worth $1,000,000, bought by him at from ten to eighty cents an acre. I do not comprehend how the confiscation of these estates and their distribution among our soldiers can endanger the Union; how it can do otherwise than subserve the ends of justice, or der, liberty, and peace in the revolted States. These are the pledges, not the perils, of a real Union.

Here is another conspicuous rebel, Robert W. Johnson, of the State of Arkansas, holding an estate perhaps equally large; and I believe Davis, Floyd, Wigfall, Slidell, Cobb, and in fact all the rebel chiefs have largely monopolized the lands of the South, while owning and directing the labor of the people, black and white.

This bill proposes to parcel out all these estates among the soldiers and seamen of this war, and the gentleman from New York says it will obstruct the restoration of the Union! Mr. Speaker, let me submit to the gentleman from New York a few other facts. Under the legislation of Congress in the old days of slave-breeding Democracy, when old Jimmy Buchanan was its king and such men as the gentleman from New York were its anointed high priests, grants were made to the States of Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas, under the name of "swamp lands," amounting to more than thirty million acres, and which are to-day the very richest lands in America. These lands were chiefly bought up afterwards by the men who are now conspicuous rebels, and many of them traitors in arms against us.

The gentleman from New York argues that if we seize these lands and parcel them out among our soldiers it will hinder the restoration of the Union. Sir, I am utterly at a loss to know how this can be true. I apprehend, however, that when he talks about restoring the Union he means one thing, and I mean exactly the opposite. He means the Union as it was when the slave power ruled the country like a throned monarch, and when Davis, Floyd, Thompson, and their confederate cut-throats and pirates were in the Cabinet, in Congress, representing us at the courts of the Old World, and ruling the Government according to their own free will.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. I would ask the gentleman whether he means James Buchanan when he talks of "old Jimmy Buchanan?"

Mr. JULIAN. I think the gentleman can guess my meaning pretty shrewdly if he will remember that I grouped him with Floyd and Thompson, his distinguished Cabinet ministers, and brothers beloved in the work of undermining the Union. I called him "old Jimmy Buchanan" familiarly, not dreaming that it would offend any loyal man on this floor.

I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, when interrupted, that if the gentleman from New York demands the restoration of the Union as it was when the Democratic party, in the evil days of the past, ruled the Government absolutely in the interest of slavery, and when the nation was steadily gravitating under the accumulating weight of its guilt toward the bottomless pit of national ruin, then I am not for the Union as it was, but as it will be when this rebellion shall have wrought out its providential lesson in these States, and scourged the slave-breeding Democracy forever from our land. I am for a Union of regenerated States, resting upon the basis of free labor and the rights of man, and disowning, as an atrocious libel upon humanity and republicanism, the dogma which demands that slavery shall be the corner-stone of the Government, as these rebels and their sympathizers have labored so long to make it.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York says that it would be "unconstitutional" to pass this bill. I am again at a loss to know what the gentleman means by his argument. If it be unconstitutional to pass this bill, then all the legislation of Congress since this rebellion begun is unconstitutional and void. Our tax laws and revenue laws enacted during the past three years are all unconstitutional, including the tax bill which recently passed this House. If this bill is unconstitutional, then our grand armies that have from time to time been raised by authority of the Government were unconstitutionally raised, equipped, and employed. Every gun and every cannon fired in the national defense has been unconstitutionally leveled at the rebels. The war itself is an unconstitutional war, the President and Congress are guilty of usurpation and treason, and the most loyal men in the country are such as the convicted felon who once held a seat on this floor from the State of Ohio, and is now in exile, and the still more "unworthy" gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HARRIS,] who prays God to-day that the armies of the Union may never prevail over the organized thugs and assassins whose daggers are aimed at the nation's heart. According to this philosophy the Constitution itself is clearly unconstitutional, and there is no sure guide left us save the new gospel of peace as expounded by the distinguished gentleman from New York.

Sir, I do not exactly accept these Democratic revelations, and I say again that if this bill, which we propose to vote upon to-day, is unconstitutional, then all the endeavors of this Government to put down the rebellion are unconstitutional, the gentlemen on the other side of the House are on the loyal side, we who support the Government are the enemies of the country, and as the remedy for all our troubles, the Administration should be utterly overthrown, and George B. McClellan chosen President. Our heaven should be slavery, and the devil should be our God. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully decline the espousal of this unsavory Democratic faith.

But the gentleman from New York says he suspected, when this bill was introduced, that there was a "nigger" in it, and that upon investigation he has found him. He refers to the Nebraska bill, of which Colonel Benton said it had a stump speech in its belly, and says that this bill has a "little nigger" in its belly. The contemptuous spirit and characteristic language of the gentleman from New York would commend him to the kindly consideration of the hero of the Fort Pillow butcheries, or the ringleaders of the late proslavery mob in New York. General Forrest, in his recent exploits, only displayed a larger measure of the same unchristian and unmanly hatred of "the nigger," which the gentleman from New York exhibits on this floor as a leader of the "peace Democracy!" Is it strange that the rebels of the South should defy humanity in their treatment of the negroes? But, Mr. Speaker, why is the gentleman unwilling that negro soldiers shall have a homestead on their native soil? They have enlisted in the service of their country; they are sharing all the perils and hardships of war; they are helping by their valor to achieve our victories and save the nation from impending destruction; they are to-day covering themselves with glory under General Grant, in driving back General Lee and his legions. The country now pays them the same wages as our white soldiers. Why would the gentleman from New York refuse to grant them, at the end of the war, a home on the land of their oppressors, who have enslaved their race for more than two hundred years, and at last sought both their lives and the life of the Republic?

Mr. MALLORY. I wish, with the permission of the gentleman from Indiana, in connection with the remark he has just made, to inquire of him, if he will be kind enough to answer, whether it is not one of the provisions of this bill that the negro soldier may go and settle alongside of the white soldier upon these confiscated lands in the rebel States, and other lands which may come into the possession of the General Government? If that be so, then I wish to ask the gentleman whether he does not intend this as one of a series of acts by which he desires to work out the entire equality, social and political, of the negro with the white man in this country?

I desire also, in addition, before the gentleman replies to that question, to ask him whether he does not himself believe that if the negro is employed as a soldier in the Army under the policy inaugurated by this Government to maintain its liberties, as he says—I say whether he does not himself believe it to be wrong and unjust for the black soldier who served his country on the battlefield to be denied social and political equality with the white soldier? I desire to know the opinion of the gentleman particularly as representing the peculiar portion of the party on that side of the House with which he acts.

Mr. JULIAN. I take pleasure in answering the gentleman, but when he speaks of the "peculiar portion" of the party with which I act I do not know what he means.

Mr. MALLORY. I suppose the gentleman will allow us to be as familiar with his party as he assumes to be with the Democratic party when he speaks of "Jimmy Buchanan." The gentleman of course understands his position on that side of the House.

Mr. JULIAN. I trust the gentleman will find when the vote comes to be taken on this bill that I am identified with no "peculiar party" on this side of the House which separates me from the great body of the unconditional Union men in this Hall or throughout the country. I rather think the gentleman is right in his remark that I understand my political position.

In answer to the question of the gentleman from Kentucky I have to say that I mean by this bill precisely what the bill says in its plain English words. I mean that when this war is over the black soldier as well as the white soldier shall have a homestead of forty or eighty acres, as the bill provides, upon the lands of these rebels which shall be confiscated or otherwise come into the possession of the Government. I mean, in other words, that they shall have equality of rights as to the ownership of the soil in these insurrectionary States.

As to the question of social equality, I believe the negro will work out that problem for himself under the new dispensation which the military and legislative power of the Government are now inaugurating. I do not propose to enter into any nice speculations upon this subject, but I have no opinions to conceal. I believe in doing justice to the negro, in guarding his rights, and in giving him fair play in fighting his own battle, leaving his social position to be determined by his own conduct, and the conditions of life in which he may be placed. For one, I have no fear whatever of African domination. I trust the gentleman from Kentucky is not seriously alarmed. I must say, however, that I hope no rebels or rebel sympathizers will ever have any superiority of rights over the negro soldiers who have aided in crushing the rebellion. Should African domination take its turn, I trust it will find its true subjects.

Mr. MALLORY. As the gentleman from Indiana is very candid and distinct in his utterances and the expression of his opinions I do not think he will object if I endeavor to understand exactly where he stands on this question before this colloquy is ended. I distinctly ask the gentleman whether he does not contemplate by the bill before the House, by which he proposes to put negroes alongside of white men upon these confiscated lands, to establish a perfect equality of the negro with the white man; in other words, whether he does not advocate that the negro shall vote and hold office and be fully the white man's equal? I understand the gentleman to acknowledge that to be true. I understand him in his answer to avow that he is willing that politically the negro and white man shall be equal, but that as to social equality that was a matter which the negro would settle for himself as soon as the shackles of bondage were removed. I understand that to be the answer of the gentleman from Indiana. If not, I hope the gentleman will be explicit.

Mr. JULIAN. I think I have answered the gentleman fully. I will say in reference to the right of the negro to vote—

Mr. MALLORY. And hold office.

Mr. JULIAN. I will say that under the Constitution of our Government—which I hope to see preserved, as does the gentleman from Kentucky—the right of suffrage in the States is to be determined by the States themselves. When these revolted regions shall be regenerated and dotted over with free homesteads, tilled by the labor of freemen, and when these negroes have been converted from chattels into men, with a common right to the soil and stake in society, then the legislative bodies of these rebaptized States will probably deal with the question of suffrage on just principles. I think they will not decline the logical consequences of radical democracy. But I shall be for leaving that matter to them, as it is now left to Massachusetts and Kentucky. If they shall see fit to recognize the right of the negro to cast his ballot; if the right of voting is conferred upon all without discrimination as to color or race, I can only say that I would not pronounce it an unwise policy. But I would submit that question to the States themselves. I believe the States of North Carolina and Tennessee once allowed negroes to vote; and the gentleman will remember that not very many years ago two very prominent public men of those States, Hon. George E. Badger and Hon. John Bell, admitted that they had been elected to office over their competitors by the votes of colored men. The case of Mr. Bell, I think, was his first election to Congress.

The gentleman will also remember that several of the slave States, and nearly all the non-slaveholding States, permitted colored men to vote at the date of the formation of the Government; and they did vote, as he must know, upon the question of adopting the Constitution.

Mr. MALLORY. I think I have obtained an answer from the gentleman from Indiana, and I want to show what I understand that answer to be, so that there may be no mistake in the future. I understand him to say that these States may extend to this black population who settle upon these lands the right of suffrage and the right to hold office. I understand the gentleman to say that while as a citizen of Indiana, or Representative from that State, he has no control over the matter, yet if he had any control over the matter his vote and voice would be in favor of the exercise of the right of suffrage and to hold political office by the black men in the revolted States. I understand the gentleman to say if lands in Indiana be confiscated—and I believe it is alleged there are men there whose property may be confiscated—and these black men are located upon them, he will, as a potential member of the Republican party, advocate the enjoyment of the elective franchise by black men, of the political equality of the negro with the white man. That I understand to be the exact object and aim of this bill. I ask whether it is not the entering wedge for the purposes I have indicated.

Mr. JULIAN. I fear I shall not be able to satisfy the gentleman's remarkable thirst for knowledge, and for exact information as to the ulterior purposes of this bill and my own intentions in urging its passage. If the bill, by a fair interpretation of its language, is a good one and should command the gentleman's support, I hope he will not fight it because he fears it will be "the entering wedge" to revolutionary measures, or that my own intentions reach too far into the distant and uncertain future. I hope he will calm his fears. As to rebel lands in Indiana, the gentleman knows, if he has read the bill, that it applies only to the States' in insurrection. As regards his reiterated questions, let me remind the gentleman that if he will remember the answers I have already given him he will find that they respond fully and fairly to what he asks. As respects the question of "negro equality," let me say to the gentleman that I do not think he ought to press it, considering his relations to his brethren in the South. I think the subject a somewhat delicate one for Democratic gentlemen to deal with.

Mr. MALLORY. I would like to have the gentleman explain that.

Mr. JULIAN. I will do so. We who are known as Republicans and unconditional Union men sometimes associate with negroes. They live among us, and of course we have dealings with them. But no such intimate relations exist between them and us as we find existing between them and the Democrats of the South. Continually, habitually, and as the result of a well-recognized law of social order, the slave mothers and slave masters of the South are brought on to the level of social equality in its most loathsome forms. In some of the rebel States I believe the number of mulattoes is nearly equal to the number of Democratic voters. In the State of Mississippi, if I am not mistaken, wherever you find an orthodox modern Democrat you will find a mulatto not very far off. The gentleman cannot deny this, unless he can show that these mulattoes sprouted up from the soil, or were rained down from the clouds, or reported their presence through some other miracle. This social equality between negro women and Anglo-Saxon Democrats is the natural consequence and necessary fruit of the institution which has proved itself to be the mother of treason, and of all lesser abominations.

Mr. MALLORY. The Census Bureau establishes the fact that thirty-six per cent. of the free colored population of the free States have white blood in their veins, while only one ninth of the slave population shows white blood.

Mr. JULIAN. I have not examined the census tables as to the fact stated by the gentleman. It may be true, for I believe mulattoes more generally come into the northern States than those of a darker color, and of course their increase will be mulattoes. The gentleman is not at all relieved, however, by the white blood in the veins of these negroes in the North, for they have migrated from the South, bringing with them, perhaps, the blood of the gentleman from Kentucky, and other distinguished leaders of his party. [Laughter.]

Mr. MALLORY. I have to say that the one ninth white blood which exists in the South may be attributed to the fact that we have among us northern teachers, schoolmasters, and peddlers. [Laughter.]

Mr. JULIAN. The gentleman assigns entirely too large a work to these itinerant Yankees. Certainly, my friend from Kentucky does not believe them to be so wonderfully endowed, or so marvellously successful over able and experienced Democratic rivals. Besides, I think it was John Randolph who said that "the best blood of old Virginia courses in the veins of her slaves." It was not the blood of northern schoolmasters and peddlers, but Virginia blood, and what is true of Virginia may fairly be assumed as to other slave States.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. JULIAN. I prefer not to be further interrupted in this direction. My time is rapidly expiring.

Mr. MALLORY. I wish the gentleman to answer my serious question, and not act the demagogue upon the subject.

Mr. JULIAN. The gentleman imputes to me that which I think belongs exclusively to himself on this occasion.

Mr. MALLORY. The gentleman is mistaken—

Mr. JULIAN. I decline to yield further. When interrupted by the gentleman from Kentucky, I was replying to some of the objections of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] to this bill. After urging its unconstitutionality, he said he did not seek to save the negroes from their masters, but from their white northern oppressors.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Before the gentleman from Indiana leaves the point of replying to me, I desire to call his attention to the fact that my objection was to conferring these homesteads upon the black laborers, and not upon the black soldiers. The gentleman has carefully avoided alluding to that provision of the bill which allows laborers to enjoy these homesteads, and not the soldiers.

Mr. JULIAN. I have no disposition whatever to evade the fact that this bill provides homesteads of forty acres for those who have been employed as laborers in the military service. But I wish to ask the gentleman from New York if he is in favor of conferring these lands as homesteads upon the black soldiers.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I am not, [laughter,] because the lands do not belong to the Government, and hence they cannot confer them.

Mr. JULIAN. Then I have not misrepresented the gentleman, and he had no occasion to interrupt me. As respects the inhumanity of our own loyal people toward the freedmen of the South, I agree with him in all he has said; and one of the chief purposes of this measure is to prevent the establishment of a remorseless system of serfdom over the blacks. I know very well what is being done in Louisiana to-day under false ideas of reconstruction. I know that a system of enforced and uncompensated labor is growing up there but one remove from slavery itself. It is to guard against all this legalized vassalage and wrong by the white speculators of the North and the monopolists of the South that I desire to see this bill become a law.

Give away these lands in small homesteads to the men who have earned them by their heroism and their toils; for without a home no man can have, absolutely, any rights. Land monopoly is slavery in disguise. It is a stupendous system of serfdom, as unnatural in a republic as would be the recognition of universal liberty in an absolute despotism.

I have already referred to the vast estates of Floyd, Thompson, and other leading rebels who, with their confederates, own the great body of the lands in the rebel States. If you seize these lands and allot them in small homesteads, you destroy this monopoly and establish independence, liberty, and equality on the ruins of the system which has ripened into this war. You establish closely associated communities on the basis of free labor. You make it possible to establish free schools and churches, and by taking away the absolute power of capital over labor you secure the right to the ballot, and thus enable the people themselves to guard their political rights. Sir, this question of land monopoly is the grandest question of this tremendous conflict with the rebels. It involves the whole problem of reconstruction. If not decided wisely, what will the President's proclamation be worth? Of what avail would be an act of Congress totally abolishing slavery, or an amendment of the Constitution forever prohibiting it, if the old agricultural basis of aristocratic power shall remain? Real liberty must ever be an outlaw where one man only in three hundred or five hundred is an owner of the soil. Let it be remembered, too, that the work of settlement and reorganization in the revolted States must necessarily be attended by tumult and peril. Guerrillas will infest the country and perhaps carry on their work of rapine and murder for years to come. Order and security can only approach their final empire by gradual steps. Nothing, therefore, can be more entirely natural and just than to send our veteran soldiers into these regions when the war is ended, with their rifles on their shoulders, ready to defend as well as to cultivate their homesteads, and to protect from wrong and outrage those who may not be able to help themselves. This policy would make every settler in these regions, during their transition from barbarism to civilization, a national policeman and avenger, an efficient arm of that military force which for a time will be required by the state of the country. Both a military and an agricultural necessity plead for it, while it is commended by the highest statesmanship, and embodies a beautiful poetic justice to our own soldiers, and to the rebels whose lands shall thus become their righteous heritage.

Mr. Speaker, let me say in conclusion, to the gentlemen on the other side of the House who have seemed so anxious to increase the pay of our soldiers, that this bill gives them a capital opportunity to demonstrate their sincerity. My colleague, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who, I am sorry to say, is not now in his seat, has clamored during the whole of this session for an increased compensation for the brave fellows who are periling their lives for the Republic. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] has also been very anxious on the subject. It seems to be the earnest desire of our brethren on the other side of the House to have something done, and that speedily, for the common soldier. We have already increased his pay, but our Democratic friends are not yet satisfied. Now, here is a proposition, made by a committee of the House, to give all our sailors and soldiers, black or white, and all who have served the United States as laborers, homesteads of forty and eighty acres of land on the forfeited estates of the rebels. This is proposed as a reward for their valor, and as the surest pledge of the redemption and regeneration of the insurrectionary districts. Sir, I want to know how these gentlemen are going to reconcile their votes against this bill with their declared love for the soldiers of the Union?

It is a simple proposition to parcel out the lands of the rebels by extending the homestead law over them under the regulations of the General Land Office, and in pursuance of existing laws of Congress on the subject of confiscation and revenue. It is a proposition to make effective, for the benefit of the soldier, what Congress has already done, and it will at once test the sincerity of every man who professes to be the soldier's friend. I submit to gentlemen upon the other side of the House that now is the favored opportunity, the accepted time, for them to show their faith by their works. Not to vote for this bill, it seems to me, is to vote to continue the immense monopoly of the soil in the revolted States without which this rebellion would have been impossible. Not to vote for this bill is to vote that northern speculators and monopolists shall continue to buy up the lands every day sold by the Government for the non-payment of taxes, and thus make them the basis of new and frightful monopolies. Not to vote for this bill is to write one's self down the enemy of the common soldier, whose valor has covered him with glory on so many bloody fields, and earned for him so richly the gratitude of his country. Not to vote for this bill is to balk the righteous purpose of the nation to save its own life, and to visit a fitting retribution upon its assassins.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House longer, having already occupied more time than I intended. I think the principles of this bill are understood on both sides of the House, and I now demand the previous question on its passage.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to ask the gentleman one or two questions in relation to some features of this bill before he moves the previous question.

Mr. JULIAN. I will answer a question or two, and for that purpose I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. PENDLETON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if he can tell us how many acres of land now in the possession of the Government will be subject to entry under this bill?

Mr. JULIAN. We are selling thousands and thousands of acres for the non-payment of taxes, independent of the law providing for the seizure and condemnation of property by proceedings in rem. An immense amount of land—I cannot state it definitely—has fallen and will fall into the hands of the Government.

Mr. PENDLETON. I say, Mr. Speaker, pursuing this subject, that this bill provides that lands of three classes, lands acquired by the Government under three different laws, shall be appropriated as the bill proposes.

The first is the law for the suppression of insurrection, the punishment of treason and rebellion by the seizure and confiscation of the property of rebels. I understand that by that and the amendment passed to it, there is to be no confiscation of real estate except during the life of the person attainted. There is, therefore, no land that has come or can come into the possession of the Government by that law which can be made available for the purpose of this bill.

Mr. JULIAN. I will say in answer to the gentleman, that supposing the position taken by him to be correct, the passage of this bill is still perfectly warranted by the exigencies of the times, for reasons already stated; but I take it for granted that under existing laws as interpreted by our courts, or by virtue of further legislation, we shall reach the fee simple of the rebels. A joint resolution has already passed this House—I believe it has not yet passed the Senate—which I think provides for confiscating the lands of rebels in fee.

Mr. PENDLETON. I understand perfectly well the position of the gentleman from Indiana upon the propriety of that joint resolution, but, if I am correctly informed, it has not yet passed both Houses of Congress, and from the long time it has slept in the other branch of Congress, it is not probable that it will; but that is merely a matter of conjecture. I understand the Judiciary Committee there have reported against it, and a gentleman near me informs me they so unanimously reported, but that the Senate have taken no action upon the report.

It is apparent, then, that under that law not an acre has come into the possession of the Government that can come under the provisions of this act.

The next class of lands to which the bill is intended to apply is the lands which the Government acquires under sales for the collection of direct taxes. Now, the gentleman from Indiana says that thousands and thousands of acres have been sold under that law. I would like to ask the gentleman if there have been any lands sold under the operation of that law except in the immediate neighborhood of this city in Virginia, and perhaps down at Hilton Head? I ask for information. I was under the impression that no other lands had been sold. I may be mistaken.

Mr. JULIAN. Large quantities have been sold at Port Royal; but I cannot speak definitely. I know that many thousands of acres have been sold there, and I think also in Louisiana and Florida. I will remind the gentleman also that it has been decided repeatedly by Judge Underwood that the Government, under existing laws of Congress, has the right to confiscate the property of rebels in fee simple.

Mr. PENDLETON. I understand the construction under which Judge Underwood has been acting; but I do not understand that his judicial decisions have been under the law to which I have been calling the attention of the gentleman. That law with the amendment says in express language that the confiscation of real estate shall be only for the lifetime of the person attainted.

I am informed by a gentleman who sits behind me that not a single acre has been sold under this law for the collection of taxes except in this immediate neighborhood and at Hilton Head, and the amount sold there is so inconsiderable that for a measure of this magnitude it may be said there is practically no land to which it can apply.

Mr. HIGBY. I understood the chairman of the committee [Mr. JULIAN] to agree to yield the floor to me, and that I yielded to the gentleman from Ohio. I desire to know who is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PENDLETON. I claim the floor. I understood the gentleman from Indiana to yield to me to ask a question. I am simply asking him a series of questions, and I am doing it in good faith, for the purpose of eliciting information.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say that the floor is in the control of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask my colleague whether he yielded the floor to me.

Mr. JULIAN. I did yield the floor to my colleague on the Committee on Public Lands. But I wish to say a word in answer to the question of the gentleman from Ohio. Not being able to answer precisely, I say again that, conceding everything he says to be true, there is still a vast amount of land being sold for taxes to which this bill applies by giving them as homesteads to our soldiers.

Mr. PENDLETON. One more question. Mr. JULIAN. Make it short.

Mr. PENDLETON. If the gentleman does not want to furnish information sought in good faith, of course I will not trouble him.

Mr. JULIAN. Go on.

Mr. PENDLETON. I think he will hardly say that I have abused his courtesy or that of the House.

Mr. JULIAN. My time is short.

Mr. PENDLETON. The other class of lands to which this is intended to apply are lands sold for the non-payment of taxes in the loyal States.

Mr. JULIAN. What is that?

Mr. PENDLETON. Lands are acquired under the internal revenue law, and this bill is intended to apply to them.

Mr. JULIAN. It is intended to apply to lands in the insurrectionary districts. I have not time to answer questions further.

Mr. PENDLETON. One more question. The gentleman is right in his last statement.

Now, I understand the provision of this bill to be that in the insurrectionary districts, under the operation of the internal revenue law and the act for the collection of taxes, lands are put up for sale, no matter for what reason the taxes have not been paid, no matter whose property it is, no matter how anxious the party may have been to relieve himself from the so-called confederate government to pay these taxes, and the lands are to be bid off not at the maximum but the minimum.

Mr. JULIAN. The gentleman is substantially correct, but there is a provision in the bill that any party within two years may redeem his land on his proving his loyalty.

Mr. PENDLETON. That is true, but there is no provision that the entry of the party shall not take place within two years.

Mr. JULIAN. The Government gets no valid title until the time has expired.

Mr. PENDLETON. That is true, but this bill permits the preëemption to take place before that time.

Mr. JULIAN. The man who preëmits preëmits at his own risk. I now yield to the gentleman from California.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 159) for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State; when the Speaker signed the same.

HOMESTEADS ON CONFISCATED LANDS—AGAIN.

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, the attack on this bill from the opposite side of the House has been against the general policy of the confiscation law. That discussion is in reference to a policy already established by law. It is a foregone conclusion and beyond our action, and therefore, to my mind, it is wholly unnecessary to occupy so much time on that point.

This bill is based upon previous laws. It makes no changes whatever in those laws. It simply provides for the disposition of such lands as become the property of the United States under those laws. The policy of the confiscation law has already been discussed. The law which requires lands in the United States to be sold for the non-payment of taxes is in reference to a policy already settled; and this bill, if it becomes a law, will not make a change in that. The only question to be settled by the House is as to the disposition of the lands which become the property of the United States in the insurrectionary districts by virtue of those two laws.

Mr. Speaker, the main feature which seems to create a great deal of disturbance here is that one which gives to a man with a dark skin the same compensation for his services which is given to a man with a white skin. Justice to the one class is injustice to another. That is, if a man does a dollar's worth of work for me, if he is a white man I must give him a dollar, but if he is a black man I must pay him less, or else I am raising him to a level with the white man.

Sir, this bill, if it becomes a law, takes away no rights from the soldier, whether he be black or white. He may take lands under the homestead law in other parts of the Union; but the bill provides that if he wishes to take them in the insurrectionary districts, he must take them in accordance with the provisions of this bill, if it becomes a law. It takes away no rights under existing laws, but simply confines him to the terms contained in this bill, provided they see fit to take lands in the insurrectionary districts.

Sir, some gentlemen are very uneasy. The question of equality arises to disturb them. They say if you give them freedom you give them an equal chance for acquiring property; that you then propose to make them voters, and then, of course, follows amalgamation and all the evils their imaginations can conjure up upon this subject, looking forward into the future beyond the comprehension of finite minds.

Some gentlemen have spoken very learnedly and very exclusively here upon this question, when they represent States in which negroes every year go to the polls and vote. How many black men are there to-day in the State of New York who are entitled to go to the polls and vote? Gentlemen pretend to claim that if you secure to these men the rights conferred in this bill, if you guaranty to them pay for their services, you therefore give them all the privileges which the Constitution and the Government bestow upon white citizens. Does it follow that if a black man is paid justly for his services, that he therefore has all other rights which are extended to white men? For that reason I asked my colleague on the committee, when he was being questioned, how many centuries into the future his intentions extended. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

We are trying to remedy in some small degree the terrible evil which we now have on our hands. We can see the consequences of this evil in our streets this very day in the thousands of maimed and mutilated soldiers who are pouring through them, and are thronging our hospitals all around us. They are the fruits of slavery. Now, there are thousands of colored men in the State of New York, my native State, who, if there were an election to-day, would have the right to go to the polls and vote. In my earliest childhood I can remember to have seen black men go to the polls and vote. It is true a qualification was imposed—a property qualification. Now, if the Government will tolerate the black man under any circumstances whatever as citizens or inhabitants only, it must encourage the idea of their acquiring property that they may not become paupers and pensioners upon the Government.

The only question is whether such a bill as this should follow those which have already been passed. And I will answer the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] who asked my colleague upon the committee so many questions as to whether there were any lands now in a condition to be disposed of under the bill if it becomes a law. I would have Congress pass this law if there was not an inch of land in possession of Government under previous laws. We have reason to believe there will be thousands and millions of acres, and possibly within the next six months. I do not know how soon or how late we may get possession of these lands, nor is that the business of Congress. But it is wise, it is proper, it is just, that a provision should be made for the disposition of such lands, should any come into the possession of the Government of the United States under either of the two acts named in this bill. These two laws, as I have said, are now in existence, making provision for the forfeiture of these lands, and are wise provisions, too; and this third one, containing provisions for the disposition of these lands, is something which needs and demands the action of Congress. I hope it will become a law. I move the previous question.

Mr. COX called for tellers on seconding the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Cox and HIGBY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 44.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, which was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. PENDLETON called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 75, nays 64; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Daves, Deming, Driggs, Farnsworth, Fenton, Garfield, Gooch, Grianell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perlman, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Schenck, Seofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spaulding, Stevens, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wilder, William, Windom, and Woodbridge—75.

NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Thomas, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Whaley, Wheeler, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—64.

So the bill was passed.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. ELIOT stated that on this vote he was paired off with Mr. KNAPP, otherwise he would have voted "ay."

Mr. J. W. WHITE stated that he was paired off with his colleague, Mr. ECKLEY, otherwise he would have voted "no."

Mr. SWEAT stated that he was paired off with his colleague, Mr. BLAINE.

Mr. FRANK stated that he was paired off with his colleague, Mr. GANSON.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

A REPRESENTATIVE FROM ARKANSAS.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. I have had handed to me the credentials of T. M. Jacks, purporting to have been elected as a Representative from the State of Arkansas. I desire that they shall be read and referred to the Committee of Elections.

The papers were read, and referred accordingly.

RAILROADS TO NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER announced as the business next in order the consideration of the bill known as the Raritan and Delaware bay railroad bill, the question being on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON. I desire to modify my amendment by substituting for it the following:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert as follows:

Every railroad company in the United States whose road is operated by steam, its successors and assigns, he and is hereby authorized to carry upon and over its road, connections, boats, bridges, and ferries, all freight, property, mails, baggage, troops, and Government supplies, on their way from any State to another State, and to receive compensation therefor.

Mr. DEMING. I wish, on behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs, to accept the substitute offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER. It is not within the power of the gentleman from Connecticut to accept it. He may signify his desire to do so.

Mr. DEMING. My desire is that it shall be accepted.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, when I took the floor on this bill several weeks since, it was pressed with a great deal of vigor by the gentleman who reported it from the Committee on Military Affairs. I have not observed, since that time, so much activity in pressing this bill. If it be the intention of gentlemen to abandon the bill, if they are willing that it shall be indefinitely postponed, or to have it laid on the table, I have no desire to trespass on the attention of the House. I do not know whether there is any intention to press this bill to a vote.

Mr. DEMING. It certainly is my intention.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, when I took the floor before I said that I had no knowledge of the facts connected with this bill, except as they appear upon the papers which have been presented to the House. I take no interest in it except as it is a question of power in the Federal Government, and consequently of the reserved powers of the States. I shall not stop for one moment to inquire into the patriotism of the State of New Jersey, which has been somewhat impeached during this discussion, or the wisdom of her action or legislation in reference to the railroad companies within her borders. It is to me a matter of entire indifference whether private and personal interests will be advanced or not by the passage or rejection of this bill. I have not given to that branch of the subject the least attention. I did not consider it pertinent to the matters that are under discussion. I have never been able to bring myself to the conclusion that this House has the constitutional power to pass this bill, and consequently I have never come to the consideration of the question as to whether it is expedient or whether personal interests or the commercial interests of the State of New Jersey will be affected.

The gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. Woodbridge], who spoke last upon this bill, it seems to me wandered very far from the subject, and in wandering from the subject diminished the force of his very clear and lucid legal argument by the introduction of considerations which I know his candor will lead him to say were not legitimate to the debate. He told us that the management of this New Jersey railroad was very bad; that its prices were high; that its servants were uncivil; that passengers were troubled about their baggage; that they could not get tickets when and where they pleased, and were subject to divers other annoyances. He told us that this road is a monopoly. Well, sir, I do not admit that it is a monopoly. But suppose it is. If the interests of commerce are subserved by it, does the fact that it is a monopoly give to this House the least power over it?

The gentleman told us that one of these railroads, having retained the money received for through fares, was obliged to account to the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company for a portion of its profits. Sir, I deny that that is the fact; but if it were, is not the liability of one corporation in a State to account to another corporation in the same State a fit subject for the judicial investigation and final determination of the tribunals of the State, subject, of course, to the ordinary rules of review in the Federal courts, if a proper case for review shall be made?

The gentleman told us, also, that this corporation is a great instrument of electioneering power in the State of New Jersey, by which Governors of the State are elected and members of Congress are sent here. Well, sir, if by means of this machinery Governors are elected for the State of New Jersey, that is a question for New Jersey and not for us, and if by that means, or by other illegitimate means, the election of members of Congress is influenced, that is a question to be determined by this House on a contest for seats.

The gentleman also told us that the taxes imposed upon this railroad company went into the treasury of the State of New Jersey. Well, sir, suppose they do; is it not competent for New Jersey to tax her own railroads in her own way and to increase her revenue as much as she can by this species of taxation?

The gentleman said that a proposition had been made in the Legislature of New Jersey to repeal the charters of these two roads in case this bill should pass. Well, sir, is not the granting or repeal of a charter within the power of that State? And if this bill shall pass and be held valid a repeal of these charters by the Legislature will not injure either the companies or the State. This bill, if it is good for anything, is effective to extend the powers and maintain the corporate existence of those companies in defiance of a repeal by the State. If I were a member of the Legislature of that State and held the opinion which I do as to the power of this Congress to pass this bill, I would urge the speedy repeal of these charters. I would bring to a final and conclusive test the validity of this law before the proper judicial tribunal.

But, sir, the gentleman had only just gone that far into the discussion of this question of the Camden and Amboy railroad when the amiable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Washburne], with a felicity of argumentation and of diction which is all his own, and with a grace of manner only equaled by his fervency of spirit, intervened to say that he had heard of some Legislature in which a proposition had been made to punish by fine and imprisonment any person who should undertake to enlist negro soldiers in the State; and then, with that desire for knowledge which always characterizes that gentleman, turned to the gentleman from Vermont and gravely asked him whether he could inform him in what State it was that such a proposition was made.

Well, sir, the gentleman from Vermont gravely turned round and said he believed it was the Legislature of New Jersey; and thereupon the gentleman from Illinois retired from the discussion, seeming perfectly satisfied that he had made an unanswerable argument in support of the bill. He resumed his seat with a self-satisfied smile, which seemed to say, "If I cannot get satisfaction out of the disloyal Legislature of New Jersey, I can at least kick the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company." I was reminded of a picture which I once saw in Punch, intended to represent England after she had been discomfited in some European arrangement, turning to whip the Chinese because they would not take opium. John Bull is represented as a small boy wiping his eyes on his coat sleeve, shaking his fist at the backs of the Emperors of Russia and Austria and the King of the French, who were giants in size and were coolly pursuing their several ways, and taking great satisfaction in saying, with impotent rage, "If I cannot whip you, I can make faces at your sisters." [Laughter.]

Sir, these considerations are unworthy of this discussion. They are not pertinent to the questions involved. They ought to have no weight. They are an attempt to obtain by an appeal to our passions what could not be extorted from our sound judgment. They do not deserve serious refutation. I pass them without further reference.

I desire to state, as briefly and distinctly as I can, the circumstances under which we are called upon to exercise this power. In 1830 the Legislature of New Jersey incorporated the Camden and Amboy Company. Immediately afterwards, for a valuable consideration paid in hand by this company, the State Legislature entered into a contract that no competing line should be established between New York and Philadelphia across the borders of New Jersey. That contract is a valid one. It has been so decided by the courts of the State of New Jersey in this very case. It has been so decided in Massachusetts in the case of the Boston and Lowell Railroad Company against the Salem and Lowell Railroad Company, reported in 2 Gray. It has been so decided in the Supreme Court of the United States, in 13 Howard, in the case of the Richmond Railroad Company against the Louisa Railroad Company.

As to the validity of that contract made between the Legislature of New Jersey and this corporation, no one can raise a question. The Legislature desired to live up to its obligation. Application after application was made for the grant of a charter for a competing route. It was refused as often as presented; refused upon the ground that the faith of the State was pledged, and that that faith should not be violated.

In 1852 the State granted a charter of incorporation to the Raritan and Delaware Railroad Company. It defines the line of that road along the eastern boundary of the State. Its nearest point to the Camden and Amboy railroad is at the initial point. Thence it diverges constantly. It was not intended to be a competing route. It was intended to be a non-competing route. In 1854 the State chartered the Camden and Atlantic City Railroad Company, whose line was at right angles to the Camden and Amboy railroad, and crosses the line of the Raritan and Delaware Bay railroad some fifty miles from Philadelphia. When these two roads were nearly completed to the junction, an attempt was made to establish a connection between them which should make a through route from New York to Philadelphia. An application was then made to the courts of New Jersey to prevent the establishment of a connection along these two roads, which run at almost right angles to each other, that would create a through line to New York from Philadelphia. These courts determined that making this connection would be an infraction not only of the charters of the two roads, but of the contract made by the State with the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, and therefore prohibited it. Thus the judicial power united with the political power to maintain the contract which the State had made and to preserve the faith which the State had pledged.

Mr. GARFIELD. The courts refused to grant an injunction against laying down the rails to connect the two roads, but after they permitted it to be established they did enjoin through business.

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly they did not enjoin the construction of those two roads, because their construction was legal under their charters. They were following out the line specified in their respective charters, and it was their right to make the roads for the uses and mode mentioned in those charters. It was only the use to which the roads were attempted to be put that was declared to be illegal. The construction of the road from Raritan bay to Delaware bay was in conformity with the charter; and so was the construction of the road from Camden to Atlantic City. The creation of a connection for doing through business on parts of each road was held by the courts of New Jersey to be not only an infraction of the charters of the two roads but of the contract made by the State.

Mr. YEAMAN. As I have not the cases from Massachusetts and Virginia to which the gentleman has referred, I ask whether they relate to the domestic internal commerce of those States, or to commerce between States? In other words, was the point decided that a State may control the movements and commerce of citizens of other States? I apprehend a critical examination will show that the cases do not go that length, whereas the law of this monopoly does, for it refers in terms to commerce between New York and Philadelphia, neither city being in New Jersey.

Mr. PENDLETON. The point was that it was competent for the State, through its Legislature, to enter into a contract that no charter should be given to a railroad, authorizing it to carry on a competing business with the railroad first created. I will take the liberty of handing to the gentleman, in order that he may read them himself, the cases to which I have referred.

Now, after all the power of the State of New Jersey has been exerted in maintaining the contract with the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, we find these two corporations—not the commercial interests of the State of New Jersey, not the people of New Jersey, not the people of New York, not the people of Philadelphia, but these two corporations themselves—coming to Congress and asking, what? That they should be declared legal structures? No! They are legal structures to-day by the laws of New Jersey. Asking that they may be made a post route? No! They are post routes now by the laws of the United States. Asking that they shall be military roads? No! The President of the United States, under the law, has to-day the power to use them for military purposes, and he has in fact used them in that way.

What do they ask, says a friend near me. They ask that these connections for through business, which the judicial power of New Jersey has declared to be in contravention to existing State laws, shall be legalized by an act of Congress. What they ask is plainly declared in the third section of the bill. It is not that they shall be post routes nor military roads nor legal structures, for they are now, by virtue of the laws of the State of New Jersey and of the United States, post roads, military roads, legal structures.

No, sir; the bill has a further meaning. It goes further, and it is intended to go further, for by its provisions the Camden and Atlantic Railroad Company and the Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company, or either of them, or their assigns, are authorized "to complete, maintain, and operate the said railroads and branches, and to establish, maintain, and run ferries, steamboats, and other vessels as a line of transportation for goods, wares, and merchandise of all descriptions, and passengers between the cities of New York and Philadelphia, and between the intermediate places and said cities respectively, and for commerce between and among the several States of the United States, anything in any law or laws of the above-named States to the contrary notwithstanding."

Now, I wish gentlemen to understand the full meaning of this third section to which I have just referred. These are local companies, created by the State, whose line of works are to be built entirely within the State, having both their termini within the State, intended for the accommodation of the local travel and commerce of the State. That is their object; so it is declared by their charter; so it is defined by the very law of their being. Now, it is intended by this third section to say to each of these railroad companies, "You may deflect from the course prescribed to you by the law of the State and build the road which is authorized to be built by the other company, and pass along the line prescribed for it to its terminus."

The Camden and Atlantic City Railroad Company is authorized, under this bill, to build the road of the Raritan and Delaware Bay Company; and the Raritan and Delaware Bay Company is authorized to build the route of the Camden and Atlantic City Company; and each of them and their assigns are authorized to build all the roads authorized by the State laws to be built by the other company. I venture to say that a power like that has never yet been granted by the Federal Government. It is authority given by the Federal Government to one of these companies to build half the road authorized by its charter, and then deflect from its course and build one half of the road authorized by the charter of the other company.

I beg gentlemen to understand what this proposition involves. In Massachusetts a road is chartered from Boston to Springfield. This proposition involves the power of the Federal Government to authorize that company to leave that course and build its road from the southern to the northern boundary of the State. A company is chartered in Pennsylvania to build a road from Philadelphia to Pittsburg. The proposition involves the power of the Federal Government to authorize the road to be built from Harrisburg to the lakes. It involves the power of the Federal Government to authorize a canal company of the State of Ohio, organized to build a canal from the lakes to the river, to deflect from its course and build a railroad from Wheeling to Cincinnati.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to suggest to my colleague that this bill does not contemplate the matter of building at all. It is only a matter of using that which is already built, and which is declared by the courts of New Jersey to be a legal structure. My colleague seems to be discussing the question of the right to build, which is not in the case.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am discussing that very question, and I am doing it because these parties or their assigns are authorized by the provisions of this third section "to complete, maintain, and operate the said roads and their branches, and to establish, maintain, and run the said ferries and steamboats." If they are completed now, why give the authority to complete them?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will state to the gentleman that the substitute on which the Committee on Military Affairs has agreed has nothing whatever to do with the building, but simply authorizes the using of roads already established.

Mr. PENDLETON. Then the gentleman admits that my criticism on the original bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, and pending here for three months, is a just one. I will come directly to the substitute which has been offered this morning. I say that under this bill authority is given to these roads to deflect from the course marked out by their charters, and to build a road on an entirely new line. My colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] made his speech—and a very able argument it was—on the basis that the bill reported was the bill on which the Committee on Military Affairs intended to stand when it came to ask the House for a vote.

Sir, this bill is an attempt—and the substitute accepted by the Committee on Military Affairs is no better—on the part of Congress to invest a State corporation created for local purposes, having no being and no right to be outside of the limits of that State, with powers not only not given to it by its charter, but inconsistent with the objects of the charter—powers that have been expressly denied to it by the Legislature of the State.

Now, I say that that is an enormous power. I say that in no single instance has it been exercised by the Federal Government. I know that the Committee on Military Affairs, in the report submitted to the House, says that it has been exercised, in substance, five times. I take issue with the committee. I say that in no case that has been cited has such power been exercised. The committee says this power has been exercised five times: once in the case of the Wheeling bridge, twice in cases in which laws were passed establishing railroads as post roads, once in the law of the last session authorizing the President to use all railroads as military roads, and once in the case of the Steubenville bridge. Mr. Speaker, the case of the Wheeling bridge is familiar to every lawyer on this floor. That was a case in which an action was commenced to abate this bridge as a nuisance, and it was held by the Supreme Court of the United States to be a nuisance, and was ordered to be abated as such, because it interfered with the rights of commerce on the Ohio river, and contravened a law of Congress. It was ~~not~~ because it contravened a law of the State, but because it contravened a law of Congress, in recognition of the contract made between the State of Virginia and the State of Kentucky, and ratified by the Federal Government at the time of the admission of Kentucky into the Union. And accordingly after it had been declared an illegal structure, as having been made in contravention of the law of Congress, the Congress intervened and declared it should be held to be a legal structure, notwithstanding its contravention of the law of Congress. So far as that bridge is concerned, it suspended the operation of the prior law. The law passed expressly provides that it shall be a legal structure, notwithstanding anything that may be found in the acts of Congress inconsistent with its erection.

The second case to which the committee alludes in this report is the law passed, I think, in 1842, directing that certain turnpike roads should be post routes. That law was reënacted, in substance, as to all railroads, in 1853, providing that all railroads then in existence, or hereafter to be in operation, should be post routes. Now, what is the effect of declaring that a road is a post route?

I find that Judge McLean, in his opinion in this very Wheeling bridge case, has answered the question very satisfactorily; and, instead of enlarging upon the matter, I will read to the House his language:

"The policy of extending the lines of post roads on all railroads and navigable waters was to require, under a penalty, all boats and railroad cars to deposit in post offices all letters which they may carry, so that the postage may be charged. It gives to the Government no rights on these lines of communication, except where the mail may be carried under a contract, which if obstructed subjects the offender to prosecution. It gives to the Government no other interest in or control over the road."

* "Even an ordinary road may be, though a post road, altered or vacated at the will of the local authority. It is difficult to see what benefit can result to the public from these bridges being declared a post road. It cannot use the bridges without paying toll the same as for the use of a turnpike road or railroad. It does not prevent the company from pulling down the bridge or altering it in any respect."

* * * * * "The idea that making the bridge a post road would exempt it from the consequences of being a nuisance is wholly unsustainable."

There, Mr. Speaker, I have given you the opinion of Judge McLean, in a grave judicial decision, on a case pending before the Supreme Court of the United States, that the creation of a road as a post route by act of Congress gives to the Federal Government no power over that road, and gives to the road itself no exemption whatsoever from the local legislation of the State.

I may say further, sir, that Judge Wayne, in his opinion in the same case, approved the doctrine laid down by Judge McLean in reference to this question.

So much, then, for three of the instances cited by the gentleman from Connecticut in behalf of the Military Committee in his report. Another case is the law authorizing the President to use any of these railroads as military routes. That law is still on our statute-book. It has full force. It has not been repealed. It has been applied in this case, and has been successfully applied. The troops of the United States and munitions of war have been carried over these roads from New York to Philadelphia, and, so far as I can learn, no objection has been made to the use of the roads for this purpose, and no account has been made of the profits of the roads accruing by reason of the performance of that service. Surely gentlemen will not hold that that is an authority for the passage of a law such as the one now before us.

The only other case is that of the Steubenville bridge. There I think that Congress has gone to the very extreme limit of its power. I think, and I say it frankly, that that is the only case that can be cited which has even the semblance of a precedent for the authority now sought to be exercised. In that case the Congress of the United States authorized either of two companies, one existing in my own State and the other existing in the State of Virginia, to build a bridge across the Ohio river. The authority given to the corporation of Ohio was not in contravention of any power declared to exist in that corporation by the Legislature of that State.

In the case of the other company I understand there were limitations upon its powers under the charter, but notwithstanding those limitations Congress authorized it to construct the bridge.

But, sir, I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this was a bridge to be built over the Ohio river, as to which, under the authority of the Wheeling bridge case, the Congress of the United States has complete and absolute control. I call attention also to the fact that this is a work to be executed outside the jurisdiction or limits of particular States. I call attention also to the fact that in one case there was no prohibition upon the corporation to build the bridge with which the act of Congress interfered, and that in the other the conditions established were frivolous and arbitrary.

But, sir, even if the act of Congress did involve the exercise of extreme power, it will be remembered that at the time the law was passed the State of West Virginia was giving its consent to the passage of the bill, the Baltimore and Ohio railroad was in the hands of the insurgents, and that the only line of communication between the western States and the capital was through Pittsburgh. It was thought at that time that the interests of the Government, as well as of these States, required that there should be speedy legislation in order that there should be another line of communication opened besides the single line of road by Pittsburgh. If there ever was a case in which this Government could be justified in straining its authority, this was a case of that sort. The Baltimore and Ohio railroad was closed, and there was but one bridge across the Ohio from its mouth to its source, furnishing a channel of communication for military or other purposes between the East and the West. So that while I do not find it necessary to impeach the authority of that case as a precedent, yet, if I did, I could find ample ground for it in the circumstances under which it was passed.

Now, sir, so much for precedents, so much for the cases cited by the committee as a justification for this bill. Nor do I think the Committee on Military Affairs has been more felicitous in the citation of its judicial authorities than it has been in the citation of its precedents. The gentleman has referred to the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, and has paid a very deserved compliment to Chief Justice Marshall in connection with that decision. He said that eminent jurist had raised the term commerce above the signification of mere trade, and had raised to a corresponding extent the power of the Federal Government over the regulations of commerce. It is true that was the beginning of a series of decisions which were carried to their consummation by the decision of his no less eminent successor, when in the case of Fitzhugh and the Genesee Chief he declared that the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States extended beyond mere tide-water and embraced all our inland lakes and large navigable rivers. But what did Chief Justice Marshall say in reference to this very power?

"Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State, and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, &c., are component parts of this mass—that is, that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government. No direct general power over these objects is granted to Congress, and consequently they remain subject to State legislation."

And in another part of the same opinion, discussing this question still more at length, he holds:

"Commerce among the States must of necessity be commerce with the States. In the regulation of trade with the Indian tribes the action of the law, especially when the Constitution was made, was chiefly within a State. The power of Congress, then, whatever it may be, must be exercised within the territorial jurisdiction of the several States. The sense of the nation on this subject is unequivocally manifested by the provisions made in the laws for transporting goods by land between Baltimore and Providence, between New York and Philadelphia, and between Philadelphia and Baltimore."

In order to understand what Chief Justice Marshall meant by that allusion I have taken the trouble to hunt up those laws, and I find they simply relate to the transfer of goods from the ports of one State through another State into the ports of a third State. They relate to commerce among the States. They provide that one entry shall be sufficient for that purpose, and there shall be no necessity for a second entry in a port within the limits of the second State through which the voyage is supposed to pass.

Now, sir, in this same connection, I desire to cite gentlemen to this Wheeling bridge case, to which allusion has been made. Judge Nelson, in delivering the opinion of the court, says:

"In respect to these purely internal streams of a State the public right of navigation is exclusively under the control and regulation of the State Legislatures; and in cases where these erections or obstructions to the navigation are constructed under the law of a State or sanctioned by legislative authority, they are neither a public nuisance subject to abatement, nor is the individual who may have sustained special damage from their interference with the public use entitled to any remedy for his loss. So far as the public use of the stream is concerned, the Legislature having the power to control and regulate it, the statute authorizing the structure, though it may be a real impediment to navigation, makes it lawful."

And Judge McLean, in dissenting, says:

"If under the commercial power Congress may make bridges over navigable waters, it would be difficult to find any limitation of such power. Turnpike roads, canals, and railroads might on the same principle be built by Congress; and if this be a constitutional power, it cannot be interfered with by State legislation. So extravagant and absorbing a Federal power as this has rarely if ever been claimed by any one."

Now, if that be the rule as to water-courses, does it not apply to railroad courses? If the jurisdiction of a State is supreme over its internal streams, is it not supreme over the railroads which are created by the authority of the State alone? If riparian owners cannot be interfered with by the action of the Federal Legislature, ask whether the same is not true of railroad companies? It is a question of the jurisdiction of a State, and not the character of the structure over which the jurisdiction is exercised.

In the Convention which formed the Constitution, Mr. Franklin moved to insert after the clause to "establish post roads" the words "to provide for cutting canals where deemed necessary." Mr. Madison suggested an enlargement of the motion into a power "to grant charters of incorporation where the interests of the United States might require and the legislative provisions of individual States may be incompetent." A discussion ensued as to the necessity of this amendment of Mr. Madison, and the question being taken as to the grant of power to the Federal Government to create corporations "to provide for cutting canals where deemed necessary," it was lost; Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Georgia voting in favor of the grant, and New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, North Carolina, and South Carolina voting against it. This bill proposes to grant to a local corporation the power to build a road and branches not authorized by its charter. Is that in any degree different from conferring new corporate powers, or from granting a charter entirely de novo? This bill proposes to confer upon such local corporation power to build a railroad. Is that in any degree different from the power to build a canal? Does not the refusal to grant power to the Federal Government, power to authorize a company to build a canal, carry with it a refusal of the power to build a railroad? The answer is obvious.

My friend who sits to my left [Mr. GARFIELD] drew an argument from the fact that New Jersey stipulated that she would return the consideration paid for this contract if any such competing road should ever be established in the State of New Jersey, and said that New Jersey was thereby estopped to recognize the power of Congress to pass this law. But, sir, that is the universal rule where there is a guarantee of title. Will the gentleman tell me that a covenant of warranty is an admission on the part of the grantor that there is a valid outstanding title? I know on second consideration that he will not.

Now, sir, I come to the substitute which was submitted this morning. I have not had time to examine it carefully. I suppose I caught its meaning when it was read at the Clerk's desk. I have it now before me. I think it applies and was intended to apply the provisions of this bill which I have criticised and which I have shown to be not only manifestly unjust but an infringement of the rights of New Jersey—to apply these provisions to all of the States of the Union, and to all the railroads in those States. If that amendment should pass, as I understand it, not a railroad ten miles long in the center of the most central county of a State is under the jurisdiction and control of State authority. It provides that all railroads operated by steam, no matter on what terms authorized, no matter for what purposes built, shall have power to carry passengers, freight, mails, and Government supplies on their way from one State to another State.

Why, sir, you could not construct a railroad within the limits of a State for the purpose of carrying coal from a mine to its depot without this provision affecting it. You could not give to a man or a company the right to build a road through a given portion of a single farm for a particular purpose but the Federal legislation seizes upon the railroad and authorizes the company to make it part of a line of transit from one State to another. You could not erect a road with a stationary engine to haul marble from the quarry to the depot, nor a track to carry whisky from the distillery to the storehouse, nor a street railroad through a village, unless subject to this power.

Gentlemen may tell me I am interpreting extravagantly the language of this provision. Then let the language itself not be extravagant. Every railroad in the United States whose road is operated by steam is authorized to carry freight, property, mails, passengers, troops, and Government supplies on their way from one State to another State, and to receive compensation therefor. Why, sir, no matter what useful limitations may be imposed on the road, for what purpose created, under what guarantees established, they are all swept away by the provisions of this bill, and a company authorized for one purpose, and one purpose only, and that a merely local purpose, is authorized to connect itself with roads at one end or the other, and to become part of a great thoroughfare from one end of the country to the other.

Now, sir, if all the rights of States are to be swallowed up, if we are to make them of no account in this Government, let us understand it at once, let us give up the notion that this is a Confederation, let us obliterate State lines, and have an end to the pretext that the States have reserved rights.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] found a great necessity for the passage of this bill in the proclamation issued by the Governor of New Jersey, and he complained bitterly that he called the Constitution a compact, and that he spoke of State rights.

Now, sir, I do not know that there is anything in State rights which ought to excite the ire of the gentleman. If he means to say that the Federal Government within the powers granted to it is supreme, I agree with him. If he means to say that whenever Congress exercises the power which is clearly granted to it its enactments are superior to State constitutions and State laws, I make no quarrel with him. But if he means to tell me that the powers not granted are not reserved, and that within the powers reserved the States are not as sovereign as they ever were before the Union was formed, as England is with reference to its sovereign powers, I disagree with him, and plant myself on the language of the Constitution, that the powers not granted are reserved to the States.

The States shall not trample upon the rights of the Federal Government; the General Government shall not trample upon the rights of the States. As the power to regulate commerce between the States is granted to the Federal Government, and shall not be interfered with by the States, so the right to regulate internal commerce is reserved to the States, and shall not be interfered with by the General Government. That is what we mean by State rights; and that we are prepared to preserve, maintain, and defend, for we believe it essential not only for the preservation of the Constitution, but of liberty itself. State rights! They are the key of the Confederation. They have solved the problem of free government. They have reconciled liberty and power. They have maintained the integrity of territory and the rights of freedom. They are as essential to our Government as a free press or a free ballot. "When the Coliseum falls Rome shall fall." When State rights fall the American Union shall fall, and all its honors, all its glories, all its liberties shall be prostrate in the dust. Sir, I believe the bill has no warrant either in the Constitution as we read it, nor in the precedents as we find them, nor in the judicial determinations as they are handed to us in the books of authority; and so believing, I think it is unwise, unjust, and that it will be utterly void, and that if you pass it New Jersey ought to resist it. I have felt constrained to oppose this bill, and shall vote against it.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I admit that there is such a thing as a sovereign right within a State. There is no such thing as State sovereignty. Sovereignty rests in the General Government; but that there are certain sovereign rights reserved to a State over which the General Government has no control, I certainly do not deny. For instance, it is undoubtedly within the power of the State, by its own legislative enactments or compacts, either to encourage or restrain the enterprise of its own citizens in the use of its own soil. Inspection laws, health laws, and those laws which relate to turnpikes and ferries, &c., appertain to the State. No direct general power over these objects is granted to Congress, and consequently they remain subject to State legislation.

Now, sir, the question here is not whether we are impairing a State right of New Jersey. It is simply this: does the right to regulate commerce between States exist within the State or within Congress? If we find that under the existing regulations of the State of New Jersey the means of transit for commerce between New York and Pennsylvania are adequate, if we find that the existing line is capable of performing the service which the wants of commerce demand, then I admit that Congress ought not to interfere.

Congress being the supreme judge, having the power delegated by the Constitution to regulate commerce between the States, must determine whether, under the law and acknowledged policy of New Jersey, whereby the Camden and Amboy railroad is a legalized and protected monopoly, having the exclusive privilege of transporting both freight and passengers between the great cities of New York and Philadelphia, there is that free intercourse between the States of New York and Pennsylvania which the demands of inter-State commerce require. If Congress determines that increased facilities are necessary, then it has the right to declare that the Raritan road is a lawful structure, and a public highway of the United States.

The gentleman from Ohio says that we have no right to interfere with the internal rivers of a State. I admit that such is the law. But what is the law that was read by the gentleman from Ohio? It was substantially that the riparian owners have a right to the channel of the stream, and that therefore they may build docks and throw up embankments. But if the gentleman had read still further he would have found that that could not be done so far as to impair navigation, the power of regulating which resides in Congress. If an individual imagines himself injured by a railroad, and calls for an abatement of the railroad or a portion of it as a nuisance, it cannot be done. Any why? Because the building and regulation of railroads is within the power of the State—a power that is supreme and cannot be interfered with, so far as individuals are concerned, or at all unless free commerce between the States is impaired.

The gentleman from Ohio has said that we have here no cases analogous to the one under consideration. I do not agree with the honorable gentleman. I cannot see why the same principle is not involved in the Wheeling bridge case. In that case the complaint was made against the Wheeling bridge by the State of Pennsylvania on the ground that by its existence the internal improvements of the State of Pennsylvania were injured, and that it caused a loss to her treasury. The case came to the Supreme Court of the United States, and it was determined that the bridge did affect the navigation of the Ohio river, and therefore did impair the rights of the complainants. But when the company did not comply with the order of the court, and came to Congress asking that the bridge be declared a lawful structure, Congress passed a law declaring it a lawful structure, on the ground that, if removed, it would interfere with the free commercial intercourse of States. Therefore the State of Pennsylvania failed in getting a writ of assistance to carry the decree of the court into effect.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to ask the gentleman why it was that the Wheeling bridge was not, as originally made, a legal structure.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. As originally made it was not a legal structure because it interfered with the navigation of the Ohio river.

Mr. YEAMAN. I yielded to the gentleman from Vermont, as I supposed, for a short explanation; but if there is to be a debate between these gentlemen, I hope it will be understood that it is not to come out of my time.

Mr. PENDLETON. I hope it will not come out of the time of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the gentleman from Vermont will please proceed. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio why the Supreme Court did not finally abate the Wheeling bridge if it was an interference with the navigation of the Ohio? The answer is obvious, that the right to regulate commerce between the States being vested solely in Congress, and they, in their judgment, deciding that the bridge was necessary for free commercial intercourse between the States, then, whether Congress passed the bill rightfully or improperly, inasmuch as it was in the exercise of a legitimate power, it was not for the court to say whether it was exercised wisely or unwisely. The court was bound to respect the authority of Congress.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Vermont whether the Wheeling bridge was not held to be an illegal structure, because it contravened an act of Congress guaranteeing the free navigation of the Ohio river.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. It was held to be an illegal structure because it interfered with the navigation of the Ohio, and Congress had prior to that time passed an act to protect the navigation of the Ohio river.

Mr. PENDLETON. Then, does not the gentleman see any distinction between that case and this? That was a case in which Congress suspended the operation of one of its own laws, thereby making a structure before illegal a legal structure. But this is an attempt by act of Congress to suspend the operation of a law of the State of New Jersey!

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I can only say that by the law of New Jersey commercial intercourse between the States is impaired, and that the case before the House is a stronger one than the Wheeling bridge case. In that case Congress said that although it had by previous act provided that the free navigation of the Ohio should be protected, yet as free commercial intercourse between the States was of so much more importance, the law it had formerly passed should yield to this paramount interest of inter-State commerce.

Sir, if this were a question affecting simply the rights of New Jersey, Congress would have no power to interfere. If this was simply a line commencing and ending within the limits of a State, and capable of doing merely a local business, Congress would have no right to interfere. If it were not necessary, in order to protect commercial intercourse between the States, that Congress should say that this is a lawful structure and a public highway of the United States, then Congress would have no right to interfere.

I am perfectly willing to admit all the gentleman contends for here. I only deny his application of the law to this case. I claim that this is not an interference with any right of the State of New Jersey. It is a simple exercise of the power of Congress in declaring that this line already in existence shall have the power to do the business which it is necessary that they shall do in order to establish free commercial intercourse between the States.

Now, sir, I do not know nor do I very much care what the State of New Jersey may think or what they may do on this question. I do not care what effect it may have on the political condition of New Jersey. I hope when I consider a question in Congress I go above all local prejudices and feelings; I hope I rise above party; I hope I act from principle, in accordance with the convictions of my own reason, and upon the facts for or against any measure which comes before this body.

Without reference to the State most nearly interested in this bill, which State, I am free to say, I do not admire, without reference to her political status, to which I am greatly opposed, without reference to her political action, with which I have no sympathy, without reference to the influence of this Camden and Amboy railroad one way or the other, but strictly upon high legal grounds, assuming that we have a right to declare the Raritan railroad a legal structure and a public highway, and believing, as I do, that it is necessary to make that declaration in order to secure free commercial intercourse between the great States of New York and Pennsylvania, I shall certainly support the original bill.

But, sir, the Committee on Military Affairs have signified their willingness to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.] I confess that it is not in accordance with my judgment or wishes; but as the substitute is not obnoxious to the criticism which has been so freely made upon the original bill, of interfering with the internal business of the State of New Jersey, I am willing to give it my support. It merely provides that railroad lines may, independent of State legislation, do the business passing from one State to another. It recognizes the principle that the business from State to State is a portion of the commerce of the country; the freedom of which States demand for themselves and the country.

Now, sir, the amendment has for its object the giving of these roads the right that would be given them by the passage of the original bill. But for the reason that it is more general in its character than the original bill, that it is not liable to the objection of singling out a particular State, I will give it my support, although I have more doubt as to the power of Congress to pass the substitute than I have of its power to pass the original bill.

Mr. YEAMAN. Mr. Speaker, it would seem as if nothing can be discussed here without attempts being made to give it a political turn. I will aim only to place this question on its merits, and in doing that will not deem it necessary either to magnify or to underrate real State rights. I have ever in my place here defended whatever of State rights is found in the Constitution, and will ever assail all assumption of such rights that would destroy our nationality by means of nullification, secession, exclusive privileges, monopolies, and prohibitions.

What are we asked to do? The charter of the Camden and Amboy road says:

"It shall not be lawful at any time during the said railroad charter to construct any other railroad or railroads in this State, without the consent of the said companies, [the monopoly,] which shall be intended or used for the transportation of passengers or merchandise between the cities of New York and Philadelphia, or to compete in business with the railroad authorized by the act to which this supplement is relative."

It seems that New Jersey is deriving large revenues from this monopoly by the stock given her to procure this kind of legislation, which is now claimed to be a contract, and from taxes levied on the citizens and merchandise of other States passing through her borders over the road thus chartered with exclusive privileges. It is no contract between the State and the monopoly, because the thing aimed to be done is incompetent, as will hereafter appear, and because the assumed contract and the consideration are void. No principle is better settled than that no recovery can be had of a sum or thing agreed to be paid in consideration of efforts to influence legislation or of legislation being influenced in a given way. This is a very infelicitous occasion for the defense of State sovereignty by those who defend the monopoly, and might be made a very good occasion by those who go for this bill.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] affirms, as a strong point in opposition to this bill, that the monopoly did pay a money consideration for these exclusive privileges. That was a singular and a melancholy fact to be stated by a friend of the monopoly. What! one Legislature, one generation, bind or trammel the next for a money consideration? May one institution be incorporated to teach a particular creed of religion, and then pay a money consideration for an act prohibiting any other institution to be incorporated teaching any other creed? May a company be incorporated to manufacture agricultural implements of a particular kind, and then pay a money consideration for a prohibition against the manufacture of any other kind of implements for the same purpose? It was an appalling avowal to be made, and that such conduct should be sanctioned and have claimed for it the benefits of a contract is to my mind an ominous fact.

This House has declared by resolution that the means of intercommunication between the two cities are grossly and notoriously inadequate. And we are now asked, not to repeal the charter, not to impair the obligation of contracts, not to interfere with the sovereignty of New Jersey over her own citizens and their own merchandise within her own borders; but only to declare that another system or route of transit by roads and boats is a lawful structure, and a public highway of the United States for postal and military purposes, and for commerce between the several States. If we have not this power, the subject must be dropped; if we have the power, then its exercise is in law no injury to others or impairment of contracts, for all contrary arrangements were made in the face of the power of Congress. To deny that we have this power is to deny that we are a nation. To deny the power is to make worthless the power of Congress to establish post roads, which does not mean merely to select, use, accept, but means to make, to erect. Congress, in the execution of this power, may hew through the wilderness, bridge rivers, and tunnel mountains, and may build a road just alongside the Camden and Amboy route, and ask New Jersey no questions about it. But this bill only proposes to exercise this power in its mildest sense by accepting, legalizing, selecting, using, if we want to, another route.

To deny our power in this case is to give to the laws of New Jersey an extra-territorial operation, for the act incorporating the monopoly does not purport to govern alone the citizens of New Jersey in their movements, but to control the movements of the citizens of other States. To deny our power is to render nugatory and worthless the power of Congress under the Constitution to "regulate commerce among the States." I will not stop to quote decisions. The clause has been given a proper, a practical, a generous meaning. The domestic internal commerce of New Jersey may go where it pleases. New Jersey may direct it as she pleases. But we will say that as between New York and Pennsylvania, as between all States lying to the east and west or to the north and south of New Jersey, commerce may go where it pleases, and we have no real power to regulate it if we cannot say this. It is understood to be the policy of that State, and especially of the monopoly which is advising if not controlling its legislation, to take advantage of her singular geographical position, and levy a tribute upon the persons and property of the balance of the continent. To apply no epithets to such conduct, it is not an enviable attitude for a State to occupy, and if we do our duty it will not be permitted. Jeff. Davis has run State rights to death at the South: I hope it will not be done elsewhere.

Granting that the terms of this monopoly may be binding upon New Jersey, and upon the citizens of New Jersey, how is it possible it shall be binding upon other States, other peoples, and upon the national Government? How can this State regulate the commercial intercourse of the two greatest cities of the continent, neither of which is in her borders? Commerce in all ages has involved personal locomotion, the transportation of commodities, the products of the field, the shop, the mine, and the chase, and involves also the transmission of intelligence, orders, contracts, and the signs or representatives of value, as specie, currency, and bills of exchange. Modern commerce cannot exist without all these. In times past it has gone on the backs of camels and asses, and in slow sailing craft. Now, as between nations, steam outstrips the wind or propels against it. As "among the States" on this continent it is carried on by means of rivers, canals, mail and railroads, and no matter through what channel conducted, whether natural or artificial, Congress may regulate it. And how can Congress regulate it if New Jersey may say it shall only go a particular route, and then on terms prescribed by her or the monopoly of her creation? The two ideas are wholly inconsistent, and if there is any reality in the constitutional declaration that the laws of Congress, in pursuance of the Constitution, are the supreme law of the land, the power of the nation must obtain and the monopoly fail when Congress so wills. There are two questions I want answered. If a State may prescribe the route upon which, and upon which alone, commerce between other States may go over or through her own territory, and may also prescribe the terms upon which it may go, why can it not prohibit altogether such commerce? And if it may either prohibit it, or, granting the transit, may grant on terms and regulations, in what sense, mode, or conception can Congress execute the power to regulate commerce between the same States? Until these questions are answered the opponents of this bill, and the friends of the monopoly, have not done their duty. If they find them hard to answer, the difficulty is in sustaining the false position they have assumed.

The power to regulate commerce is the same whether that commerce be carried on through natural or artificial channels. Can a State control, regulate, or prohibit the use of a river running through its midst, levy a tribute on tonnage, and then direct that commerce shall go no other route? It may be answered that nature made and located the river and conferred natural rights, but capital and skill built and located the road, and the State granting the right of way and conferring corporate powers, did it on conditions. To this I reply that just so far as these conditions are inconsistent with the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States, they are not binding, and the case is the common one where the grant is valid and the condition void. Look at Kentucky. The Cumberland and Tennessee rivers, draining Tennessee and northern Georgia and Alabama, pass through that State and debouch into the Ohio. Shall Kentucky lay terms on the coal, iron, salt, lumber, and grain that come down the Cumberland, and the sugar, molasses, and imports that go up it; and upon the wheat, corn, and cotton that come down the Tennessee, because in so doing they cross the State of Kentucky? Can she thus be allowed to take advantage of her geographical position? Or when she granted the charter of the Louisville and Nashville railroad, could she have done so on the condition that all trade between Nashville, Huntsville, Florence, and Knoxville on the one side, and Cincinnati and Pittsburgh on the other, must travel over that road, and should not pass through Kentucky by any other route? As a Kentuckian, should she attempt such a thing, I would ask the General Government to send a fleet of gunboats to the Cumberland and Tennessee rivers to "regulate commerce," by removing any such obstructions placed in the way. I repeat that it can make no possible difference whether commerce is carried on in natural or artificial channels, as regards the power of Congress to regulate it, and the principal regulation that commerce needs is freedom and protection.

In this view and in this day of progress railroads are analogous to rivers. Commerce sustains them and is sustained by them. They become and are intended for great public highways, subject to local laws, but not local prohibitions as against the rest of the nation. We must treat an existing railway as an existing line of commercial intercourse. It is at once the creature, the instrument, and the necessity of commerce, and must not be made its obstruction. If it is, then Congress must remove the obstruction by way of regulating commerce and establishing post roads and providing for the general welfare and securing the equality of rights of the citizens of the several States guaranteed in the Constitution.

If an act of God should divide the State of New Jersey and run an arm of the sea from New York bay to the Delaware river, no one surely would question the right of Congress to regulate commerce between the States of New York and Pennsylvania carried on through that arm. Nor would New Jersey be allowed to interpose custom or transit duties on such commerce. She would have nominal title to the submerged land, and her citizens would own all the riparian rights; still the power of Congress to regulate commerce would authorize them to enact all laws necessary to preserve the rights of other States against the imposts of New Jersey.
